46 & 47 VICTORIÆ.

SETTLED LAND ACT, 1882. CONVEYANCING ACT, 1882.
CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY ACT, 1881.

RULES OF THE SUPREME COURT

AND ORDER AS TO COURT FEES.

RULES UNDER THE SETTLED LAND ACT, 1882.

1. The expression "the Act" used in these rules means the Settled Land Act, 1882.

Words defined by the Act when used in these rules have the same meanings as in the Act.

The expression "the tenant for life" includes the tenant for life as defined by the Act, and any person having the powers of a tenant for life under the Act.

2. All applications to the court under the Act may be made by summons in chambers; and if in any case a petition shall be presented without the direction of the judge, no further costs shall be allowed than would be allowed upon a summons.

3. The forms in the appendix to these rules are to be followed as far as possible, with such modification as the circumstances require. All summonses, petitions, affidavits and other proceedings under the Act are to be entitled according to Form I. in the Appendix.

4. The persons to be served with notice of applications to the court shall, in the first instance, be as follows:—

In the case of applications by the tenant for life under sections 15 and 34, the trustees.

In the case of applications under section 38, the trustees (if any), and the tenant for life if not the applicant.

In the case of applications under section 44, the tenant for life, or the trustees, as the case may be.

No other person shall in the first instance be served. Except as hereinbefore provided, where an application under the Act is made by any person other than the tenant for life, the tenant for life alone shall be served in the first instance.

5. Except in the cases mentioned in the last rule, applications by a tenant for life shall not in the first instance be served on any person.

6. The judge may require notice of any application under the Act to be served upon such persons as he thinks fit, and may give all necessary directions as to the persons (if any) to be served, and such directions may be added to or varied from time to time as the case may require. Where a petition is presented, the petitioner may, after the petition has been filed, apply by summons in chambers (Appendix, Form XXIII.) for directions with regard to the persons on whom the petition ought to be served. If any person not already served is directed to be served with notice of an application, the application shall stand over generally, or until such time as the judge directs. The judge may in any particular case, upon such terms (if any) as he thinks fit, dispense with service upon any person upon whom, under these rules, or under any direction of the judge, any application is to be served.

7. It shall be sufficient upon any application under the Act to verify by affidavit the title of the tenant for life and trustees or other persons interested in the application unless the judge in any particular case requires further evidence. Such affidavit may be in the form or to the effect of Form No. VIII. in the Appendix.

8. Any sale authorised or directed by the court under the Act, shall be carried into effect out of court, unless the judge shall otherwise order, and generally in such manner as the judge may direct.

9. Where the court authorises generally the tenant for life to make from time to time leases or grants for building or mining purposes under section 10 of the Act, the order shall not direct any particular lease or grant to be settled or approved by the judge unless the judge shall consider that there is some special reason why such lease or grant should be settled or approved by him. Where the court authorises any such lease or grant in any particular case, or where the court authorises a lease under section 15 of the Act, the order may either approve a lease or grant already prepared or may direct that the lease or grant shall contain conditions specified in the order or such conditions as may be approved by the judge at chambers without directing the lease or grant to be settled by the judge.

10. Any person directed by the tenant for life to pay into court any capital money arising under the Act may apply by summons at chambers for leave to pay the money into court. (Appendix Form IX., X. and XI.)

11. The summons shall be supported by an affidavit setting forth—

1. The name and address of the person desiring to make the payment.
2. The place where he is to be served with notice of any proceeding relating to the money.
3. The amount of money to be paid into court and the account to the credit of which it is to be placed.
4. The name and address of the tenant for life under the settlement by whose direction the money is to be paid into court.
5. The short particulars of the transaction in respect of which the money is payable.

12. The order made upon the summons for payment into court may contain directions for investment of the money on any securities authorised by section 21, sub-section 1 of the Act, and for payment of the dividends to the tenant for life, either forthwith or upon production of the consent in writing of the applicant; the signature to such consent to be verified by the affidavit of a solicitor. But if the transaction in respect of which the money arises is not completed at the date of payment into court, the money shall not, without the consent of the applicant, be ordered to be invested in any securities other than those upon which cash under the control of the court may be invested.

13. Money paid into court under the Act shall be paid to an account, to be entitled in the matter of the settlement, with a short description of the mode in which the money arises if it is necessary or desirable to identify it, and in the matter of the Act. (Appendix Forms IX., X. and XI.)

14. Any person paying into court any capital money arising under the Act shall be entitled first to deduct the costs of paying the money into court.

15. In all cases not provided for by the Act or these rules, the existing practice of the court as to costs and otherwise, so far as the same may be applicable, shall apply to proceedings under the Act.

16. The fees and allowances to solicitors of the court in respect to proceedings under the Act shall be those provided by the Rules of the Supreme Court as to costs for the time being in force, so far as they are applicable to such proceedings.

17. The fees to be taken by the officers of the court in respect to proceedings under the Act shall be those provided by the Rules of the Supreme Court as to court fees for the time being in force, so far as they are applicable to such proceedings.

18. These rules shall come into operation from and after the 31st December, 1882.

19. These rules may be cited as the Settled Land Act Rules, 1882.

RULES UNDER THE ACT FOR THE ABOLITION OF FINES AND RECOVERIES, AND SECTION 7 OF THE CONVEYANCING ACT, 1882.

1. No person authorised or appointed under the Act 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 74. (in these rules referred to as the Fines and Recoveries Act) to take the acknowledgments of deeds by married women shall take any such acknowledgment if he is interested or concerned as either a party or as solicitor or clerk to the solicitor for one of the parties or otherwise in the transaction giving occasion for the acknowledgment.

2. Before a commissioner shall receive an acknowledgment, he shall enquire of the married woman separately and apart from her husband and from the solicitor concerned in the transaction whether she intends to give up her interest in the estate to be passed by the deed without having any provision made for her ; and where the married woman answers in the affirmative and the commissioner shall have no reason to doubt the truth of her answer, he shall proceed to receive the acknowledgment ; but if it shall appear to him that it is intended that provision is to be made for the married woman, then the commissioner shall not take her acknowledgment until he is satisfied that such provision has been actually made by some deed or writing produced to him ; or if such provision shall not have been actually made before, then the commissioner shall require the terms of the intended provision to be shortly reduced into writing, and shall verify the same by his signature in the margin, at the foot, or at the back thereof.

3. The memorandum to be indorsed on or written at the foot or in the margin of a deed acknowledged by a married woman shall be in the following form in lieu of the form set forth in section 84 of the Fines and Recoveries Act :

"This deed was this day produced before me and acknowledged by therein named to be her act and deed [or their several acts and deeds] previous to which acknowledgment [or acknowledgments] the said was [or were] examined by me separately and apart from her husband [or their respective husbands] touching her [or their] knowledge of the contents of the said deed and her [or their] consent thereto and [each of them] declared the same to be freely and voluntarily executed by her."

4. When an acknowledgment is taken by any person other than a judge, the following declaration shall be added to the memorandum of acknowledgment:

"And I declare that I am not interested or concerned either as a party or as a solicitor or clerk to the solicitor for one of the parties or otherwise in the transaction giving occasion for the said acknowledgment."

5. A memorandum of acknowledgment purporting to be signed according to any of the following forms shall be deemed to be a memorandum purporting to be signed by a person authorised to take the acknowledgment:—

(Signed) A.B.

A Judge of the High Court of Justice in England, or A Judge of the County Court of or A perpetual Commissioner for taking acknowledgments of deeds by married women.

or The special Commissioner appointed to take the aforesaid acknowledgment.

But this rule is not to derogate from the effect of any memorandum purporting to be signed by a person authorised to take the acknowledgment, though not signed in accordance with any of the above forms.

6. Nothing in the five preceding rules contained shall make invalid any acknowledgment which would have been valid if these rules had not been enacted.

7. Every Commission appointing a special Commissioner to take an acknowledgment by a married woman shall be returned to the office of the registrar of certificates of acknowledgments of deeds by married women, and shall be there filed. An index shall be prepared and kept in the said office, giving the names and addresses of the married women named in all such commissions filed in the said office after the 31st December, 1882. The same rules shall apply to searches in the index so as to be prepared as to searches in the other indexes and registers kept in the Central Office.

8. The costs to be allowed to solicitors in respect of the matters hereinafter mentioned, when not otherwise regulated by the general orders in force for the time being under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, or by special agreement, shall be as follows; anything in the Rules of the Supreme Court as to costs, dated the 12th August, 1875, to the contrary notwithstanding:—

Charges under the Act 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 74 (the Fines and Recoveries Act).

For the indorsements on deeds required by the Fines and Recoveries Act, to be entered on the Court Rolls of manors of the memorandum of production and memorandum of entry on Court Rolls, to be signed by the Lord Steward or Deputy Steward, each endorsement of memorandum 5s., together	0	10	0
For the entries on the Court Rolls of deeds and the indorsements thereon, at per folio of 72 words .	0	0	6
For taking the consent of each protector of settlement of lands .	0	13	4
For taking the surrender by each tenant in tail of lands . . .	0	13	4
For entries of such surrenders or the memorandums thereof in the Court Rolls, at per folio of 72 words	0	0	6

9. The following Rules and Orders are hereby repealed, except as to certificates not lodged before the 1st January, 1883, of acknowledgments by married women of deeds executed before the 1st January, 1883, and the affidavits relating thereto:—

The General Rules of the Court of Common Pleas, Hil. Term, 1834.

The General Rules of the Court of Common Pleas, Trin. Term, 1834.

The General Order of the Court of Common Pleas, dated the 24th November, 1862.

The General Order of the Court of Common Pleas, dated the 13th January, 1863.

10. These Rules shall take effect from and after the 31st December, 1882.

RULES UNDER SECTION 2 OF THE CONVEYANCING ACT, 1882.

1. Every requisition for an official search shall state the name and address of the person requiring the search to be made. Every requisition and certificate shall be filed in the office where the search was made.

2. Every person requiring an official search to be made pursuant to section 2 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882, shall deliver to the officer a declaration according to the Forms I. and II. in the Appendix, purporting to be signed by the person requiring the search to be made, or by a solicitor, which declaration may be accepted by the officer as sufficient evidence that the search is required for the purposes of the said section. The declaration may be made in the requisition, or in a separate document.

3. Requisitions for searches under section 2 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882, shall be in the Forms III. to VI. in the Appendix, and the certificates of the results of such searches shall be in the Forms VII. to X., with such modifications as the circumstances may require.

4. Where a certificate setting forth the result of a search in any name has been issued, and it is desired that the search be continued in that name, to a date not more than one calendar month subsequent to the date of the certificate, a requisition in writing in the Form XI. in the Appendix may be left with the proper officer, who shall cause the search to be continued, and the result of the continued search shall be indorsed on the original certificate and upon any office copy thereof which may have been issued, if produced to the officer for that purpose. The indorsement shall be in the Form XII. in the Appendix with such modifications as circumstances require.

5. Every person shall upon payment of the prescribed fee be entitled to have a copy of the whole or any part of any deed or document enrolled in the Enrolment Department of the Central Office.

RULE UNDER THE CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY ACT, 1881.

6. An alphabetical index of the names of the grantors of all powers of attorney filed under section 48 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, shall be prepared and kept by the proper officer, and any person may search the index upon payment of the prescribed fee. No person shall take copies of or extracts from any power of attorney or other document filed under that section and produced for his inspection. All copies or extracts which may be required shall be made by the Office.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE.

THE LUNACY ORDERS, 1883.

I, ROUNDELL EARL OF SELBORNE, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, intrusted by virtue of Her Majesty the Queen's Sign Manual with the care and commitment of the custody of the persons and estates of persons found idiot, lunatic or of unsound mind, with the advice and assistance of the Right Honourable Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, and the Right Honourable Sir Richard Baggallay, the Right Honourable Sir William Baliol Brett, the Right Honourable Sir Henry Cotton, the Right Honourable Sir Nathaniel Lindley, and the Right Honourable Sir Charles Synge Christopher Bowen, the Lords Justices of Appeal also intrusted as aforesaid, and with the concurrence of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, and by virtue and in exercise of the powers or authorities in this behalf vested in me by the Lunacy Regulation Acts, 1853 and 1862, and the Courts of Justice (Salaries and Funds) Act, 1869, and the Court of Chancery (Funds) Act, 1872, and of every other power or authority enabling me in this behalf, hereby, as to all the following Orders except that numbered 7, order as follows, and we, Charles Cecil Cotes and Herbert John Gladstone, being two of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, and by virtue and in exercise of the powers or authorities in this behalf vested in us by the Courts of Justice (Salaries and Funds) Act, 1869, and the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1881, and of every other power or authority enabling us in this behalf, hereby, as to the Order numbered 7, order as follows :—

1. The General Orders in Lunacy dated the 7th November, 1853, the 3rd July, 1854, the 12th January, 1855, the 1st August, 1856, the 8th November, 1856, the 7th November, 1862, the 10th February, 1866, the 10th January, 1870, the 30th May, 1873, and the 22nd December, 1874, are hereby discharged as from the date of these Orders, and these Orders are hereby substituted therefor. To the extent to which these Orders are inconsistent with the Chancery Funds Consolidated Rules, 1874, those rules are to be deemed to be hereby varied or repealed, and so far as these Orders relate to the powers and duties of the Paymaster-General or the Bank, or to the several matters in respect of which rules are by section 18 of the Court of Chancery (Funds) Act, 1872, authorised to be made, these Orders are to be deemed to be rules made under that section.

2. All pending proceedings are to be carried on according to the provisions of these Orders so far as practicable, and subject thereto according to the practice heretofore subsisting, and, in case of doubt as to the mode of procedure, in such of the modes aforesaid as the Masters in Lunacy shall direct; and the provisions of these Orders shall be subject to variation by Special Order in any case, and shall be applicable only where there may be no express directions given by any Special Order concerning any of the matters provided for in these Orders, or so far as such directions may not extend. In all matters not provided for by these Orders the mode of procedure heretofore in force shall continue to be followed.

3. In these Orders the following words have the several meanings hereby assigned to them over and above their several ordinary meanings, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction :—

Words importing the singular number only include the plural, and vice versâ.

Words importing the masculine gender only include the feminine gender.

"The Judge" includes the Lord Chancellor and the Judge or Judges for the time being intrusted by the Sign Manual with the care and commitment of the custody of the persons and estates of idiots, lunatics and persons of unsound mind.

"The Masters" includes the Masters in Lunacy jointly and severally.

"Next-of-kin" includes heir or heirs at law and also the person or persons who would be entitled to the lunatic's estate, or to shares thereof, under the Statutes for the distribution of the effects of intestates, in case he were dead intestate.

"The Paymaster-General" includes Her Majesty's Paymaster-General for the time being and the Assistant Paymaster-General for Chancery business for the time being deputed by the Paymaster-General to act on his behalf for Chancery business.

"The Bank" means the Bank of England, or the Governor and Company of the Bank of England.

The provisions respecting the Committee of the Estate, his appointment, accounts, payments, allowances and matters of the like nature, are to be deemed to extend as far as they may be applicable mutatis mutandis to the case of a receiver.

4. Where in these Orders or in a Special Order a limited time from and after a date or event is appointed or allowed for doing any act or taking any proceeding, the computation of the limited time is not to include the day of the date or of the happening of the event, but is to commence at the beginning of the next following day, and the act or proceeding is to be done or taken at the latest on the last day of the limited time according to this computation.

5. Where, according to these Orders or a Special Order, the time for doing any act or taking any proceeding expires on a Sunday or on a day on which the offices are closed, and by reason thereof the act or proceeding cannot be done or taken on that day, the act or proceeding is, as far as regards the time of doing or taking the same, to be held to be duly done or taken if done or taken on the Monday next following or on the day on which the offices next open, as the case may be.

6. The power of the Judge and Masters to enlarge or abridge the time for doing any act or taking any proceeding upon such (if any) terms as shall to him or them seem expedient is to be deemed unaffected by these Orders.

7. The post of Registrar in Lunacy as at present constituted is hereby abolished as from the date of these Orders, and the clerks at the date of these Orders employed in his office are hereby transferred to the Masters' office, where they shall perform such duties as the Masters may from time to time direct.

8. For the purpose of the duties required to be performed by the Registrar in Lunacy under sections 92, 100 and 101 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, the Senior Master for the time being, or, in his absence, the other Master, shall henceforth be and act as Registrar in Lunacy, and all other duties heretofore performed by the Registrar in Lunacy or the clerks in his office shall be performed by the Masters or the clerks in their office, in addition to the duties heretofore performed by them, except that the present Masters shall not be bound to attend in Court upon the hearing of any matter in lunacy, but so long as the present Masters shall respectively hold office that duty shall be performed on their behalf by the chief clerk or such one of the clerks in the Masters' office as the Lord Chancellor may from time to time direct. Such one of the clerks in the Masters' office as the Lord Chancellor may from time to time direct shall be specially charged with the duty of drawing up Orders in Lunacy.

9. All petitions, affidavits, certificates, orders and other documents, which are by the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, or the Orders or practice in Lunacy hitherto in force required to be brought into or filed in the office of the Registrar in Lunacy shall be brought into or filed in the office of the Masters.

10. Such office copies of Orders in Lunacy and other documents as are made evidence by sections 100 and 101 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, and section 29 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1862, shall be signed by the Master acting as Registrar under these Orders, and stamped with the seal of the Registrar's office as heretofore.

11. The Masters shall be provided with an official stamp or seal for the authentication of Orders, certificates and other documents, and of amendments therein.

12. Office copies of Orders in Lunacy purporting to be signed by the Master acting as Registrar under these Orders, and stamped with the seal of his office, and office copies of certificates of the Masters purporting to be stamped with the seal of the Registrar's office, shall be acted upon by the Paymaster-General, and all other persons, and the Bank, in the same manner as heretofore. In the case of Orders in Lunacy for the sale, transfer or delivery of securities in Court, the Master acting as Registrar under these Orders shall certify under his hand what securities are to be sold, transferred or delivered, in pursuance of such Orders, but no certificate shall be issued except on the production of an office copy of the Order.

13. Orders made in lunacy only, drawn up by the Masters, shall not be required to be passed or entered with the Registrars of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice or of the Court of Appeal.

14. Rules 15 and 16 of the Chancery Funds Consolidated Rules, 1874, shall, so far as possible, extend to and include Orders in Lunacy to be acted on by the Paymaster-General, drawn up by the Masters, but the printing thereof shall be exclusively under the direction and control of the Masters, and such Orders shall be entered by the Master acting as Registrar under these Orders in the manner in which Orders in Lunacy are by the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, directed to be entered. In cases of urgency the Masters may issue Orders in writing to be acted on by the Paymaster-General.

15. An office copy of every Order in Lunacy to be acted on by the Paymaster-General when signed and sealed or stamped with the seal of the Registrar in Lunacy under these Orders, and an office copy of every Certificate of a Master to be acted on by the Paymaster-General, shall be transmitted by the Masters to the Chancery Audit Office.

16. The Masters may communicate personally with the Judge with regard to all matters referred to them or pending before them, and they shall, when requested so to do, attend the Judge to give any information or assistance he may require.

17. All matters not opposed which require to be brought before the Judge, other than petitions under the Trustee Acts, 1850 and 1852, shall be brought before the Judge out of Court. But the Judge may order any such matter to be adjourned into Court, or (if he shall think it necessary) to be brought before him on petition.

18. The Judge, when sitting in chambers, may direct any matter to be heard in open Court, and any matter may be adjourned from consideration in open Court into chambers.

Proceedings respecting the Inquisition.

19. The notice to an alleged lunatic of the presentation of a Petition for inquiry is to be by service on him of a copy of the Petition, with a notice thereon indorsed, signed by the Petitioner or his solicitor, in the form I. in the Schedule hereto, with such variations as circumstances may require.

20. The notice to an alleged lunatic of a Report of the Commissioners in Lunacy under section 54 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, is to be in the form II. in the Schedule hereto, with such variations as circumstances may require.

21. A notice under either of the two last preceding Orders is to be served on the alleged lunatic by being delivered to him personally, or where personal service cannot be effected, or it is inexpedient to effect personal service, then by being delivered to some adult inmate at the dwelling-house or usual or last known place of abode of the alleged lunatic within the jurisdiction, and an affidavit of service, stating particularly the time and place and mode of service, and where there has not been personal service, the grounds of such service not having been made, is to be filed with the Masters.

22. The notice to be given by an alleged lunatic for demanding a jury may be in the form III. in the Schedule hereto, with such variations as circumstances may require.

Proceedings after Inquisition.

23. All proceedings after inquisition found shall be commenced before the Masters. The mode of proceeding before the Masters shall be by summons, and all matters in respect of which the Masters are by the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, authorised to report, or to receive proposals, or to conduct enquiries, shall be brought before them by summons.

24. Summonses shall be prepared by the parties and sealed by one of the clerks in the Masters' office with the seal of the office, and a copy of the summons shall be left at the Masters' chambers by the party obtaining the same.

25. A summons before the Masters shall be served two clear days before the return thereof, unless the Masters shall direct the summons to be returnable within a shorter time after service. The summons shall be in the form IV. in the Schedule hereto, with such variations as circumstances require. It shall be addressed to all the persons on whom it is to be served.

26. When from any cause a summons before the Masters has not been served upon any party two clear days before the return thereof, or within such shorter time as the Masters may direct, an endorsement may be made upon the summons, and upon the copy thereof, stamped for service, appointing a new time for the parties not before served to attend, and such endorsements shall be sealed at the Masters' chambers; and the service of the copy so endorsed and sealed shall have the same force and effect as the service of an original summons; and when any party has been served before such endorsement, the hearing thereof may, upon the return of the summons, be adjourned to the new time so appointed.

27. Where any of the parties summoned to attend the Masters in chambers fail so to attend, whether upon the return of the summons or at any time appointed for the consideration or further consideration of the matter, the Masters may proceed ex parte, if, considering the nature of the case, they think it expedient so to do.

28. Where the Masters have proceeded ex parte, such proceeding shall not in any manner be reconsidered in the Masters' chambers, unless the Masters, upon a special application made to them for that purpose by a party who was absent, shall be satisfied that a reconsideration is necessary or expedient.

29. Where matters in respect of which a summons has been issued are not disposed of upon the return of the summons, the parties shall attend from time to time without further summons at such time or times as may be appointed for the further consideration of the matter.

30. Upon the return of any summons the Masters, if satisfied by proper evidence that all necessary parties have been served with notice of the summons, shall thereupon give directions as to the evidence to be adduced in support thereof, the parties who are to attend, and the time within which each proceeding is to be taken, and a day or days may be appointed for the further attendance of the parties, and all such directions may be varied or added to as may be found necessary.

31. The Masters may permit any person whose attendance may appear to them to be proper and for the advantage of the lunatic or his estate, other than the committee and next-of-kin of the lunatic, to attend the proceedings or any particular proceeding before them in the matter, and all the provisions contained in section 81 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, as to the attendance of next-of-kin are to extend and apply, mutatis mutandis, to the attendance of such person as aforesaid, as well before the Masters as before the Judge.

32. The Masters may direct that several parties appearing before them by different solicitors shall appear by the same solicitor, or that several parties appearing before them by the same solicitor shall appear by different solicitors. When parties directed to appear by the same solicitor cannot agree upon the solicitor to represent them, the Masters may nominate the solicitor, and when any one of such parties insists upon appearing by a different solicitor he shall do so at his own cost.

33. No summons shall be supported by a state of facts or proposal.

34. Immediately after inquisition found, the party having the conduct of the proceedings shall take out a summons before the Masters to enquire into the matters following:—

1. The lunatic's situation.
2. The nature of his lunacy.
3. Who are his next-of-kin and heir-at-law.
4. Who ought to be appointed committee of his person and of his estate.
5. Of what his fortune consists, and the particulars thereof.
6. The amount of his income.
7. In what manner, and at what expense, and by whom, and where, he has been maintained; what should be allowed for his past maintenance, what, if anything, is due, and to whom in respect thereof, and to whom and out of what fund the same ought to be paid.
8. What should be allowed for future maintenance, when the allowance ought to commence, and out of what fund it should be paid.

35. The Masters may, whenever they shall think proper, before the completion of the enquiries in the last preceding Order mentioned, certify whether it is expedient that an interim committee of the person and estate should be appointed, and who is the proper person to be so appointed.

36. The Masters may also, when it shall seem to them expedient, enquire what debts (if any) not open to dispute are due from the lunatic, and to whom and whether the same or any of them ought to be paid, and out of what funds or property, and they may entertain proposals for the settlement thereof and for the compromise of any disputed debt, claim or demand, against the lunatic or his estate.

37. The Masters may from time to time entertain applications and conduct enquiries touching any other matters affecting the property of the lunatic, whether real or personal.

38. The Masters may from time to time make such enquiries as they think fit respecting any dealings with the lunatic's estate and the application of the same prior to the date of the inquisition, and respecting the state and condition of the lunatic at the time of such dealings, whether a summons for any such enquiry be pending before them or not.

39. The result of enquiries before or by the Masters shall be stated in the shape of a certificate in the form V. in the Schedule hereto, with such variations as circumstances require. Such certificate shall state as concisely as possible the grounds of any recommendation and the circumstances relative thereto, when the nature of the case shall so require.

40. The Masters shall also prepare the minutes of the Order (if any) which, having regard to the findings of any certificate, they consider proper. Such order may be made on the certificate, and may be in the form in which the Order for confirming and carrying out the directions in a report are now made, merely substituting certificate for report.

41. The Masters may, on request or otherwise, make a separate certificate or state any matters specially with respect to the subject-matter of a certificate; and they may make a special certificate on any matter as they think fit, and they may prepare and submit to the Judge the minutes of the order (if any) which, having regard to any such certificate, they consider proper.

42. The Masters shall not, in any case, draw up any other form of report save as aforesaid, unless the Judge shall so direct.

43. Upon any application to the Masters for the exercise of the powers contained in that portion of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, which relates "to the management and administration of the estates of lunatics," the Masters shall consider the matter upon the evidence laid before them, and shall prepare the minutes of such Order as under the circumstances they consider proper, together with a short note signed by the Master explanatory of the grounds on which any special recommendation is made.

44. Every certificate and the minutes of every order, when prepared and settled, shall be signed by the Masters at an adjournment to be made for that purpose, unless the persons having liberty to attend shall consent to the signature of the certificate and minutes without any adjournment, in which case the Masters may, if they think fit, sign the certificate and minutes as soon as they are prepared and settled.

45. Any person objecting to a certificate (not being a certificate to be acted on without further order), or to the minutes of any order, shall be at liberty to take the opinion of the Judge thereon by summons to be issued within eight days after the signature by the Master of the certificate or minutes, and to be served eight clear days before the return thereof. Such summons shall be in the form VI. in the Schedule hereto, with such variations as circumstances require. It shall be addressed to all the persons on whom it is to be served.

46. If no summons shall have been taken out under the last preceding order, for the opinion of the Judge, upon a certificate (not being a certificate to be acted on without further order), or upon the minutes of an order, the same shall be submitted for confirmation by the Judge without attendance of parties.

47. Every certificate (not being a certificate to be acted on without further order), and the minutes of every order, if approved by the Judge, shall be signed by him at the expiration of eight days after signature by the Masters, or, if a summons for the opinion of the Judge shall have been taken out, then as soon as the summons shall have been heard and disposed of. Any certificate or order may with the consent of the persons having liberty to attend be signed by the Judge at any time before the expiration of eight days after signature by the Masters. A certificate or order, when signed by the Judge, shall thenceforth be binding on all the parties to the proceedings.

48. No certificate shall be brought before the Judge by petition, unless the Judge shall so direct.

49. The Committee of the Estate is annually, or at such longer or shorter periods as the Masters shall fix, to procure his accounts to be delivered into the Masters' office, and is to attend before the Masters from time to time and at or within such time as the Masters shall fix, and have his accounts taken and passed, and the Masters are to make to him all just allowances, including an allowance of his reasonable and proper costs, charges and expenses of passing the account, and those of the next-of-kin, and other persons (if any) allowed to attend on the passing of the account at the cost of the estate.

50. The balances certified by the Masters to be due from the Committee of the Estate on passing his accounts from time to time, or so much thereof respectively as the Masters certify to be proper to be paid by him, are, unless the Masters otherwise direct, to be paid by him, at or within such time as the Masters shall fix, into Court to the credit of the matter, and the same when paid in, and any sum of cash in Court to which the lunatic may be entitled, or so much thereof respectively as the Masters shall by their certificate direct, are, unless the Masters otherwise direct, from time to time, and within such time (if any) as the masters shall fix, to be laid out in the purchase of Consolidated, Reduced, or New 3*l.* per cent. Annuities, or in Bank stock, as the Masters may direct, to the like credit, and the dividends from time to time to accrue due on the Annuities and Stock so purchased, and all accumulations of dividends, are, unless the Masters shall otherwise certify, as and when the same amount to a competent sum, to be laid out in like manner without any request for the purpose.

51. Where the Committee of the Estate makes default in bringing in his account, or in having the same passed, or in paying the balance certified to be due from him, or in causing the same or any sum of cash in Court to be laid out pursuant to any certificate or direction in that behalf, the Masters are, unless good cause be shewn to them to the contrary, not only to disallow any salary claimed by him or his representatives, but also to charge him or them with interest after the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum upon any balance or cash for the time during which the same respectively appears to have been improperly retained in hand or uninvested.

52. The Committee of the Estate is on each occasion of passing his account, and also whensoever the Masters may so require, to satisfy the Masters that his sureties are living and that neither of them has been declared bankrupt, or has taken the benefit of the provisions of any Bankruptcy Act for the time being in force, and in default thereof the Masters are to require him to enter into fresh security within such time as they shall fix.

53. The security of the Committee of the Estate may from time to time be reduced on request to an amount corresponding in the judgment of the Masters with the condition for the time being of the estate and effects of the lunatic, and the dividends, interest and annual produce thereof, and he is to be at liberty to enter from time to time into fresh security accordingly to the approbation of the Masters. The Masters may from time to time require the security of the Committee of the estate to be increased if in their judgment the circumstances of the case render an increase of security desirable.

54. Every Order and every Certificate of the Masters for the purpose of a payment or transfer into or deposit in Court of money, stock, securities or other effects, shall direct such payment or transfer to be made into, and deposit to be made in Court to the credit and account (if any) to which it is intended that such money, stock, securities or other effects should be placed. The Masters may, if they think fit, direct that such money, stock, securities or other effects shall not be paid or transferred out without notice to such person as occasion may require and they may direct. No declaration of trust with respect to stock or securities transferred into Court to the credit of the matter of a lunatic shall be required to be made.

55. The Masters are from time to time in each of the cases following, without Special Order, to enquire and certify whether or not it is expedient that a Committee or a new Committee, as the case may be, of the Person or of the Estate should be appointed, and if so, who is the most fit person to be appointed; that is to say,

(1.) On default of a person approved to be Committee of the Estate in duly perfecting his security.

(2.) On default of a Committee of the Estate in duly perfecting a fresh security when required by the Masters.

(3.) On the death or discharge of a Committee, or one of several Committees, where the custody does not survive.

(4.) If a Committee becomes bankrupt or compounds with his creditors, or his affairs are liquidated by arrangement under any Act for the time being in force for the relief of insolvent debtors.

(5.) If a Committee absconds or goes to reside permanently abroad.

56. In certificates, Orders and other documents issued from or brought into the office of the Masters, numbers are to be denoted by figures, and not by words, except in affidavits, and the directions of certificates to be acted on by the Paymaster-General without further order and the ordering parts of Orders.

57. Any person in whose custody or control any will, codicil or testamentary paper of the lunatic may be is to be at liberty to deposit the same in the office of the Masters upon oath, as they may direct, there to remain for safe custody.

Proceedings under the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1862.

58. Applications in pursuance of the 12th, 13th and 15th sections of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1862, shall be made by Petition to the Lord Chancellor. The Petition shall be signed by the Petitioner and be attested by a solicitor, and may be in the form VII. in the Schedule hereto, with such variations as the case may require.

59. The notice to the alleged lunatic of the application for an Order, in pursuance of the said sections, shall be by service on him personally of a copy of the Petition, with a notice thereon indorsed, signed by the Petitioner or his solicitor in the form VIII. in the Schedule hereto, with such variations as the case may require. The notice is to be served on the alleged insane person by being delivered to him personally, and an affidavit of service stating particularly the time and place and mode of service is to be filed with the Masters.

60. The notice of objection to be given by the alleged lunatic may be in the form IX.

in the Schedule hereto, with such variations as the case may require.

61. The Petition and evidence shall be laid before one of the Masters, who shall prepare the minutes of the Order he thinks should be made thereon.

The Judge may, upon consideration of the Petition and the evidence in support thereof, and the minutes prepared by the Master, either make an Order thereon without any attendance of Counsel, Solicitors or parties, or direct that the Petition be set down for hearing, or may direct that the Petition and affidavits be referred to the Masters for further enquiry, either generally, or as to any particular matter to which the Petition relates.

62. In the case of a general reference to the Masters under the last preceding Order, they shall enquire as to the state of mind and condition of the alleged lunatic, and if they find that he is of unsound mind, and incapable of managing his affairs, they shall enquire as to the nature of his insanity, of what his fortune consists, and the amount of his income, and what should be allowed for maintenance, and out of what fund, and to whom the same should be paid. They may also enquire into any matter connected with the property or the maintenance of the lunatic or of his family, and as to any other matter material to be considered in reference to the order to be made on the Petition; and in making such enquiries the Masters may, if they think fit, visit the alleged insane person, or require him to be produced before them, as they may direct.

63. The Masters may, if they deem it expedient, for the better prosecution before them of any such reference as aforesaid, direct that notice of the proceedings be given to any of the next-of-kin of the insane person, or to any other person, and no other person than such as the Masters shall direct to be served with notice shall be entitled to attend on the reference before them.

64. The Masters shall state the result of the enquiries before them, upon any reference under the last preceding Orders, by certificate, and shall prepare the minutes of the order which they consider proper to be made in pursuance of such enquiries in the same way, and the same practice shall be followed in settling such certificate and minutes, and bringing the same before the Judge, and for raising and determining any objections thereto, as in the case of certificates made and minutes of orders prepared by the Masters in the matter of a lunatic so found by inquisition.

65. In all cases not otherwise herein specially provided for, the provisions of these Orders relating to lunatics so found by inquisition and the other general provisions of these Orders shall apply to proceedings under the 12th, 13th and 15th sections of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1862.

Visitors of Lunatics.

66. Lunatics so found by inquisition shall be visited by the Visitors in Lunacy at least twice in every year, provided that every such lunatic, if resident in a private house, shall during the two years next following the date of inquisition be so visited at least four times in every year.

67. The Masters in Lunacy shall from time to time furnish the Visitors of Lunatics with abstracts of their certificates as to the fortune, income and maintenance of each lunatic to be visited by the Visitors, and of the orders made upon such certificates, and shall inform the Visitors of any increase which may have accrued in the fortune and of any change which may have been made in the allowance or scheme for the maintenance of the lunatic, so that the Visitors may at all times be fully acquainted with the amount of the fortune and income of every lunatic to be visited by them, and with the scheme approved and the allowance made for his maintenance.

68. The Visitors of Lunatics shall on each occasion of visiting any lunatic inquire and examine whether he is maintained in a suitable and proper manner, having regard to the existing amount of the allowance ordered to be paid and the existing scheme approved for his maintenance, and also whether, having regard to his fortune and income, it appears expedient that any and what addition should be made to his comforts, or any and what alterations made in the scheme for or manner of his maintenance.

69. If the Visitors shall on such enquiry and examination consider that the lunatic is not maintained in a suitable manner, or that the allowance provided for his maintenance is not duly applied, or that any provision in the scheme for his maintenance, either for his personal comfort or enjoyment, or otherwise, is not duly observed, or that any addition to the comforts or any alteration in the manner of the maintenance of the lunatic should be made which his fortune or income is capable of providing, they shall forthwith make a special report, stating their opinion and the grounds thereof to the Board of Visitors.

70. The Board of Visitors shall proceed to consider the report of the Visitors at their next meeting, and shall, if they think fit, refer the same to the Masters, to take such steps thereon as may appear to them to be expedient.

71. The Masters shall, on any such report as aforesaid being referred to them by the Board of Visitors, proceed to investigate the matters thereby reported upon, and may, if they deem it expedient, summon the Committee of the person or estate to attend before them, to give explanations thereon, and the Masters may, if they shall think fit, certify the result of their investigations to the Judge, and prepare the minutes of such order in the matter as they may deem proper.

72. The Visitors shall once at least in every year report to the Lord Chancellor in the case of each lunatic, stating the result of their examination and enquiry as to the maintenance of each lunatic, and shall also in any case in which any special report to the Board of Visitors has been made, state, so far as possible, what steps have been taken in consequence of such special report.

Costs and Taxation of Costs.

73. Solicitors shall in matters in which the income of a person who is alleged or found to be lunatic exceeds 200*l.* per annum be allowed the fees according to the "Higher Scale," and in all other cases the fees according to the "Lower Scale," appointed by the Rules of the Supreme Court as to costs for the time being in force so far as the same shall be applicable to such matters, unless the Judge shall otherwise order as to all or any of the parties to such matters.

74. The Masters shall be at liberty, by memorandum in writing, to allow to a solicitor for attending on any summons or appointment before them such a sum, not exceeding five guineas, as, having regard to the special nature of the case, they may think reasonable.

75. Where the Masters shall not have made and shall not have refused to make any such allowance as last above-mentioned, the Taxing Master shall take into consideration the circumstances of each case and allow to a solicitor for attending any summons or other appointment such a sum, not exceeding three guineas, as he may at his discretion think reasonable.

76. In all cases not otherwise herein specially provided for, solicitors shall be entitled to charge and be allowed the fees they would be entitled to charge and be allowed for work and labour of a similar character transacted in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice.

77. Where it is ordered that any costs, or costs, charges and expenses, be taxed, the Taxing Master of the Chancery Division in rotation, or the Taxing Master to whom the taxation of costs in the matter stands referred (as the case may be), is to tax and certify such costs, or costs, charges and expenses, and also to certify the names of the respective solicitors to whom the same should be paid; and due notice of attending the Taxing Master on the taxation is to be given to such parties as the Masters shall have certified are to attend on the proceedings in the matter; and where it is ordered that the costs, charges and expenses of any committee or next-of-kin in the matter of any lunacy be taxed, the Taxing Master, in taxing such costs, charges and expenses, is not to allow the costs, charges or expenses of any petition or application upon which no order shall have been drawn up, or of any evidence in relation thereto, unless the same shall by any order be directed to be allowed or ordered to be costs in the matter of such lunacy, nor to allow the costs, charges or expenses of or incidental to any proposal or enquiry before the Masters which they shall have disallowed or not thought fit to adopt or carry into effect, unless the Masters shall have certified that such proposal or enquiry was proper.

Construction of Proceedings under Orders.

78. Where any matter is referred to, or is directed or permitted to be done by or before the Masters, it is to be considered to be referred to them jointly and severally, and may be done by or before them or either of them, but all matters in the same lunacy shall, so far as convenient, be conducted before the same Master.

79. All Orders for the appointment of Committees and for the allowance of maintenance are to be deemed to take effect only until further order.

80. Where it is ordered that a person named be appointed Committee of the Estate, the order is to be deemed to take effect only on the Masters certifying that he has given such security as they have approved for answering the estate and accounting for the rents, profits and produce thereof, once in every year, or oftener, if thereunto required, before the Masters; and such security is to be perfected at or within such time as the Masters may appoint, and until such security shall have been perfected, the approved Committee is not to interfere in any manner in the affairs of the lunatic as the Committee of his Estate or otherwise.

81. Where it is ordered that a person named be appointed Receiver of the Estate, or the Masters are directed to appoint a receiver thereof, they are to allow him a reasonable salary for his care and pains in the management of the Estate, he first giving security, to be allowed by the Masters, and taken before a Commissioner to administer oaths in the Supreme Court of Judicature in the country, if there shall be occasion, duly and annually to account for what he shall receive, and to pay the same as he shall be directed. The tenants of the lunatic's estates are to attorn and pay their rents in arrear and growing rents to the Receiver, who is to be at liberty to let and set the estates from time to time, with the approbation of the Masters, as there shall be occasion.

82. Where it is ordered that the Committee of the Estate do receive, or be at liberty to receive, any money on account of the lunatic or his estate, he is to give credit for the same on passing his accounts before the Masters, and where any sum is ordered to be allowed for the maintenance of the lunatic, or to be expended for any other purpose out of his estate, the Committee of the estate is to be allowed the amount of the allowance for maintenance or the amount to be expended (as the case may be) on passing his accounts before the Masters.

83. Where it is ordered that the Committee of the Estate do pay any sums of money for maintenance, he is to pay the same out of income, and where it is ordered that he do pay any costs, he is to pay the same, when taxed, out of any moneys coming to his hands, after providing for the maintenance.

84. Where it is ordered that the Committee of the Estate or the person be at liberty to retain any furniture or effects of the lunatic, he is to sign an inventory thereof and an undertaking to deliver up the same when required so to do, and such inventory and undertaking are to be deposited in the office of the Masters.

85. Where it is ordered that the Committee of the Estate be discharged, the Masters are to take and pass his account of his receipts and payments for and on account of the lunatic and his estate from his appointment or from the foot of his last account passed in the matter up to the day of the date of the order, and the balance (if any) which the Masters may certify to be due from the Committee on passing the aforesaid account is to be paid by him by virtue of the certificate into court to such credit and within such time as the Masters shall by their certificate direct; and in case the Masters shall find a balance to be due to the discharged Committee, the same is to be paid to him by the new Committee of the Estate out of the estate of the lunatic; and upon payment of the aforesaid balance (if any) by the discharged Committee in manner aforesaid, or in case there shall not be a balance found due from him, or in case the taking and passing of the account is not required, and may in the opinion of the Masters be properly dispensed with, then his security is to be discharged.

86. Where the Committee of the Estate dies, the Masters are to take and pass the account of his receipts and payments for and on account of the lunatic and his estate from his appointment or from the foot of his last account passed in the matter up to the day of his death. And the balance (if any) which the Masters may certify to be due from the late Committee on passing the aforesaid account may be paid by his legal personal representatives by virtue of the certificate into Court to such credit and within such time as the Masters shall by their certificate direct. And in case the Masters shall find a balance to be due to the late Committee, the same is to be paid to his legal personal representatives by the new Committee of the Estate, out of the estate of the lunatic, and upon payment of the aforesaid balance (if any) by the legal personal representatives of the late Committee in manner aforesaid, or in case there shall not be a balance found due from him, or in case the taking and passing of the account is not required, and may in the opinion of the Masters be properly dispensed with, then his security is to be discharged.

87. Where a supersedeas is issued, the Masters are to take and pass the account of the Committee of the Estate of his receipts and payments for and on account of the lunatic and his estate from his appointment or from the foot of his last account passed in the matter, up to the day of the date of the order of supersedeas. And the balance (if any) which the Masters may certify to be due from the Committee on passing the aforesaid account, is to be paid by him to the lunatic. And in case the masters shall find a balance to be due to the Committee, the same is to be paid to him by the lunatic and upon payment of the aforesaid balance (if any) by the Committee in manner aforesaid, or in case there shall not be a balance found due from him, or in case the taking and passing of the account is not required, then his security is to be discharged, and due notice of attending the Masters is to be given to the lunatic.

88. Where a lunatic dies, the Masters are to take and pass the account of the Committee of the Estate of his receipts and payments for and on account of the late lunatic and his estate from his appointment or from the foot of his last account passed in the matter up to the day of the decease of the late lunatic, and the balance (if any) which the Masters may certify to be due from the Committee on passing the aforesaid account, is to be paid by him to the legal personal representatives of the late lunatic, to be by them applied in a due course of administration, and upon payment of the aforesaid balance (if any) by the Committee in the manner aforesaid, or in case there shall not be a balance found due from the Committee, or in case the taking and passing of the account is not required and may in the opinion of the Masters be properly dispensed with, then his security is to be discharged.

89. Where a Committee enters into a fresh security upon the same being duly perfected, and upon the balance then due by the Committee being paid or secured to the satisfaction of the Masters, the security theretofore in force is to be discharged.

90. Where under or in pursuance of these Orders, or any special order, the security of a Committee of the Estate or Receiver is to be discharged, then, in the case of a bond, the Masters are to deliver up the same to be vacated and cancelled, and in the case of a recognisance the Masters are by certificate to direct the clerk of the Enrolments Department of the Central Office to attend the Master of the Rolls, with the enrolment of the recognisance to be vacated and discharged, and such clerk is by virtue of such certificate to attend accordingly; and in the case of security having been given in the whole or in part by a sum of money or stock being brought into Court, the Masters are to prepare the draft of an order for the payment or transfer in such manner as the Committee or Receiver may request and as may seem proper of the sum of money or stock so brought in as aforesaid, and of all stocks, dividends and accumulations of dividends produced by or arising from the same, and on such order being confirmed by the Judge, such payment or transfer is to be made accordingly.

91. On the death of a lunatic or a supersedeas being issued, the Masters are to ascertain and certify who is entitled to receive the several deeds, securities, bonds, papers, effects and things relating to or forming part of the estate and property of the lunatic remaining deposited in their office for safe custody, and they are to prepare the minutes of an order for payment or delivery of the same to the person entitled thereto, and the Judge may, without the attendance of parties, make an order for payment or delivery to the person certified to be so entitled.

92. Where it is ordered that a sum of stock standing in the books of the bank or other public company be transferred into Court either generally or on a particular account, and no person is named in the order for making the transfer, the Secretary or Deputy Secretary, Accountant-General, or Deputy Accountant-General for the time being of the bank, or other proper officer of such other company, is to make the transfer, and he, or one of the cashiers for the time being of the bank, or other such proper officer as aforesaid, is, if so directed, to receive any sum of money standing in the books of the bank or such other company as aforesaid accrued due at the date of the Order by way of dividend, bonus or periodical payment, in respect of the stock to be transferred, and also any future sum so to accrue due previously to the transfer, and is to pay the same into Court either generally or on such particular account as aforesaid, as the case may require.

93. Where it is ordered that the Paymaster-General or any other person or any company or body do pay or be at liberty to pay any sum or sums of money, dividend, bonus or periodical payments, or deliver any effects to the Committee of the Estate, the order is not to take effect unless and until the Masters shall have certified that he has perfected his security.

94. Where an order is made approving an agreement for a lease of a lunatic's property, the Masters shall settle a proper lease in pursuance of the order, and shall sign their allowance of the lease when settled, and the Committee of the Estate shall, in the name and on behalf of the lunatic, execute the lease when allowed, upon the intending lessee executing a counterpart thereof.

95. Where it is ordered that the Committee be at liberty to raise by mortgage of any part of the lunatic's estate a sum of money for any purpose, the Masters are to settle and approve a proper mortgage, and the committee upon payment to him, or as may be directed, of the amount to be raised, is in the name and on the behalf of the lunatic to execute the mortgage when so settled and approved, and to do all such other acts as shall be necessary to effectuate the same, and the committee is out of the rents, profits and produce of the lunatic's estates to pay and keep down the interest on the mortgage.

96. Where an order for the sale of a lunatic's real or leasehold estate is made, the purchaser shall within such time as the Masters shall appoint, pay his purchase-money into Court to the credit of the matter to such account (if any) or otherwise as the Masters may appoint, and upon such payment, the purchaser shall be let into possession or receipt of the rents and profits as from such day as the Masters appoint, and the Committee of the Estate shall forthwith in the name and on behalf of the lunatic execute all proper assurances of the property sold to the purchaser, or as he shall direct to be settled by the Masters, and due notice of attending the Masters is to be given to all parties interested.

Stamps and Percentage.

97. The stamps to be used under the Lunacy Regulation Acts, 1853 and 1862, shall be the same as those for the time being in use under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875. Impressed stamps shall be used, unless for some sufficient reason to be approved by the Masters their use be inconvenient. The stamps are to be impressed or affixed on the vellum, parchment or paper, on which the proceeding in respect whereof such stamps shall be required is written or engrossed, or which may otherwise be used in reference to such proceeding.

98. Every officer who shall receive any document to which a stamp is affixed, shall immediately upon the receipt of such document cancel or deface the stamp thereon by writing upon such stamp his name or the initial letters of his name in such a manner as to shew clearly and distinctly that such stamp has been made use of and so that the same may not be again used, and no document bearing an adhesive stamp shall be filed or delivered out until the stamp thereon shall have been cancelled or defaced in manner aforesaid.

99. In all cases where adhesive stamps are used, the stamps affixed to the document shall be of an amount corresponding as nearly as is practicable with the amount of the stamp which such document requires, in order that no greater number of adhesive stamps may be affixed to any document than is actually necessary.

100. The Masters may from time to time in such cases as they think fit, certify that the whole or any part of the percentage payable on the incomes of lunatics is to be paid out of cash arising from dividends of the lunatic that may be standing to the credit of the matter of any lunacy either generally or to any particular account, and when any such certificate is made, the amount certified thereby shall not be paid by means of stamps, but shall be carried over and transferred in manner hereinafter directed.

101. In each of the divisions of the Paymaster-General's office, there shall be kept an account intituled "The Paymaster-General's Lunacy Percentage Account."

102. When any such certificate as last hereinbefore mentioned is made, an office copy of such certificate is to be left at the office of the Paymaster-General, who is by virtue of such certificate when so left, out of any cash arising from dividends or interest on money on deposit belonging to the lunatic standing to the credit of the matter of any lunacy, to carry over the amount mentioned in such certificate from the credit of the account in such certificate mentioned to the credit of the Lunacy Percentage Account in that division of his office in which the account is kept, to the credit of which such cash shall be standing, and any orders made and to be made in any such matters respectively, are to be subject to this Order and to be acted upon accordingly.

103. As soon as conveniently may be after the 31st January, in each year, the Paymaster-General shall, by certificate under his hand, direct the Bank to transfer to his "Cash account" at the Bank the amount of cash standing on that day to the credit of the Lunacy Percentage Account in each of the divisions of the Paymaster's office, and such certificate shall be a good and sufficient authority to the Bank to write off the amount therein mentioned from the Lunacy Percentage Account, and to carry it to the "Cash Account," as aforesaid, without any further order of the Court, and upon receiving from the Bank a certificate that such transfer has been effected, the amount so transferred shall be placed to the debit of the proper accounts in the books of the Paymaster-General.

104. Subject to the provisions hereinbefore contained, the percentage is to be paid by means of stamps, and the chief clerk to the Masters is from time to time to give notice in writing to the Committee of the estate or other proper person of the amount of percentage to be paid by him according to the certificate of the Masters under section 27 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, and of the time within which such amount is to be paid, which time is to be fixed by the Masters and mentioned in their certificate, and the Committee or other person is within such time to pay the amount stated in the notice out of the income of the lunatic by purchasing stamps to such amount and to file such notice duly stamped at the office of the Masters.

105. Where it appears to the Masters with a view to the establishment of a uniform period for the payment of percentage in the several matters in lunacy, or for other purposes to be expedient, they may make in any case a certificate comprising the income of a period greater or less than one year, and stating the amount of percentage payable for such period, calculated according to the scale provided by the General Order in Lunacy dated the 3rd August, 1876.

106. The Masters are once at least in every six months and oftener if they shall think fit, to certify the names of all persons, if any, who shall then be in default in paying the amount certified to be payable by them in respect of the said percentage and filing the notices duly stamped as hereinbefore provided, with the amounts payable by such parties respectively.

107. The foregoing Orders respecting percentage shall extend and be applied to the property of lunatics, under the protection of the Judge, by virtue of proceedings under the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100. s. 95, and also to the property of lunatics under the protection of the Judge, by virtue of the transmission of the record of an inquisition from Ireland and its entry of record in England, except in respect of income arising from property of such persons not within the jurisdiction of the Judge, nor administered under his authority; and the several foregoing Orders as to fees shall extend and apply to all the proceedings in the matter of such lunatics as aforesaid, and in the matter of any persons residing out of England and Wales, and declared idiot, lunatic or of unsound mind, according to the laws of the place where they are residing, where the Judge makes an order affecting the stock or any portion of the capital, stock or shares of such person as last aforesaid, or the dividends thereof.

Copies of Documents.

108. Office copies, and other copies of proceedings and documents in matters in lunacy shall be counted and charged for at the rate of 72 words per folio, every figure comprised in a column being counted as one word.

109. The following copies of proceedings and documents in matters in lunacy shall be made by the officers in the Masters' office (that is to say): office copies of affidavits to be made for and taken by the party filing the same; copies of documents prepared in the offices of the Masters in Lunacy to be made for and taken by the party having the conduct of the proceedings; office copies of all certificates, orders and other documents, and of all proceedings filed in lunacy; and copies of all documents filed or deposited for safe custody in the office of the Masters in Lunacy. Copies of all proceedings and documents in matters in lunacy, except those above-mentioned, shall be made, delivered, charged and paid for according to the following Orders.

110. The party or his solicitor, requiring any copy, save as hereinbefore excepted, is to make a written application, to be delivered to the party by whom the copy is to be furnished, or his solicitor, with an undertaking to pay the proper charges.

111. Upon the requisition being made, with such undertaking as aforesaid, copies of such proceedings or documents are to be made by the party or his solicitor filing or leaving the same, or who, under Rule 109, may have taken office copies thereof.

112. The copies are to be ready to be delivered at the expiration of forty-eight hours after the delivery of such request and undertaking, or within such other time as the Judge may in any case direct, and are to be delivered accordingly upon demand and payment of the proper charges.

113. The charges for all such copies are to be at the rate of fourpence per folio.

114. Copies of bills of costs are to be made side by side, so as to correspond with the bills of costs left for taxation.

115. The folios of all copies are to be numbered consecutively in the margin thereof, and the name and address of the party or solicitor by whom the same are made is to be endorsed thereon, and such party or solicitor is to be answerable for the same being true copies of the originals or of the office copies of the originals of which they respectively purport to be copies, as the case may be.

116. Any party or solicitor who has taken any office copy mentioned in Order 109 is to produce the same in Court or at the office of the Masters in Lunacy, when required for the purpose of the proceedings to which the same relate.

117. All office copies and copies to be furnished by parties or their solicitors, shall be written on paper of a convenient size, with a sufficient margin, and in a neat and legible manner, similar to that which is usually adopted by law stationers, and in the case of copies to be furnished by parties or their solicitors, unless so written, the parties or solicitors furnishing them shall not be entitled to be paid for the same.

118. In case any solicitor who shall be required to furnish any such copy as aforesaid shall either refuse or, for two clear days from the time when the application for such copy shall have been made, shall neglect to furnish the same, the person by whom such application shall have been made shall be at liberty to procure a copy from the office in which the original document shall be or shall have been filed or left in the same way as if no such application had been made to the solicitor, and in such case no costs shall be due or payable to the solicitor so making default in respect of the copy or copies so applied for.

119. The Taxing Masters shall not allow any costs in respect of any copy so taken as aforesaid, unless the same shall appear to them to have been requisite and to have been made with due care.

120. These Orders shall come into operation on the 1st day of February, 1883.

121. These Orders may be cited as "The Lunacy Orders, 1883."

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE.

GENERAL ORDER

MADE IN PURSUANCE OF

THE SOLICITORS' REMUNERATION ACT, 1881

(44 & 45 VICT. c. 44).

WE, the Right Honourable Roundell Baron Selborne, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, the Right Honourable John Duke, Lord Coleridge, Lord Chief Justice of England, the Right Honourable Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, and Enoch Harvey, Esq., President of the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool (being four of the persons in that behalf authorised by the Statute 44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), do hereby, in pursuance and execution of the powers given to us by the said Statute, and of all other powers and authorities enabling us in that behalf, order and direct in manner following:—

1. This Order is to take effect from and after the 31st day of December, 1882, except that Schedule I. hereto shall not apply to transactions respecting real property, the title to which has been registered under the Acts of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 53, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 67, and 38 & 39 Vict. c. 87.

2. Subject to the exception aforesaid, the remuneration of a solicitor in respect of business connected with sales, purchases, leases, mortgages, settlements and other matters of conveyancing, and in respect of other business, not being business in any action, or transacted in any court, or in the chambers of any Judge or Master, is to be regulated as follows, namely:—

(a.) In respect of sales, purchases and mortgages completed, the remuneration of the solicitor having the conduct of the business whether for the vendor, purchaser, mortgagor or mortgagee, is to be that prescribed in Part I. of Schedule I. to this Order, and to be subject to the regulations therein contained.

(b.) In respect of leases, and agreements for leases, of the kinds mentioned in Part II. of Schedule I. to this Order, or conveyances reserving rent, or agreements for the same, when the transactions shall have been completed, the remuneration of the solicitor having the conduct of the business is to be that prescribed in Part II. of such Schedule I.

(c.) In respect of business not hereinbefore provided for, connected with any transaction the remuneration for which, if completed, is hereinbefore, or in Schedule I. hereto, prescribed, but which is not, in fact, completed, and in respect of settlements, mining leases or licenses, or agreements therefor, re-conveyances, transfers of mortgage, or further charges, not provided for hereinbefore or in Schedule I. hereto, assignments of leases not by way of purchase or mortgage, and in respect of all other deeds or documents, and of all other business the remuneration for which is not hereinbefore, or in Schedule I. hereto, prescribed, the remuneration is to be regulated according to the present system as altered by Schedule II. hereto.

3. Drafts and copies made in the course of business, the remuneration for which is provided for by this Order, are to be the property of the client.

4. The remuneration prescribed by Schedule I. to this Order is not to include stamps, counsel's fees, auctioneer's or valuer's charges, travelling or hotel expenses, fees paid on searches to public officers, on registrations, or to stewards of manors, costs of extracts from any register, record or roll, or other disbursement reasonably and properly paid, nor any extra work occasioned by changes occurring in the course of any business, such as the death or insolvency of a party to the transaction, nor is it to include any business of a contentious character, nor any proceedings in any Court, but it shall include law stationer's charges, and allowances for time of the solicitor and his clerks, and for copying and parchment, and all other similar disbursements.

5. In respect of any business which is required to be, and is, by special exertion, carried through in an exceptionally short space of time, a solicitor may be allowed a proper additional remuneration for the special exertion, according to the circumstances.

6. In all cases to which the scales prescribed in Schedule I. hereto shall apply, a solicitor may, before undertaking any business, by writing under his hand communicated to the client, elect that his remuneration shall be according to the present system as altered by Schedule II. hereto; but if no such election shall be made, his remuneration shall be according to the scale prescribed by this Order.

7. A solicitor may accept from his client, and a client may give to his solicitor, security for the amount to become due to the solicitor for business to be transacted by him, and for interest on such amount, but so that interest is not to commence till the amount due is ascertained, either by agreement or taxation. A solicitor may charge interest at four per cent. per annum on his disbursements and costs, whether by scale or otherwise, from the expiration of one month from demand from the client. And in cases where the same are payable by an infant, or out of a fund not presently available, such demand may be made on the parent or guardian, or the trustee or other person liable.

8. In this Order, and the Schedules hereto, the following words and expressions shall have the meaning ascribed to them in the 3rd sub-section of section 1 of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, namely :—

Solicitor, Client, Person.

RULES.

1. The commission for deducing title and perusing and completing conveyance on a sale by auction is to be chargeable on each lot of property, except that where a property held under the same title is divided into lots for convenience of sale, and the same purchaser buys several such lots and takes one conveyance, and only one abstract is delivered, the commission is to be chargeable upon the aggregate prices of the lots.

2. The commission on an attempted sale by auction in lots is to be chargeable on the aggregate of the reserved prices. When property offered for sale by auction is bought in and terms of sale are afterwards negotiated and arranged by the solicitor, he is to be entitled to charge commission according to the above scales on the reserved price where the property is not sold, and also one-half of the commission for negotiating the sale. When property is bought in and afterwards offered by auction by the same solicitor, he is only to be entitled to the scale for the first attempted sale, and for each subsequent sale ineffectually attempted, he is to charge according to the present system, as altered by Schedule II. hereto. In case of a subsequent effectual sale by auction, the full commission for an effectual sale is to be chargeable in addition, less one-half of the commission previously allowed on the first attempted sale. The provisions of this Rule as to commission on sales or attempted sales by auction are to be subject to Rule 2.

3. Where a solicitor is concerned for both mortgagor and mortgagee, he is to be entitled to charge the mortgagee's solicitor's charges and one-half of those which would be allowed to the mortgagor's solicitor up to £5,000 and on any excess above £5,000, one-fourth thereof.

4. If a solicitor peruses a draft on behalf of several parties having distinct interests, proper to be separately represented, he is to be entitled to charge £2 additional for each such party after the first.

5. Where a party, other than the vendor or mortgagor, joins in a conveyance or mortgage, and is represented by a separate solicitor, the charges of such separate solicitor are to be dealt with under the old system as altered by Schedule II. hereto.

6. Where a conveyance and mortgage of the same property are completed at the same time, and are prepared by the same solicitor, he is to be entitled to charge only half the above fees for investigating title, and preparing the mortgage deed up to £5,000, and, on any excess above £5,000, one-fourth thereof, in addition to his full charges upon the purchase-money and his commissions for negotiating (if any).

7. Fractions of £100, under £50, are to be reckoned as £50. Fractions of £100, above £50, are to be reckoned as £100.

8. Where the prescribed remuneration would, but for this provision, amount to less than £5, the prescribed remuneration shall be £5, except on transactions under £100, in which cases the remuneration of the solicitor for the vendor, purchaser, mortgagor or mortgagee, is to be £3.

9. Where a property is sold subject to incumbrances, the amount of the incumbrances is to be deemed a part of the purchase-money, except where the mortgagee purchases, in which case the charge of his solicitor shall be calculated upon the price of the equity of redemption.

10. The above scale as to mortgages is to apply to transfers of mortgages where the title is investigated, but not to transfers where the title was investigated by the same solicitor on the original mortgage or on any previous transfer; and it is not to apply to further charges where the title has been so previously investigated. As to such transfers and further charges the remuneration is to be regulated according to the present system as altered by Schedule II. hereto. But the scale for negotiating the loan shall be chargeable on such transfers and further charges where it is applicable.

11. The scale for conducting a sale by auction shall apply only in cases where no commission is paid by the client to an auctioneer. The scale for negotiating shall apply to cases where the solicitor of a vendor or purchaser arranges the sale or purchase and the price and terms and conditions thereof, and no commission is paid by the client to an auctioneer, or estate or other agent. As to a mortgagee's solicitor it shall only apply to cases where he arranges and obtains the loan from a person for whom he acts. In case of sales under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, or any other private or public Act under which the vendor's charges are paid by the purchaser, the scale shall not apply.

12. In cases where, under the previous portion of this Schedule, a solicitor would be entitled to charge a commission for negotiating a sale or mortgage, or for conducting a sale by auction, and he shall not charge such commission, then he shall be entitled to charge the rates allowed by the first column on all transactions up to £2,000, and to charge in addition those allowed by the second column on all amounts above £2,000, and not exceeding £5,000, and further to charge those allowed by the third column on all amounts above £5,000, and not exceeding £50,000, instead of the rates allowed up to the amounts mentioned in those columns respectively.

PART II.

Scale of Charges as to Leases, or Agreements for Leases, at Rack Rent (other than a Mining Lease, or a Lease for Building Purposes, or Agreement for the same).

Lessor's solicitor for preparing, settling and completing lease and counterpart:—

Where the rent does not exceed £100	£7 10*s.* per cent. on the rental, but not less in any case than £5.
Where the rent exceeds £100 and does not exceed £500	£7 10*s.* in respect of the first £100 of rent, and £2 10*s.* in respect of each subsequent £100 of rent.
Where the rent exceeds £500	£7 10*s.* in respect of the first £100 of rent, £2 10*s.* in respect of each £100 of rent up to £500, and £1 in respect of every subsequent £100.
Lessee's solicitor for perusing draft and completing	One-half of the amount payable to the lessor's solicitor.

Scale of Charges as to Conveyances in Fee, or for any other Freehold Estate, Reserving Rent, or Building Leases Reserving Rent, or other Long Leases not at Rack Rent (except Mining Leases) or agreements, for the same respectively.

Vendor's or lessor's solicitor for preparing, settling and completing conveyance and duplicate, or lease and counterpart:—

Amount of Annual Rent	Amount of Remuneration
Where it does not exceed £5	£5.
Where it exceeds £5 and does not exceed £50	The same payment as on a rent of £5, and also 20 per cent. on the excess beyond £5.
Where it exceeds £50 but does not exceed £150	The same payment as on a rent of £50, and 10 per cent. on the excess beyond £50.
Where it exceeds £150	The same payment as on a rent of £150, and 5 per cent. on the excess beyond £150.

Where a varying rent is payable, the amount of annual rent is to mean the largest amount of annual rent.

Purchaser's or lessee's solicitor for perusing draft and completing	One half of the amount payable to the vendor's or lessor's solicitor.

RULES APPLICABLE TO PART II. OF SCHEDULE I.

As to all Leases, or Conveyances at a Rent or Agreements for the same, other than Mining Leases and Agreements therefor.

1. Where the vendor or lessor furnishes an abstract of title, it is to be charged for according to the present system as altered by Schedule II.

2. Where a solicitor is concerned for both vendor and purchaser, or lessor and lessee, he is to charge the vendor's or lessor's solicitor's charges and one-half of that of the purchaser's or lessee's solicitor.

3. Where a mortgagee or mortgagor joins in a conveyance or lease, the vendor's or lessor's solicitor is to charge 1*l.* 1*s.* extra.

4. Where a party other than a vendor or lessor joins in a conveyance or lease, and is represented by a separate solicitor, the charges of such separate solicitor are to be dealt with under the old system as altered by Schedule II.

5. Where a conveyance or lease is partly in consideration of a money payment or premium, and partly of a rent, then, in addition to the remuneration hereby prescribed in respect of the rent, there shall be paid a further sum equal to the remuneration on a purchase at a price equal to such money payment or premium.

6. Fractions of 5*l.* are to be reckoned as 5*l.*

SCHEDULE II.

BIGGS v. PEACOCK.

Will—Trust for Sale—Beneficiaries all sui juris—Partition Action—Demurrer—The Partition Act, 1868, s. 4.

A testator directed his trustees to sell his copyhold estates "at such times and in such manner as they or he should think fit," and to stand possessed of the proceeds of sale upon the usual trusts for the benefit of his wife for life and after her decease for his children on attaining twenty-one or marriage. All the children were sui juris. Three of them and the tenant-for-life desired, and the other three opposed, a partition:—Held (affirming BACON, V.C.), that the Partition Act did not apply, that the trust for sale was still operative, and that the Court would not interfere.

This was an appeal from a decision of Bacon, V.C., reported 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 555, holding that the 4th section of the Partition Act, 1868, did not empower the Court to direct a sale at the instance of a tenant-for-life and three of the reversioners, all sui juris and beneficially interested to the extent of a moiety, if by so doing a discretionary power of sale given to trustees is interfered with.

Russell Roberts, for the appellants.—The parties here are all sui juris, and the power of sale given by the testator has expired. I admit that if the power is exercisable then the Partition Act does not apply.

[JESSEL, M.R.—This is a trust for sale, not a power.]

I submit the same considerations apply.

[JESSEL, M.R.—If there is a trust for sale any party equitably entitled has a right to require a sale by the trustee and a distribution of the proceeds. COTTON, L.J.—Of course, if all the parties agree to say, "We will have the property as it is," then they can call for a conveyance.]

I submit that in principle there is no difference between a trust and a power of sale when all the parties are sui juris and the period of distribution has arrived—Peters v. The Lewes and East Grinstead

Biggs v. Peacock, App.

Railway Company (1). The ratio decidendi in Taylor v. Grange (2) is in my favour.

[JESSEL, M.R.—Are you within the Partition Act at all? You must shew that you could have had partition before the Act. How can you when the tenant-for-life is alive?]

The tenant-for-life here desires, and is willing to concur in a partition. But if the case is not within the Act, the parties can nevertheless call for the legal estate with the concurrence of the tenant-for-life. Unless there are active trusts or powers to be performed the Court will not compel performance of trusts or powers—Trower v. Knightley (3), Lantsbery v. Collier (4), Doncaster v. Doncaster (5) and In re Cotton's Trustees (6).

F. T. Procter, for the respondents, was not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R., said—This is a case of a trust for sale created by the will of a testator in the usual way. He directs the trustees to sell the property, to invest the proceeds, and to pay the income to his wife for her life, and after her death the trustees are to stand possessed of the trust property for his children on attaining twenty-one. It is said that this is not an enforceable trust, because all the children are now sui juris. But it is enforceable. Any child has a right to have that trust carried out by a sale and distribution of the proceeds among them. It is not like a power of sale at all. Of course if all the devisees are of age and agree to extinguish the trust they can call for a conveyance to themselves. Here, there never was a right in any of the devisees to require a partition. The case is not within the Partition Act at all. The appeal must be dismissed.

COTTON, L.J., said—I am of the same opinion. The cases in which it has been considered whether a power of sale has come to an end are very different from this case. Here there is a trust for sale, and the very object of that trust is to enable the trustees to sell and distribute the proceeds when the period of distribution arrives. Of course when all the beneficiaries are sui juris it is competent for them to agree to put an end to the trust and to ask for a conveyance to themselves. Here they do not agree, and therefore the trust still exists.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

WALSH v. LONSDALE.

Contract to grant a Lease—Taking Possession under Contract—Tenancy from Year to Year—Distress—Judicature Acts.

Since the Judicature Acts, where possession has been given under an agreement for a lease, there are no longer two estates as formerly—one at common law a tenancy from year to year, and the other in equity an estate under the agreement. The tenant now holds under the lease to be granted in pursuance of the contract on the same terms as if the lease had been granted—e.g., he is subject to the same right of distress to which he would have been subject had a lease been granted.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of Fry, J., directing him to pay into Court a sum of money.

The action was brought for damages for improper distress, and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from selling under the distress, and from continuing in possession, and for specific performance of an agreement for a lease, dated the 29th of May, 1879, between the defendant and the plaintiff.

The agreement referred to was one for a lease to the plaintiff of a weaving shed, with the plant and machinery, for a term of seven years from the time when the shed should be put in working order by the defendant, the lessor, and to be renewable upon the same terms for a further term of three years at the option of the lessee. The lessor, at his own expense, to put the weaving shed and premises in working order on or before the 1st of July. The lessor, at his own expense, to find sufficient steam and steam power for driving and running the said weaving shed looms. The rent to be 2*l.* 10*s.* per loom per annum for so many looms as the lessee should run. The lessee shall not run less than 300 looms during the said first year, and he shall in every year afterwards run not less than 540 looms. The lessee to have the power, whenever he shall think fit, to find steam and steam power for running the said weaving shed, machinery looms and premises, in which case the rent shall be reduced to 1*l.* 10*s.* per annum, &c. "The lease to be prepared by the solicitor to the lessor, and approved by the solicitor to the lessee; and to contain such covenants, provisoes, powers and conditions as are usually inserted in leases of a similar nature, and particularly those inserted in a lease of the Newfield Mills, Darwen, dated the 1st of May instant, or such of them as are or can be made applicable to the tenancy hereby agreed to be created."

The lease of Newfield Mills was for a term of four years, from the 1st of May, 1879. The lessee agreeing to "pay therefor yearly in advance on the date of these presents, and on the 1st of May in every year during the continuance of the term, unto the lessor, the clear yearly rent of 876*l.*, subject to a proviso that there should at all times during the continuance of the demise (except in the last year of the said term) be due and payable in advance on demand one whole year's rent of the premises thereby demised, in addition to the proportion (if any) of the said yearly rent due and unpaid previous to such demand."

The plaintiff was let into possession on the 1st of July, 1879, and from the 1st of July, 1880, he provided his own steam and steam power. In the year 1881 he was working 560 looms. The property was in mortgage, and the plaintiff paid his rent to the mortgagee quarterly, and not in advance, down to the 1st of January, 1882.

The defendant subsequently, on the 13th of March, 1882, served the plaintiff with a notice as follows: "I hereby demand immediate payment of 1,013*l.* 14*s.*, being, as to 840*l.*, part thereof, one whole year's rent in advance from this day of the mill and premises you now occupy as my tenant; and as to 165*l.* 14*s.*, part thereof, the balance of the rent of such mill and premises from the 1st day of January last up to this day; and as to 8*l.*, the remainder, for insurance paid by me for insuring the mill and premises;" and on the 15th of March the defendant put in a distress for the rent.

The plaintiff accordingly brought this action, when Fry, J., ordered the defendant to withdraw from possession under the distress upon the plaintiff's paying into Court the sum of 1,005*l.* 14*s.* (the balance remaining after payment of the 8*l.* for insurance).

The plaintiff appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Henn Collins and Farwell, for the appellant.—The agreement of the 29th of May, 1879, is not a present demise—we are at law tenants from year to year. There can be no distress unless there is a legal tenancy and the rent in arrear. There is no distress for rent before it is due, unless it is a certain rent, or one that can be ascertained. Here the rent depends on the number of looms that may be run.

They referred to Daniel v. Gracie (1).

Glasse, Q.C., and Levett, for the defendant.

[JESSEL, M.R.—Will you be content if the plaintiff pays into Court 810*l.*?

They agreed, and were not called upon to argue.]

JESSEL, M.R.—It is not necessary on the present occasion to decide finally the rights of the parties. If the Court sees that there is a fair question to be tried it is the duty of the Court to take security, so as to enable whichever party ultimately succeeds to be in a right position.

The final question will be a question of some nicety. There is an agreement for a lease, under which possession has been taken; nowadays, since the Judicature Acts, the possession is under the agreement. There are no longer two estates, one at law a tenancy from year to year, and the other in equity under the agreement There is only one Court, and the equitable law prevails. The tenant holds now under the agreement to grant the lease on the same terms as if the lease had been granted.

That being so, the tenant cannot complain of the exercise by the landlord of the same right as the landlord would have had under the lease. On the other hand, he is protected as much as if the lease had been granted. The landlord cannot eject him by virtue of his legal estate unless he could do so under the lease. The lessee here (for he is lessee) cannot complain of the distress.

The next question is, How is the lease to be drawn? I do not wish now finally to decide the question, and on an application like this it is not necessary; but I think the Court is bound to say what its present opinion is, because it is material on the question of what ought to be done until the trial. The whole difficulty turns on a single clause, because the parties did not take the trouble to state in detail what covenants the lease was to contain, but have adopted this short form. [His Lordship read the clause as to the Newfield Mill Lease, and proceeded:]

When we come to see the lease of the Newfield Mills we find it a lease at a rent certain payable in advance, and the question is how far that provision can be made applicable to this very peculiar agreement. [His Lordship read through the terms of the agreement, and proceeded:]

The lessee has exercised the option to find his own steam power, and the result is that now he is only liable to pay 30*s.* per loom.

The lessee agrees to run not less than 540 looms, and the next question is whether in drawing the lease there ought to be reserved a dead rent for 540 looms, or whether it is to be left on covenant. In my opinion there should be a dead rent. There is no longer any obligation on the part of the lessor to provide steam power; and it appears to me to be the right thing to reserve a dead rent for 540 looms at 30*s.* a loom. That is 810*l.* The stipulation then as to paying rent in advance can apply to the 810*l.* a year, and the covenants in the lease of the Newfield Mills can be made applicable to this rent.

My present opinion then is (though not a final one) that rent is payable in advance to the extent of 810*l.*

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question whether the defendant was right in putting in this distress depends on the questions which have to be decided on the hearing of this case. The only thing we have to do now is to determine what must be done in the meantime for the purpose of keeping things in statu quo.

The landlord has put in a distress. He is right if the lease, which is to be executed, under which the tenant must be taken to be holding this land, would give him rent in advance. This is not the time for deciding whether any and what rent is payable in advance, but the question is whether we are now to deprive the landlord of any security which he has in his hands for the payment of his rent. In my opinion we ought not. Before allowing him to retain this security we must be satisfied that the landlord has a prima facie case in his favour, and in my opinion he has. It would be wrong to decide now how this lease is to be framed, but my present opinion is that there ought to be a dead rent, which will correspond to the minimum number of looms which the plaintiff is to run in any particular year, and after the first year it is to be always 540.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I also think that the rights of the parties in this case turn upon the lease as it ought to be framed in pursuance of the contract into which they have entered; and, so far as I can construe this contract, I think the lease would contain a clause providing for the payment of a minimum dead rent. I do not agree with Mr. Hardy and Mr. Collins that the whole of the rent would depend on covenant merely, and be an unascertained sum till the end of the year; but the lease should be so worded that there would be an ascertained rent; and then the provisions in the lease of the 1st of May, relating to the payment of rent in advance and the power of distress, would be let in so far as regards the minimum rent. I think Mr. Justice Fry has put too large a sum into his order, because he has treated every payment by way of rent as payable in advance.

[The appeal was dismissed with costs, the defendant agreeing not to sell for a week, if the plaintiff, in the meantime, paid into Court the sum of 810*l.*, the defendant to withdraw from possession.]

ROBINSON v. THE LOCAL BOARD OF BARTON, ETC.

Statute—Construction — Local Government Act, 1858, s. 34—Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 157 and 236—"New Street"—Old Country Road.

The term "new street" in the Local Government Act, 1858, s. 34, and the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 157, applies not only to a street constructed for the first time out of land laid out for building, but also to an old country road or lane in the neighbourhood of a town, which, by the building of houses from time to time along it, gradually becomes a street.

Decison of FRY, J., reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Fry, J., on a Special Case stated under Rule XXXIV.

The case is fully reported 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 467.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were—

1. Whether New Lane, or the part whereof where the plaintiff proposes to build, is a "new street" within the meaning of the term "new street" as used in the Public Health Act, 1875?

2. Whether the defendants are entitled to disapprove of the plaintiff's proposed new buildings, on the ground that the intended building line is too near the roadway of New Lane?

3. Whether the defendants are entitled to pull down the new buildings so in course of erection by the plaintiff?

4. By whom the costs of the Special Case and action ought to be borne?

Fry, J., held that the term "new street" in the said Acts did not include an old country road other than a turnpike road that had become built over, and gave judgment for the plaintiff on all points.

The defendants appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., and Burton Buckley, for the appellants.

Cookson, Q.C., and Byrne, for the respondent.

For the arguments and authorities, see the report below.

JESSEL, M.R.—I think this is a very difficult case, and one as to which opinions might fairly differ without the person having one opinion being entitled to say that the person who has the other opinion is wrong. But, subject to that observation, I think this remark is a fair one—that you must look in construing this Act of Parliament to what must be presumed to be the intention of the Legislature. Now the general intent was evidently this—to give in every district to some local authority the power of regulating the mode of laying out and building new streets—that is, a power to be exercised for the public benefit, and a restriction, of course, on the ordinary right of proprietorship. When once you arrive at that, you have to consider what the meaning of a "new street" is. I should say that that is a "new street" where there was no street before. I use the term "street" in its ordinary meaning. If we wanted authority, there is authority for saying that that is the proper mode of reading this Act of Parliament, though the definition may include more in certain cases. That being so, when is there a "new street" where there was no street before? It may be in one of two ways —that is, a person may take a grass field or a country lane: for, in my opinion, it makes no difference whether or not there was a public highway, a lane or a footpath existing before, which is thrown into the street and is utilised, or whether there was nothing but a mere plot of grass land out of which the roadway was made. Suppose a person designs, then, to build a continuous line of houses, with a more or less number of breaks—because when I say a continuous line, it does not mean that there are to be no breaks or intervals—which would be ordinarily called a street; then he has to build it in a particular way, and subject to these by-laws. There is another case, no doubt, and that is where the street may not be laid out in a formal manner, but may be considered to grow up of itself almost. There are such localities, especially where there is a highway already, where people build houses along the side of the highway; and, without any intention of laying out a street, the street grows. When does it become a new street? At some time or other. In the case of a single proprietor, or several proprietors all intending to make a street, first of all one house is built, then a second, then a third; at some time or other that becomes a street. When? You cannot tell without you know the locality. It must be a question in each particular case when it becomes a street. But the moment it becomes a street it is a new street, and not the less a new street because some of the houses were built before it was a street.

That being so, let us look at the terms of the Act of Parliament: "Every urban authority may make by-laws with respect to the following matters—that is to say, with respect to the level, width and construction of new streets." That plainly enables them to make by-laws before the street is made at all. They may make general by-laws. They may say, "Every street in this district shall be 60 feet wide; every street in this district shall have a main sewer running through the middle of it, or two sewers one on each side of it." They may make general by-laws, and the moment a street comes under the definition of "new street" it then becomes subject to the by-laws.

That being so, we have to consider whether that which is before us is a new street. I must say that if that is the fair reading of the Act of Parliament, I think, on the Special Case, there can be no doubt whatever that this is a new street—indeed, it is a very young street. The Case states that New Lane "was formerly a country lane, with no well-defined footways, and was usually repaired by having cinders thrown upon it." "Until within the last ten years"—that was in 1872—"it was a cinder roadway, with no well-defined footways, and grass growing at the sides." It was a pure country lane until ten years ago—1872. "The footway along the eastern side was made by the defendant board in the year 1880;"—it had not had a footpath till then—"that along the westerly side in the year 1881,"—so it gets footpaths really in 1881. Then "the said board did at the expense of its district previously to and in the year 1875 light, in the years 1876 and 1877 sewer"—when you begin to make it look like a street you sewer it, you do not sewer a country lane —"and in the March of the year 1880 channel and pave it." Then it goes on as to the houses: "All the buildings now situate and being on land abutting New Lane on either side thereof are correctly shewn on the said plan, and number in all eighty-seven houses. Of these sixty-two have been erected within the last ten years, and are coloured red upon the said plan." When you come to look at the plan, and you look at the locus in quo—that is, the place opposite the plaintiff's land—you find a continuous line of houses; in fact, there are two continuous lines; they are separated by a roadway, and they both extend beyond the boundary of the plaintiff's land—that is, a continuous line of houses more than double the width of the plaintiff's land—and which extends beyond each side of it, and also includes the lane—that is, the houses are thrown back from the lane, so that in making the street you have widened the lane, which is a matter of considerable importance. I have no doubt that is a new street.

Now, what do the defendants ask the plaintiff to do? They have asked the plaintiff to throw back his buildings to a building line, so as to widen the lane on the other side. If it is a new street, and I think it is, they have a right to call upon him to define the width, because when I look at the first by-law, it is this: "Every new street shall be laid out and formed of such width and at such level as the board shall at each case determine." That must be width at the place, because a new street may vary in width—you may have it wider at one part than at another; and if they determine therefore that its width shall be up to this building line which they have marked out, the width of the other side being already defined by houses already erected, so that they are marking out that as the building line, that defines the width of the street. I think that is in substance calling upon the plaintiff to build a street of a certain width. He is building his line of houses on the other side of the new street; he is laying out a new street by building a continuous line of houses. Indeed, there is another circumstance which I may mention: the Case says that "except a plot of seventy-eight yards frontage, situate next to the north of the plaintiff's plot, the whole land fronting to and abutting upon New Lane on the westerly side, and extending from Liverpool Road to the point marked x on the said plan, is now held by lessees or their successors under building leases. So the whole of that side—the plaintiff's side substantially for this purpose, leaving out the one plot—is for an immense distance on both sides now under leases for building purposes. There is a common design to build. It appears to me that that is the fair construction of the by-laws. The by-laws are brought up to the 326th section, and when I look at the 37th and the following by-laws, I am satisfied that in calling for a block plan, shewing the position of the buildings and the width and level of the street which they are to approve, they do, by stating their building line on one side—the buildings being upon the other—shew the width.

It appears to me that, notwithstanding the wording of the by-laws, and notwithstanding the wording of the Act, which are open to very considerable difficulty in construction, the fair construction is that which I have put upon them, and consequently the appellants are entitled to judgment.

BRETT, L.J.—I do not think that anybody can doubt that the construction of this Act of Parliament and the by-laws under it, and the application of either of them in particular cases, is a matter of extreme difficulty; and certainly it is extremely difficult to express oneself in terms which will not invite criticism hereafter.

I think that the first remark to be made on the Act of Parliament is, that it certainly deals with at least two different kinds of streets. One is a street which nobody in ordinary language, without the help of an Act of Parliament, ever would have called a street; and the other is a street which everybody, without the aid of an Act of Parliament, would have called a street. The interpretation clause includes things which it says shall be streets, which no man in ordinary parlance would have called a street, because a highway which had not a house on either side of it we are told by this Act of Parliament to call a street; and nobody in ordinary parlance ever would have called that thing a street. But where there is a certain number of houses on each side of a thoroughfare, or a roadway, or whatever you please to call it, everybody, without the assistance of an Act of Parliament, would have called that thing a street, and nothing else. Therefore, there are two totally different kinds of streets. Now, can you, by altering one of these streets into the other, make a new thing, a new street? You make it into something which is absolutely different from what it was before. That which no one would ever have called a street is made into that which everybody would call a street. That thing which is made into what everybody would call a street, is that new or is it old? It is obviously new, if that is done. But further, I cannot help thinking that within the Act of Parliament something which everybody would have called a street may be made into a new street. Take what has been suggested—a street in York—there are a great many of them, picturesque to the last degree, but so narrow that you might knock your head on either side if you did not walk very straight. Well, there are many such streets in London—when the whole street is pulled down, and upon that very same line, but still preserving the same name, a handsome street, with buildings of a very different class, and, instead of being eight feet wide, so that only one carriage at a time can pass through, it is made sixty feet wide, so that anybody can pass through it, with any number of carriages, would not anybody in ordinary language say that that was a new street? Certainly they would, and I cannot help thinking that if anybody pulled down such an old street as that, and proposed to make it a new street, that would immediately give the boards of health, or boards of works, or whatever they are called, jurisdiction over that new street.

The first question of fact in this case must be, Is this a street at all? It was a street within the definition. It is a street now without the definition. It is that which would be called a street in ordinary language without any interpretation clause of the Act of Parliament at all. The real question as to the possibility of the by-laws applying to it is, Is it a new street? It was suggested for a time that it was not a new street, because by the interpretation clause it has been a street ever since the original Act of Parliament was passed, and that therefore it was not new. But I say if you alter it from that into another wholly different kind of street, that new kind of street is a new street at some time or other. This certainly is altered into the new kind of street. Now, has that been done at such a time as to make this a new street? I cannot help thinking that the term "new street" in the Act of Parliament must have a very elastic meaning indeed. You must not be nice in wanting the number of years as to calling it new or old; and when you find that a street is in gradual course of completion, and is not yet finished, I think that the time in which it was begun may be put very far off without its being called an old street.

But let us look at this a little further. It is a difficult thing to say, When did it begin to alter its character? New streets may be made under different circumstances. You may have the whole land on both sides belonging to one owner. Then he makes a plan; he has an intention in his mind, and he has a plan drawn. But that does not begin the street. To my mind that is not laying out the street within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. The Act of Parliament does not care what people do upon paper. It cares about what they do in point of fact, and upon the land. When would such an owner begin to lay out and form a street? To my mind he would do so when he built his first house, having the intention to go on to make a street. He would have begun to lay out and to form a street then; and it would then from that moment begin to be a street. But streets are formed in another way. Supposing that along the line of that which would eventually be considered a street there are a great many owners. There is not any one of them who would make a plan for the whole; but it may be clear that all of them are intending to build there, and to build, having regard to a roadway—if there is an existing roadway certainly having regard to that. Then how will those people lay out and form a street? Why, each of them, by what he does on his own land, would be laying out and forming a street. Which of them begins? I should say the one who begins first in point of time begins to form a street; and if you find that there are several proprietors along a line each of whom is letting it be known, so that the tribunal comes to the conclusion that each of them intends to build not absolutely in a line, but in the same direction, why then the tribunal would have the right to say that there is a common intention amongst all these people to build in a particular course. When they have done so, that course will produce a street, and therefore the first of them who in virtue of that, not consensus, but of a common idea, begins to build, and begins to form and lay out that street—he and all others are subject to the jurisdiction of the board.

There is another case which my Lord has alluded to—where there shall be several proprietors along a long line, but no tribunal could say that there ever was at the same time an intention amongst them all to build—that is to say, that one man at the end of the street may have that intent, but the others have not shewn by any act that they have any intent at all: they have not laid out their land as building land, they have not advertised it as building land—they have done nothing to shew that intent. Then the street really forms itself as it were by continuous action or successive action without any common intent. Then you have to wait until you can see by the course of building that there is that common intent. The moment you see that, you come to the conclusion that it is a street, and that it is begun to be formed. Now, when was this street begun to be formed? I take it that from this plan it is obvious that all these people are intent on building along this line. Many of them have shewn it, because they have already put buildings there having regard to this roadway. Well, some time ago this was a street begun—not so long ago as to prevent its being a new street, for it is not finished yet. Therefore I take this to be a new street. Then the board has the power to make by-laws with regard to this street. Have they made by-laws with regard to this street? They have by-laws. Those by-laws, if they are applicable in any way to this street, apply to this street. But it is said that these by-laws do not affect the width of this street. Now let us see. We take the first by-law.

"Every new street"—that is this street —"shall be laid out and formed of such width"—I will leave out the word "level" —"of such width as the board shall in each case determine." Supposing that by-law had been "Every new street shall be formed of the width of sixty feet," then it would have been obviously applicable to this, and nobody would have denied it. But then that would be a very foolish way of making a general by-law, because some of the streets in the district they would wish to have sixty feet, some forty feet, some thirty feet, and some twenty feet. Therefore they do not put in the number of feet as the width; they put in that which will give them the power in each particular case to determine, and so they put, "Every new street shall be laid out and formed of such width as the board shall in each case determine." Therefore, they have made a by-law that this very street shall be of such a width as the board shall determine. That is a by-law which settles the power of the board to deal with the width of this very street.

Now, how are they to deal with it? Is there anything in that which says that they are to deal with it once, and once only; or may they deal with it from time to time? There is nothing in that by-law which says that it shall be laid out on a plan. As I said before, the laying out on a plan is utterly immaterial. Nobody cares what anybody puts on a plan. A plan laid out may shew an intent to do a thing; but the laying out in this by-law does not mean laying out on paper. It means laying out on the land. It is laying out and forming it. Well, how would they determine that? I cannot see that they are prevented, in the case of each house to be built in that street, from saying, "We will determine as to that house how it shall form the width of the street"—because the house is evidently a part of the street, according to the decision of that case to which we have been referred—"Therefore with regard to each house as it is laid out on the ground and formed we will say how that house shall form the width of the street—in other words, how far that house shall be set backwards or forwards."

Then in this case it is said that if that be true they reserve to themselves the right of saying that one house shall be up to the line of the old road, and another shall be twenty feet back, and another ten feet. Well, it may be so; but unless you say that they are bound to make the street of the same width throughout the whole length—which can hardly be contended—you must leave yourself open to the other alternative; that is, in other words, to say that they have the power of acting capriciously. Well, I suppose that everybody who lives in this city or town, or whatever you please to call it, knows that the boards have the power of acting capriciously. A great many of them very often do. But then the Legislature intends to give them that power. If they did what is now suggested, they certainly would be acting with such a caprice that one would be inclined to say that it was a dishonest caprice, and then I have no doubt that the law would be strong enough to control them. But as long as they act honestly in the exercise of that power it seems to me to be no valid objection to say that they are exercising their power by determining what the width of the street shall be at each point of it—namely, at the time when a person is about to form the width of that street by building a house.

I think, therefore, that in this case they had the power to make a by-law with regard to this particular building as to its relation to the street—that they did make a by-law which gave them the power to deal with it, and that they had that power. And in that view, it seems to me that it makes no difference whether that which was intended to be built was a line of buildings, or whether it was only one building—I hardly gather which it was—but it seems to me that they were within the power, and that the board have not improperly exercised their power.

COTTON, L.J.—I must confess that to my mind this Act of Parliament, as well as the by-laws, have caused very considerable doubt; but I have arrived at an opinion in accordance with that entertained by the rest of the Court. The question which one has to consider really is this—first, whether under the section of the Act of Parliament the local board had power to make by-laws as to the construction of these houses in the way in which they purport to control the operation of the building owner; and in the second place, whether in fact they had passed any such by-laws.

Now the first question is whether this is a new street within sub-section 1 of section 157. I say that, because it is the same as the other Act of Parliament, and it is that Act of 1875 to which we must now refer. The first question is whether this can be called a new street independently of any interpretation clause in the Act; and in my opinion it can. A short time ago, undoubtedly, this could not be called in ordinary parlance a street; but now we know how it has been dealt with, and how houses have been built and are intended to be built along the line of this lane or road—call it what you please—if one looks at the facts stated and looks at the plan, I think that one cannot by possibility come to any other conclusion than that this has now, in ordinary parlance, become a street; and it is equally clear that a few years ago—possibly even within the last four or five years—it was in no way a street, but a lane or country road. It is a street; and therefore, in my opinion, in ordinary parlance it is a new street. But the difficulty which was raised is this—that there is an interpretation clause here under which this, although it was only a country lane or road, was within the meaning of the Act of Parliament a street, unless the context prevented it. But although there is that interpretation clause, in my opinion it does not prevent us from saying that a street is a new street when, in ordinary parlance, not under the interpretation clauses of the Act of Parliament, it is now a street, but within a short period of time it was not in ordinary parlance a street at all. Looking at it, therefore, in ordinary parlance, we are not prevented by the interpretation clause from saying that that which in ordinary parlance has now become a street, but which a short time before was not a street, is a new street within the meaning of this Act.

Then comes the question whether, having regard to the remainder of sub-section 1, it can be said that this is a new street within this provision of the Act of Parliament, so that any by-laws with respect to the matters herein referred to may properly be made. The by-laws are to be with respect to the level, width and construction of new streets. Now a great difficulty arises from this, that the Act of Parliament really does not explain how the matters which must come within this section are to be dealt with. This section applies to intended new streets. That is to say, where there is, really, physically, no street at all, but the owner or owners intend to construct a street, no one would doubt that the urban authority had, when it was intended that a street should be for the first time laid out, power to make by-laws as to how it was to be laid out. But it also must apply, in my opinion, to that which was not in ordinary parlance, as here, a street, but which has become such so as to be a new street in the sense which I have referred to. Then how is it to be dealt with? How can by-laws be made with reference to the level, width and construction of these highways, which, although not streets before in ordinary parlance, have become such. In my opinion, the by-laws do not direct what is to be done in alteration necessarily of that which already exists, but there are directions given as to matters which are to be done, and where, therefore, the local board can by their by-laws which they make prevent any one from coming in contravention of those by-laws. If a house is to be built, then the by-laws can prevent that from being built contrary to the by-laws; in fact, if an alteration is to be made in the level or width of the street, then the by-laws will prevent the alteration being made in contravention; and if a street is to be laid out de novo, and made in the ordinary sense de novo, then of course the by-laws will apply, and will prevent the making of it except in the way authorised by the by-laws. But the difficulty which I first entertained will not apply when one considers that the by-laws are really intended to prevent persons from doing anything contrary to the rules and regulations laid down by the board under the authority of the Act of Parliament. Therefore, in my opinion, under this section it is within the power of the local board to lay down by-laws with reference to this which is now a street, and a new street.

Then comes the question whether they have done so. That case which we were referred to certainly decides that a new street includes not only the carriage-way and footway, but also the houses; and that, therefore, by-laws can be laid down under the authority of this section, with reference, not only to the way, but also to the houses. If that is so, then one comes to this—that they may lay down directions not only as to the roadway but also as to the houses; and that being so, they may direct how, with reference to the required width of the street, the houses are to be constructed. Have they done that? I think they have; because when they require that a block plan shall be made and laid before them, shewing where the house is to be placed, reserving to themselves the right as to approving or not approving of the intended position of the house as well as the other structures—they do in fact say that in new streets to which the by-law is to apply, any house which is built is to be put down in a position which they sanction and approve. I doubt whether that is the proper way to make a by-law, and whether they ought not to say in such and such a part of the street it shall be of a certain width; but I think on the whole they are at liberty (of course the Legislature would give a public body the credit that they would exercise their powers in a reasonable way) in each case to say, "Shew me where you will put your house, and I will see whether that is the proper position, having regard to the required width of the street in the place." That is, I think, a little bit assisted by section 155, which enables them in the case of old streets not to lay down a general line, but when any house is to be rebuilt to say where that house is to be rebuilt, and how far, if at all, it is to be thrown back from its old place, giving them power, in terms, as to any one single house. I think it is not unreasonable, therefore, that in the by-laws they make under section 157 as to new streets, that they should define the building line, by requiring the position of any new house on each side to be laid before them for their approval, so that they may require the street to be made of sufficient width.

JESSEL, M.R.—The answer to the first question is, that where the plaintiff proposes to build is a "new street" within the term "new street" as used in the 157th section of the Public Health Act, 1875. The second and third questions are answered in the affirmative. The answer to the fourth question is—the plaintiff.

Appeal accordingly allowed with costs.

FRANCIS v. HAYWARD.

Easement—Common Ownership — Parcel of Grant—Words restrictive of Grant —Fascia on Wall of Adjacent House.

A fascia of cement was plastered on the front wall of two adjoining houses in a street, for the purpose of exhibiting the name and business of the occupier of buildings forming a court behind and the number in the street by which these buildings were known. The court communicated with the street by an entry and gate under the fascia, the gate being fastened by staples to the wall of one of the houses. The fascia had been used for the above purpose for nearly thirty years. All the premises belonged to one landlord. In 1855 a lease was granted for twenty-one years (which eventually vested in one Bull) of the buildings in the court, with the easements and appurtenances, as then occupied. In 1874 one of the houses was let to the defendant, "as then in his occupation." In 1876 the buildings in the court were let to the plaintiff, with the appurtenances as then or lately in the occupation of Bull; and in 1878 the defendant's tenancy was renewed in the former terms :—Held, that on the terms of the lettings, coupled with the circumstances, the plaintiff held the fascia itself, by grant from the common landlord, as parcel of one tenement with the buildings in the court, and that the defendant was not at liberty to interfere with it. Semble, if the plaintiff's claim in respect of the fascia was to an easement, the defendant's tenancy was subject to that easement.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Napier Higgins and Warmington, for the plaintiff.—The defendant's lease was granted on the 12th of January, 1878. He says it was granted on the surrender of an earlier lease; but he cannot better his right by means of the earlier lease—Davies v. Marshall (1).

The grant to us included the right previously enjoyed with our premises—Hall v. Lund (2). A similar easement to this was upheld in Moody v. Steggles (3).

Rigby and Onslow, for the defendant.—There could have been no such right in existence when the plaintiff took his lease, the two houses being the property of the same landlord. There is no claim of an easement of necessity—Gayford v. Moffatt (4). The plaintiff's present lease would not give him the right—Brett v. Clowser (5). There are no apt words, as in Kay v. Oxley (6) and Watts v. Kelson (7).

[KAY, J., referred to Ewart v. Cochrane (8) and Baird v. Fortune (9)].

Higgins, in reply.—Ewart v. Cochrane (8) shews that, as between the plaintiff and the landlord, the lease of 1876 gave the plaintiff the right to use the fascia; so Polden v. Bastard (10).

[KAY, J.—Martyr v. Lawrence (11) seems against you.]

KAY, J.—The plaintiff is the lessee of certain premises called 152 Aldersgate Street, in the city of London. They consist of a dwelling-house and two places of business situate in a court which communicates with the western side of Aldersgate Street by an entry. The dwelling-house is at the bottom of this court, facing towards Aldersgate Street.

There is a warehouse on the north side of the court, and a shop of some kind on the south side. The entry passes under, as to one half of its width, the house now occupied by the defendant; and as to the other half under the adjoining house.

Francis v. Hayward.

Both these houses face into Aldersgate Street, and are on the west side of that street, and are numbered respectively 153 and 151, the plaintiff's premises being No. 152 Aldersgate Street. The entry is closed by a wrought-iron gate, which is hinged into staples fixed in the wall of the defendant's house, and closes the entry to the top when shut. Above this gate is a fascia in Aldersgate Street, 8 feet long by 2 feet 6 inches in depth, formed of cement plastered on the brickwork of the defendant's house as to one half of it, and of the adjoining house, No. 151, as to the other half of it. This fascia, according to the evidence, was formed for the purpose of painting thereon the number and name of occupier and business of the plaintiff's premises in the court. It has existed before and ever since 1852. In and previous to the year 1855 the name of William Woodger, with the words "Veterinary Forge, Farrier, Horses carefully Shod," were on this fascia, together with the number of the plaintiff's premises, which was then 132. On the 9th of November, 1855, a lease was made of these premises to three persons—named Roberts, Brown and Bright—for twenty-one years, by this description: "All that messuage or tenement, yard, buildings and premises situate and being on the west side of Aldersgate Street, and known as No. 132 in the said street, as the same were lately in the occupation of William Woodger or his undertenants, and now in the occupation of Roberts, Brown and Bright or their undertenants; together with all ways, waters, watercourses, lights, easements, profits, privileges, advantages and appurtenances whatsoever to the said messuage or tenement and premises hereby demised belonging or in anywise appertaining."

Afterwards Roberts assigned his interest to his co-lessees; then Brown assigned his to Bright. In 1865 Bright assigned this lease to Bull, and from time to time, as the occupiers changed, the names on the fascia were changed to correspond, Bull's name being put up after his purchase. On the 5th of August, 1874, No. 153 was let to the defendant Hayward, by the description of "all that messuage and public-house situate, lying and being on the west side of Aldersgate Street, called or known by the name or sign of The Coach and Horses, and also all the yards, outhouses, stables and appurtenances thereunto belonging, together with all cellars, vaults, areas, ways, paths, passages, lights, easements, waters, watercourses, commodities and appurtenances whatsoever to the said messuage or tenement and premises belonging, or in anywise appertaining or with the same, or any part thereof now or heretofore, or lawfully or usually used, holden, occupied or enjoyed, as the same premises are now in the occupation of the said John Percy Hayward."

On the 30th of September, 1876, the premises in the court-yard were let to the plaintiff for twenty-one years, by the description of No. 152 Aldersgate Street, "as the same are now or were lately in the occupation of" Frederick Bull. The boundaries are then given, and then follow the usual general words. In 1878, by a deed of the 12th of January, No. 153 was re-let to the defendant Hayward by the description, "all that messuage and public-house lying and being on the west side of Aldersgate Street, called or known by the name or sign of The Coach and Horses"; and with the further general words used in the former lease of 1874, ending with the words, "as the same premises are now in the occupation of the said John Percy Hayward." After this lease, on the 20th of February, 1880, plans were prepared of certain alterations in the defendant's premises. At first it seems not to have been intended to interfere with the fascia, but on the 1st of October, 1880, as appears by a pencil date on the plan and the evidence of the architect, for the purpose of completing the ornamental design of the improvements of the defendant's property, what is called in the evidence a truss or ornamental projection of stone was proposed to be inserted in the fascia at the northern extremity of the defendant's building, and that part of the fascia which was south of the truss it was proposed to cover with glass.

The glass has not been put there, but the truss has; it partly obliterates the name of Hutchinson, which was then painted on the fascia; and on the 21st of January, 1881, this action was commenced by the present lessee of No. 152, seeking to have the defendant restrained from so interfering with the fascia, and for damages.

The case has been put in the pleadings, and argued, chiefly upon the ground that the plaintiff is entitled to use the fascia in question as an easement appurtenant to his premises, and this view of the matter raises a question of some difficulty. Lord Campbell, in Ewart v. Cochrane (8), states "the law of England to be, that when two properties are possessed by the same owner, and there has been a severance made of part from the other, anything which was used and was necessary for the comfortable enjoyment of that part of the property which is granted shall be considered to follow from the grant if there are the usual words in the conveyance." "I do not know," he says, "whether the usual words are essentially necessary, but where there are the usual words I cannot doubt that that is the law." If this was an easement it seems to me clearly to be one of the nature there referred to—namely, which was used and was necessary for the comfortable enjoyment of the property; and accordingly it would pass by the grant in the lease of 1855, and also prima facie by the lease of 1876.

But then it is argued that, however that might be under the lease of 1855, at the time when the lease of 1876 was granted the lessors had no longer the power to grant this easement, because by the previous lease of 1874 they had granted No. 153, which would be the servient tenement, to the defendant Hayward, subject only to the then unexpired lease of 1855, and the case of Martyr v. Lawrence (11) certainly seems to be an authority for the contention. The words "as the same was late in the occupation of A" were there held not restrictive so as to subject the demised premises to an easement to which they had been liable during A's occupation. Also, in the case of Baird v. Fortune (12) it was decided that the words "as the same now is or was some time possessed by Thomas Fowlis, with parts and pertinents," did not include, by way of grant, a right to take sea-weed from the sea shore over intervening land of the vendor, although Fowlis had had such a right. However, it is plausibly argued that in the latter case (which was decided at the same time and by the same tribunal which decided Ewart v. Cochrane (8) the easement in question was not a continuous and apparent easement, and was not necessary for the comfortable enjoyment of the property sold, and this distinguished the decision from Ewart v. Cochrane (8) and from this case. Notwithstanding these authorities, I am strongly of opinion that sufficient appears upon the face of the leases and from the nature of the properties in this case to entitle the Court to hold, even if this be treated as an easement, that No. 153 was let subject to that easement, and No. 152 with the advantage of it.

However, there is another view of the case which I pressed upon counsel during the argument, and which seems to me, on reflection, to be the true way of determining the respective rights of the plaintiff and the defendant. The lessors being the owners of all these three properties—Nos. 151, 152 and 153—had, of course, an absolute right to determine what should be the divisions between them, and what should constitute the tenement No. 152; and it seems to me that, as well by the deeds as by the practice, which, according to the evidence, has existed ever since the year 1852, this fascia has been considered and treated not merely as an easement, but as a portion, and a most important portion, of the tenement No. 152. It is obvious that the plaintiff's premises having been during all that time used to some extent as business premises, and being numbered 152 Aldersgate Street, it was essential that there should be some place in that street upon which the number and the business name might be put up, and I have the direct evidence of the defendant's architect, which seems to me to be completely corroborated by the plans and photographs which have been proved, that this stucco fascia over the plaintiff's gateway was obviously constructed for his premises, as the place where the name of the occupier and the number of his premises were to be painted up. I am not bound by any law to treat that as a mere easement. It is quite as consistent with law to hold that that stucco fascia is part of the tenement No. 152, though the wall behind it is the wall of the messuage let to the defendant, as to hold that the gate immediately under this fascia, and the staples of that gate, belong to the plaintiff, although those staples are firmly fixed into the defendant's premises. I therefore hold that the plaintiff is entitled to this fascia, not as a mere easement, but as part of the tenement demised to him, it having been constituted part of that tenement by the common owner of the premises both of the plaintiff and the defendant; and I accordingly direct the defendant, at his own expense, forthwith to remove the truss and to restore the fascia to its former condition; and I order him to pay the costs of the action, but I do not think fit to direct any enquiry as to damages.

Will — Legacy for Life — Residuary Legatee—Right to Administration by the Court.

A legacy was given for the separate use of the legatee to be invested by trustees to be nominated by her, and after her death to fall into the residue:—Held, that the residuary legatee had no right to have the fund brought into Court in the absence of reasonable ground for the application, such as danger to the fund.

Isaac Braithwaite, by his will, dated in 1880, gave to the defendant Mrs. Carington a legacy of 5,000*l.* for her separate use, "to be invested by trustees to be nominated by her, so that she shall have the income for her life without power of anticipation, and after her death the principal sum to fall into my residuary estate," and the testator appointed his father, the plaintiff, his residuary legatee. The testator's debts having been paid, the sum of 5,000*l.* was set apart to answer the legacy to Mrs. Carington.

This action was brought by the plaintiff, as residuary legatee, against the executor and Mrs. Carington, to have the trusts of the will, so far as they related to the 5,000*l.*, carried into execution, to have the legacy brought into Court and invested, and the estate of the testator, so far as necessary, administered by the Court.

Mrs. Carington's statement of defence stated that she had appointed trustees in accordance with the will of the testator, and she claimed to have the legacy paid to them.

W. Barber, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff, subject only to the life-interest of Mrs. Carington, is absolutely entitled to the fund, and, as a matter of course, whether the fund is in danger or not, he has the right to have it brought into Court, and secured at his own expense—Haddan on Administration (1), Phipps v. Annesley (2), Ferrand v. Prentice (3) and Freeman v. Fairlie (4).

Hastings, Q.C., and Cust, for Mrs. Carington.

Oswald, for the executor.

HALL, V.C.—I do not think that the rule is as absolute as the counsel for the plaintiff have contended, although the fund would, no doubt, be brought into Court in any case where there was reasonable ground for the application. But there is here no pretence for the Court taking the fund into its own hands and administering it. The testator did not think fit himself to appoint trustees, but considered it more satisfactory to leave the legatee for life herself to appoint her own trustees, who were to select their own investments, which must, however, of course, be such as the law permits; and so long as the investments are such as cannot be quarrelled with, that state of things may be left to continue. The residuary legatee may, of course, from time to time make enquiry as to how the fund is invested. And if proper trustees are not kept up, from the death of one and a neglect to fill up the vacancy, or if for any other cause the fund is in jeopardy and ought to be taken care of by the Court, an application can be made for the purpose. But the leaning of the Court has lately been rather to get rid of a fund where there are proper trustees to take care of it. Certainly in this case the proper course is, according to the terms of the will, to pay over this 5,000*l.* to the trustees appointed by the legatee, and there must be an order for the purpose. It must be invested by them in their names in some or one of the investments upon which trustees can by law properly invest trust funds, and they must give notice of every change of investment. A proper declaration of trust must be executed, and the defendants are entitled to their costs of the action as well as to those of the declaration of trust. There will be liberty to apply.

Lewis by the defendants, asking for the stay of all further proceedings in the action.

The object of the action, which was commenced in July, 1881, is in substance to render the defendants, who are the trustees of a reconstruction scheme relating to the affairs of an American railway company, called the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad Company, liable for numerous breaches of trust—first, with reference to an assessment fund; and, secondly, with reference to the reconstruction scheme itself.

In 1879 an action was commenced by one of the Messrs. Conybeare against the same trustees in England, and the object of that action is to a considerable extent identical with the action in which this motion is made. But in many respects this action, which I will call McHenry's English action, is wider and more comprehensive in its scope: it is founded upon rights which McHenry possesses or alleges that he is entitled to, and which Mr. Conybeare could not enforce in the other English action. It is not necessary to go through the two claims at any length; it is sufficient to say that the scope of McHenry's English action is much wider than the scope of Conybeare's action. The difference does not consist merely in pleaders' allegations varying the same facts, but the distinction is essential.

In August, 1881, after McHenry's English action had been commenced, an action was commenced in America by another Mr. Conybeare and Mr. McHenry, as co-plaintiffs, on behalf of themselves and others (I need not give the whole title of the action), for purposes which are substantially, as I gather, the same as those which are sought in McHenry's English action; but there are in the American action additional defendants, namely, the new company, which has been incorporated under the American law, and its directors. The state of the actions is that judgment has not been obtained in any one of them. An order has been made in Mr. Conybeare's English action to ascertain the amount of remuneration which ought to be paid to the trustees, and it is apparently one of the objects of McHenry's English action to supersede that order if it can be done. A motion was made in McHenry's action for an injunction, which failed by reason of the American company not being parties to the action. Now it is obvious from what I have stated that the motion is to stay McHenry's action, and is not a motion to put the plaintiff to his election, which could not be made because all the plaintiffs in the other action are not parties to this action.

The motion which I am dealing with came first before Mr. Justice Kay, and he allowed it to stand over for the purpose of giving the defendants, the moving parties, an opportunity, if they thought fit, of moving to consolidate; but that liberty has not been acted upon, a liberty which would have put the defendants, if they had thought fit to avail themselves of it, in the position in which the parties were in the well-known case of Amos v. Chadwick (15), where a consolidation order was made, or, what is perhaps the same thing in other words, one out of numerous actions was selected as a test action.

Then the defendants, feeling the difficulty they were in, offered at the bar certain undertakings, which are in substance these: not to raise any objection to the jurisdiction of the American Court, or to the right of that Court to decide any question which might have been decided here in the action of McHenry v. Lewis, and they proposed to undertake to be bound by the judgment in the American action on the matters raised in that action not included in the action of Conybeare v. Lewis, as if it were a judgment made in the action of McHenry v. Lewis. They also stated at the bar that the stay of proceedings which they sought for was not to be an absolute one, but only until further order, with liberty to the plaintiffs at any time to apply.

The substance of these undertakings appears to be in effect not to interfere in any way with the proceedings of Mr. Conybeare in his English action, but rather to single out the American action as a test action, and not put the plaintiffs to any election; but the defendants themselves proposed to select the foreign action as the one which is to be the test action, and to decide the matters which are in issue between the parties in the English action.

Now, the grounds upon which the motion rested were these. It was said that the Court has an inherent jurisdiction to stay frivolous and vexatious proceedings, and in support of that proposition two cases, of Castro v. Murray (3) and Dawkins v. Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar (4), were referred to. In both these actions it was quite plain that the plaintiff's demand was vexatious and frivolous. In the former case the action was brought against the clerk of the petty bag for declining to seal a writ; and it was plain and obvious to the Court that there was no such duty imposed upon him. In the latter case the plaintiff was suing (as the Court said) in a merely frivolous and vexatious action the members of a Court of enquiry with reference to a claim which had been already disposed of in the House of Lords in an action in which Colonel Dawkins was also plaintiff. There is, however, a passage in Lord Blackburn's judgment in Dawkins v. Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar (4), to the effect that, though the jurisdiction does exist, it is one which ought to be exercised very carefully.

It is obvious that the case which is presented by the defendants in this motion cannot be rested on the principle of those cases. This action is not a frivolous or vexatious one. The pleadings state (whether founded on fact or not is quite another thing) a case which requires a defence, and which the Court would not off-hand on a motion say is either frivolous or vexatious.

Then the defendants refer to the cases of The Mali Ivo (6), The Catarrino Chiazzare (7) and The Delta (8). From these cases it will be found that the proposition the defendants relied on was a dictum of Sir Robert Phillimore's, before whom all these cases came. But these actions were actions in rem, and there were proceedings in rem in a foreign country. And the proposition on the part of Sir Robert Phillimore, though he did not act upon it in any of the cases, was not simply that the Court would stay proceedings, but that there would be a case upon which to put the plaintiffs to their election. I think, as far as I am concerned, these observations of his may be disposed of by the remark that the actions were actions in rem, and obviously it would be inconvenient to have two Courts deciding finally and conclusively, as is the case when the proceedings are in rem, with reference to the same subject-matter.

The defendants also referred to the well-known practice in the Court of Equity with regard to staying creditor's actions: the answer is obvious, that a creditor's action never was stayed till after decree.

On the part of the plaintiff the case of Cox v. Mitchell (10) was referred to, in which the Court of Common Pleas held that the motion to stay where the action was in personam, on the ground of an action in a foreign country, was, in fact, a mere experiment for which there was no authority; and they refused the motion. And there the Court made an observation which particularly applies to this case, namely, that there is a great difficulty in the way of plaintiffs who have to sue defendants some of whom are in one country and some in another. The Court there decided that both actions ought to be allowed to proceed.

Other authorities were referred to, such as Lord Dillon v. Alvares (9), where there was a plea of lis alibi pendens, there being an action in England and also one in Ireland relating to the same subject-matter. The judgment is very short. The plea failed, and the Lord Chancellor said he could not stay the suit where the person sued had an estate in England and in Ireland. There was real estate in Ireland in that case which was affected by the securities. The phrase "estate," as far as it related to England, must have referred to personal estate which the party had in this country, because there was no real estate here which was sought to be affected. That no doubt was on a plea, but it does shew that the plea would not succeed.

Another case referred to on the part of the plaintiffs was Wilson v. Ferrand, (11), where Vice-Chancellor Malins refused to stay further proceedings in the action, notwithstanding there was an action pending in a foreign Court against one, and only one, of the defendants who were defendants in the English action.

It seems to me that in these circumstances I must follow the principle which is laid down by the Court of Common Pleas in Cox v. Mitchell (10), and which is to a certain extent supported by the other two cases I have mentioned, and that I must refuse this motion.

I ought perhaps to say this, which I have not touched upon yet, that these representative suits are a mode of procedure which was adopted by the old Court of Chancery with the view to prevent injustice on the grounds that it was impracticable to bring such suits to a conclusion if it were necessary to make all persons parties. That is a procedure which has been thought so convenient that it has been adopted now by the High Court since the Judicature Act. As Lord Justice James said in the case of Watson v. Cave (1), that these suits are always accompanied by some difficulty, and as Lord Justice Cotton observed in the same case, representative suits are difficult of management, and I do not propose in deciding this case in any way to say that if there were several representative suits by several plaintiffs the Court would allow them all to proceed.

It seems to me that it would be within the principle of vexatious litigation if (to put a large number) a dozen representative suits were allowed to proceed against the same defendants; but then, no doubt, the proper mode of dealing with such vexatious proceedings would be by making a proper application, as was done in Amos v. Chadwick (15), or some similar application to that. No doubt one of the objects (as is plain from the statement of claim) of McHenry's English action is to supersede an order which has already been made in Conybeare's English action with reference to the remuneration of the trustees. That really is not before me now. Of course it may be a matter for consideration hereafter, if the question arises, how far Mr. McHenry may not be bound by the order that has been obtained in the action in which he is represented, provided that the order was fairly made. I mean to leave that question entirely and absolutely open, and in no way to prejudice it.

I have in my mind the well-known action of Gellatly v. The Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London (2), in which the Master of the Rolls held that Gellatly was bound by the decree in the great Epping Forest Case (The Commissioners of Sewers v. Glasse (16)) where the proceedings no doubt had been fairly conducted, and the decree fairly obtained.

That really disposes of the motion; but there was another point which was somewhat faintly urged as a second ground. It was said that the plaintiff McHenry was not the holder of the bonds, and that therefore he could not proceed. The property in the bonds or certificates in respect of which the action is brought is still vested in him. It has not been divested by the liquidation proceedings under which the receiver has been appointed; and the objection is one which would not go to a stay of proceedings; but rather it would be a ground of defence, if it is a defence. I do not suggest that it is. That would be the proper mode of dealing with it, or perhaps it would be a ground for saying that the receiver who has the actual custody of the bonds ought to be made a party. The bonds are, according to the evidence, ready to be produced at any moment by the receiver, and it seems to me that the ground is one upon which the motion cannot be supported.

The only question that remains is that of costs. Mr. Lewis and his co-trustees are being sued in three different actions, one in America and two here; and I am not in any degree surprised that he should have made this motion. It may be that in the result it will be found that these proceedings are vexatious as against him. I think at least he had such a foundation for making this motion that I ought to depart in this case from the general rule.

Princess of Reuss v. Bos (40 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 665; Law Rep. 5 H.L. Cas. 176) discussed and distinguished.

Petition.

A shareholder presented this petition to wind up the company on the ground that it had not commenced business within a year from its incorporation within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1862, section 79, sub-section 2.

The company was incorporated on the 12th of January, 1881, with a capital of 2,000,000*l.* in 200,000 shares of 10*l.* each. The objects of the company (which are more fully stated in the judgment) according to their memorandum of association were, shortly, to carry on fire insurance business in the United Kingdom and its dependencies, and in other parts of the world. The material provisions of the articles of association (which are more fully set out in the judgment) were as follows: that the head office of the company should always be in London or Westminster; that the directors should at any time, on the requisition in writing of twenty members holding not less than one-fifth of the total share capital, convene an extraordinary or special general meeting; that the directors should never be less than eight or more than twenty, half to be French and the other half English; that the directors were to have the entire management and superintendence over the affairs of the company; that they should commence business as soon as an adequate proportion of the share capital was in their judgment subscribed for; and the directors were to carry out generally the objects of the company in such manner and to such extent as they might from time to time deem necessary for the benefit of the company; and it was provided that the directors might at any time delegate any of their powers to a committee or committees to act either in the United Kingdom or abroad.

There were 338 shareholders in the company, holding over 30,000 shares. The majority of the shareholders were French, and only 2,470 shares were held by English shareholders.

The head office of the company was in London, where they had a secretary, manager and clerks; but, except two general meetings, held in May and June, 1881, and the usual board meetings, the company had transacted no business in England. According to the articles certain French gentlemen had been appointed directors, and a branch business had been opened in Paris, where a considerable business had been done, premiums to the amount of 40,000*l.* having been paid.

The petition now came on to be heard. According to the evidence on behalf of the company, it was sworn to that they intended to take risks and issue policies in England as soon as a sufficient amount of capital was subscribed.

Ince, Q.C., and Whittaker, for the petitioner.—We say that the company has not commenced business here within a year from its incorporation within the meaning of section 79 of the Companies Act, 1862, sub-section 2—Princess of Reuss v. Bos (1). This is really a French company, and, according to the last mentioned case, the fact of not commencing business within a year brings it within sub-section 5 or the "just and equitable" clause.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and Seward Brice supported the petition on behalf of creditors, and for a shareholder holding twenty shares.

Crossley, Q.C., and Terrell supported the petition for a shareholder holding 500 shares.

Oswald also supported the petition for a shareholder holding 300 shares.

Methold, for some of the original directors, took no part in the argument.

Romer, Q.C., and Beddall, for the company, opposed the petition.—We submit that the petitioner has made out no case for a winding-up order. The petition is only supported by the holders of 870 out of the 2,470 English shares, and as against that there are 30,000 shares, held by 338 shareholders. Moreover, the company is carrying on a large business in Paris, and intends to carry on ordinary insurance business in England as soon as sufficient capital is subscribed. The distinction between the present case and the Princess of Reuss v. Bos (1) is that in the latter case there was no evidence that any business at all had been carried on, and it was not alleged that any business could be carried on in England.

Ince, Q.C., in reply.

CHITTY, J.—This is a petition to wind up a fire insurance company, which originally started under the name of the Universe Fire Insurance Association, but afterwards changed its name to the Capital Fire Insurance Association. The petition is presented by a shareholder, who holds fifty shares, and I do not think that any word can be uttered against the bona fides of the petitioner. He, as I say, holds fifty shares, and there appear at the bar to support the petition three other shareholders, holding among them rather more than 800 shares altogether. The petition is supported by 870 shares. The total number of shares issued is 30,293, which are held by 338 different shareholders, and it is said, and I believe rightly said, that of the shareholders the large majority are French shareholders, and that the number of shares held in England by Englishmen, as I understand it, amounts altogether to 2,470.

The first question which I have to consider is, what is the attitude towards the petitioner of the shareholders who do not appear? Of the 338 there are but four who appear here in support. On cross-examination the petitioner said that there were other shareholders, whom he named, who supported him, whose shares amount together, including his own and those held by his father, to 800; and he says—but it is a loose statement, and of course necessarily a loose statement made by a gentleman in his position—that he believes he has one half of the English shareholders supporting him; but I consider for the purposes of this petition that the shareholders who do not come forward must be treated in any view as neutral. Well, then, is it fair to treat them even as neutral? If I did not treat them as allowing their case to be put forward by the company which is resisting the order, I should be holding that which would lead greatly to the increase of the costs of these winding-up petitions, which assuredly are sufficiently great as matters now stand, and I think it is a fair inference, particularly in the circumstances of this case, to say that the other shareholders do not wish for a winding-up. The result, therefore, is this—that the wishes of the shareholders, if I am right in what I have said, by a very large majority are adverse to the petitioner's case.

Now the point, and the sole point, upon which the petitioner relies is, that the company has not commenced its business within a year from its incorporation, within the meaning of the 79th section of the Companies Act, 1862. That is the question which I have now to consider. By the memorandum of association, the objects of the company are stated to be the carrying on "in the United Kingdom and its dependencies, and in other parts of the world, the business of insurers or assurers of buildings, furniture and other chattels, and all insurable objects on land or afloat, against fire"; and the second is to purchase lands, buildings and other hereditaments and properties, interests and securities, real and personal, at home or abroad.

The articles, which are a contemporaneous document, and may be read with a view to ascertain the meaning of the parties to the memorandum—that is to say, to explain the meaning more fully—provide by the 3rd article that "the head house or office of business of the company shall always be in London or Westminster, at such particular locality as the directors shall decide." By the 47th clause, which has a bearing on the question of the wishes of the contributories, it is provided, "the directors may, whenever they think fit, and they shall, upon a requisition in writing under the hands of no less than twenty registered members, holding in the aggregate not less than one-fifth part of the actual share capital of the company, convene an extraordinary or special general meeting." The 52nd clause, which relates to meetings, requires the notices to be published in London and elsewhere; and the 69th clause provides that "the directors of the company shall be never less than eight in number, nor more than twenty, and that one-half of the directors be French and one-half English, or as nearly as possible." Then the 83rd section is material upon the question which I have to decide: "The board of directors shall have the entire management of and superintendence over the affairs and transactions of the company; they shall and may commence the business of the company as soon as an adequate proportion of the share capital of the company shall, in their judgment, have been subscribed for"; and then, after mentioning the costs of establishing the company, the directors are required "to proceed to carry out generally the objects of the company as defined by the memorandum of association, in such manner and to such extent"—here are important words—"as they may from time to time deem necessary for the benefit of the company." The 110th article provides that the directors "may from time to time delegate any of their powers, except that of making calls, to a committee or committees, to act either in the United Kingdom or abroad, and to consist of such members of their body as they shall think fit, and any such committee shall, in exercise of the powers so delegated, conform to any regulations that may be imposed on them by the directors." The 111th article is to the effect that the directors may from time to time create and appoint, revoke and reappoint such local board or committees, consisting of or including persons not being directors of the company, to sit and act under the direction of the board of directors, at any localities in the United Kingdom or elsewhere. The 154th clause is with regard to notices to holders of share-warrants.

Now the question is, as I have said, whether the company has or has not commenced its business within a year of its incorporation. An argument was put forward by Mr. Whitehorne, who appeared for a shareholder supporting the petition, to this effect: he said the objects for which the company was established were to carry on in the United Kingdom and its dependencies, and in other parts of the world, the business of insurers, and therefore, when the Court came to consider what were the objects of the company, inasmuch as the copulative "and" is used, and not the disjunctive "or," the business means the whole of those objects. That argument is wholly untenable, because it would obviously be an absurd thing to say that if this company were carrying on a large insurance business in the United Kingdom, but not in the dependencies, or not in the other parts of the world, it would not be carrying on substantially its business within the meaning of the memorandum and these articles, and I cannot so hold. If the argument was pressed to the extreme, it would be necessary for the company to be carrying on business in other parts of the world besides the United Kingdom and its dependencies, which, according to this argument, would mean all its dependencies. What the company has done is this: There were originally a body of English gentlemen named as directors of the company, and for some time they acted as directors here; but, for reasons which it is not necessary to state, they resigned in a body.

In re The Capital Fire Insur. Assoc.

The article with regard to the directors which I have read, which provides that one half of them be French, was an amendment of the article as it originally stood, the provision with regard to the half being French and the half being English being inserted in pursuance of a special resolution which was afterwards come to; but these directors have resigned, other directors have been appointed in their place, and the present directors consist, according to the article, of four French gentlemen and four English gentlemen.

Now what has the company done? It has carried on no fire business in England —that is to say, in the present state of circumstances the directors have refrained from even preparing forms for policies for fire insurance here, and they have refrained from accepting any fire risks here; but in France there is a very different state of things. The company has received since its incorporation, which took place on the 12th of January, 1881, down to some day in March, no less than 40,000*l.* in France from premiums paid in respect of fire policies. In other words, the company has carried on a large and extensive business abroad; but it has not carried on business in England, except only to the extent and in the sense which I am now about to explain. There have been two general meetings of the company here. It is not quite clear from the articles—the point has not been raised one way or the other definitely, and I express no opinion upon it—as to whether the general meetings ought to be held here or not; but at any rate up to the present time there have been two general meetings, one on the 11th of May, 1881, and the other on the 22nd of June, 1881—that meeting of the 22nd of June being an adjourned meeting of the first annual meeting held on the 11th of May; and at these two meetings considerable discussion appears to have taken place. The petitioner attended the first, but he did not attend the second. Then here there is an office, and according to the articles it is the head house or office of business of the company. The directors, as appears from the board meeting book which has been handed up to me, have from time to time, and, so far as I have gathered from the book, met regularly; but they have not, as I have said before, accepted any fire insurance here. In that sense, and in that sense only, which is a very limited sense of the term, they have carried on business. I prefer to say that the result is this—that the head or principal seat of the administration appears to be in England, and I should not think for a moment of holding, upon a question turning on the construction of the 2nd sub-section of section 79, that the mere meeting of the directors would constitute a carrying on of business within the meaning of that clause. The case seems to be fairly stated in this way—that the administration of the company's business abroad has to some, but some limited extent, been conducted here. It has been principally conducted abroad, and in France; but that is justified from the various articles which I have read, shewing that the directors have power to appoint and to delegate their power to directors, or even persons who are not directors, abroad, under the 110th and 111th articles which I have read.

Now, if the case were free from all authority, what would be the right conclusion to come to? I think the right conclusion would be that the company has commenced its business within a year, having regard to the objects of the company as defined by the memorandum, and having regard particularly to the 83rd clause under which the directors are empowered to carry out those objects "in such manner and to such extent as they may from time to time deem necessary for the benefit of the company." I think that the right conclusion to come to is that the company has commenced its business within the meaning of the statute, and within the meaning of the memorandum and articles of association, because the statute does not purport for a moment to define what the business of the company is. In order to ascertain that, you have to look, as I have done, to the memorandum and articles of association.

There is one fact more—I think I ought to mention it to shew that I have not failed to notice it. It is said that the French directors have not remitted the moneys here, and have not accounted here, and that the company has only been in existence for eighteen months. I gather that the French business did not start immediately after the incorporation of the company, but that some delay took place before it was really set on foot. The affidavits shew that a sum of 5,000*l.* is all that has been expended by the company in payment of fire risks. No doubt some of the fire risks are still running, but there would be a considerable amount of profit coming to the shareholders out of the 40,000*l.* premiums which I have already mentioned. The amount of such profit of course will not be ascertained until the fire risks have run off. It is said by the petitioner that the French directors decline to account. Well, the duty of course of the French directors is to retain the money in France in order to meet the fire insurances which may mature there, and it will be their duty when those insurances have run off, and when, in other words, the profits are ascertained, to remit the moneys to this country. Therefore it seems to me that the mere fact that the French directors have not remitted money here does not afford any material ground whatever in support of the petition.

In these circumstances it seems to me that the petition fails; but I will give one or two instances which occur to me by way of illustration of the conclusion which I have arrived at. There are many companies that have been incorporated under the Act of 1862 for the purpose of carrying on their business abroad, and some for the purpose of carrying on business here and abroad, such as gas companies, water companies and tramway companies. I will take a tramway company. If a company were incorporated for the purpose of working tramways abroad, say in South America, or more particularly in Monte Video, or some such place as that, and they were carrying on a large business in Monte Video, the head-quarters of the administration being here in England, the general meetings taking place here in England, and the directors meeting here in England—could it for one moment be suggested that the company had not commenced its business (I assume that it is a large business in Monte Video, and that they are carrying it on at great profit) simply because it was not working any tramway in England? I say not. I say that of course bearing in mind the speeches to the House of Lords in the case of The Princess of Reuss v. Bos (1), which I now proceed to consider. That is a remarkable case. The gist of the argument presented both in the Court below and in the House of Lords was, that the company ought never to have been incorporated at all, and that it was not within the scope of the Companies Act of 1862. When the speeches of the noble Lords who advised the House in that case are read through carefully, it will be seen that they treated this company, which they held to be incorporated, as a thing which ought to be put out of existence as soon as possible. The House of Lords did not decide the case simply on the ground that the company had not commenced to carry on business within the year. There are several passages, particularly in Lord Cairns' speech, which require perhaps a little critical examination; but even Lord Cairns, and certainly the other noble Lords who addressed the House, put the case on all the circumstances, and said the company ought to be wound up under the "just and equitable" clause at the end of the 79th section.

It would be useless and tiresome for me to go through all the speeches of the noble Lords, and I am not sure that it is a good plan for one Judge, and particularly a Judge of first instance, to criticise minutely the language of the Judges of the Court of Appeal or the language of the speeches in the House of Lords. What I consider it my duty to do is to extract fairly, and as well as I can, the meaning and the substance of the speeches which were so delivered. Now Lord Hatherley, who was Lord Chancellor, states that—"the question as to its being just and equitable has reference of course to what is just and equitable in a judicial point of view, regard being had to all the circumstances of the case." Then he goes through all the circumstances of the case, and he mentions the fact that no business had been transacted here from the time of the formation, except in the sense of there being an office here and some mere forms being gone through of certain books being kept which were prescribed to be kept in the office; but he found that really in truth no substantial business had been done in this country. Then he goes on—"When we find the deed in the condition in which we find it here, and that all the shares have been taken in the manner in which they here appear to have been de facto taken—namely, a large majority by persons whose names do not appear on the register at all—the Court of Chancery may well say that this is a case in which, as the Lord Justice observed, great injustice would be done to the creditors of the concern, and to those who might be allowed hereafter to become creditors, by permitting a corporation to remain registered, and to remain as a corporate body, which is in the condition in which we find this company to be. Therefore on every ground—not only on the ground of business not having been carried on (which is one of the things specified in the Act) for the term of a year, but not having been sensibly carried on in fact at any time in this country, but also from the position in which these shares are now found—every argument against the propriety of the deed, if it fail to satisfy your Lordships that the company is not incorporated, is an argument of course for extinguishing that thing which, although it has been in form incorporated, has not been incorporated in such a manner as to be effective for any possible useful purpose for which the Act of Parliament conceded the right of incorporation." That, I think, justifies what I have stated already, that at any rate, so far as Lord Hatherley was concerned, he speaks of this company as a sort of miserable thing which had come into existence, which existence ought to be terminated as speedily as may be. There are other passages to the same effect in his speech. What he refers to with regard to the shares is this: "There were two classes of shares in the company, one the nominative shares"—which I understand means the registered shares—"and the other shares to bearer, which at that time were not permitted by the Act of Parliament." Lord Colonsay in his speech says: "I think it is difficult to look at its history, its mode of operation and its whole career, without feeling a strong moral conviction that the objects in view in bringing this company into existence, and giving it the character and aspect of a British company, were somewhat of a sinister kind, though what they were we may not be able to discover." Then he passes on to observations of a similar kind, and he says: "The irregularities in its proceedings, and the extraordinary character which it has developed in the course of the operations which have been performed, appear to me to be no reasons at all against applying the law"—that is, the law to wind up—"but, on the contrary, to be reasons for giving effect to it." It does not appear, I should say, from the statement of facts in the reports of the case in the House of Lords, whether the company, which had been founded for the promotion of other companies in any country, had or had not carried on business elsewhere than in England; but a passage was read to me from one of the reports in the Court below, and it did appear that they had done some business in foreign parts. Lord Cairns, after disposing of the question as to the incorporation of the company, says: "But then looking at what happened afterwards, what we find is this: we find that in point of fact the company never has traded in this country, and I think it is a very legitimate suspicion to entertain, looking at the matter by the light of subsequent events, that it was never intended to trade in this country." I stay there for a moment in order to make this observation with regard to the case before me. I think it was intended that this company should carry on fire business in England, subject of course to the discretionary power which the directors have under the 83rd clause. One of the directors who has not been cross-examined swears, and I think his testimony is entitled to credit, that it is intended to carry on business here when circumstances are such as in the opinion of the directors will justify their commencing business here. Then Lord Cairns proceeds to say: "We find that this provision in the articles to which I have referred (which I have termed an irregularity) has been largely acted upon, and that great numbers of the shares in the company (the far larger proportion) are held by persons whose names have never been brought on the register; that is to say, the holders have not been brought upon the register: they are holders of shares payable to bearer which have been dealt with as such, and a great proportion of what ought to have been the capital of the company is, as I understand it, outstanding upon these particular shares."

Then come the passages upon which reliance has chiefly been placed by the counsel for the petitioner. "Then the fifth is"—that is, the 5th sub-section of section 79—"whenever the Court is of opinion that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up. I do not stay to consider whether the second head literally and in terms meets the present case"—that is, the clause as to commencing business—"that is to say, I do not stop to consider whether a company incorporated for trading in England and abroad—which does trade abroad I will suppose, but does not trade in England—is a company which does not commence business within a year from its incorporation, within the meaning of the second head." I understand Lord Cairns to be saying there, that that is the question which he does not propose to decide. "But the second head appears to me to throw a very strong light upon the principles upon which the Court should act in dealing with the company under the fifth head, for it is by no means unfair to say that it was intended to cover, at all events, cases ejusdem generis with those which are found in the former heads. Beyond all doubt, it appears to me that this company has brought itself entirely within the spirit of the second head, and within the words of the fifth. Having regard to what is the spirit of the second, whether you can assert of this company absolutely that it has not traded at all within twelve months, I do not know"—again, he will not decide that question—"but I am quite sure it has not traded within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, for it has not traded in England." No doubt that passage, which is in this case but a dictum, does stand somewhat in the way of the conclusion which I have arrived at; but reading the whole judgment together, as I think I ought to do, I understand as the result that Lord Cairns does not decide the question whether, where the business of the company can be legitimately carried on both abroad and in England, and it carries on business abroad only, that is not a trading or carrying on business within the meaning of the Act. He goes on immediately to say, "And, moreover, wherever it is trading, it is a company which is now going on, and dealing with those shares to which I have referred, the shares payable to bearer, in a manner entirely repugnant to the spirit of the Act of Parliament. Therefore, it seems to me, it is exactly one of those cases where, even if we had not the case of a creditor coming forward and alleging non-payment of his debt, it would, under the other powers of the section, be just and equitable that the company should be wound up, because it is a company not trading in this country"—he puts that, therefore, as one ground only—"and because"—which is another ground—"it is a company dealing with its shares in a manner calculated to mislead the public, and defeat the just rights of creditors, and therefore that it should be put an end to."

Desiring to ascertain truly and fairly the meaning of Lord Cairns' opinion on this subject, I think there, that though he relies on the non-trading in this country, he does not rely on that as a ground distinct in itself, but he puts that in connection with the dealing with the shares in a manner calculated to mislead the public, and says, arguing from what may be called the fair spirit of the clause, as to the commencement of business, the case is brought within the letter of the "just and equitable" clause of the 79th section. That is borne out by the next paragraph. I need not read it, but the substance of it is that he puts forward the whole of that case as the case upon which it would be fit for the Court to wind up the company; and then, at the end of his speech, he refers to the hostile observations which had been made in regard to the company, both with relation to its first coming into existence and to its existence after—to use Lord Hatherley's term in the earlier part of his speech—it had been born, in justifying the order which Lord Justice Giffard had made.

I have gone through that case at some length, because I consider it only right and respectful to the House of Lords, sitting as I do here, to consider the speeches of the noble Lords carefully. I have done that to the best of my ability, and I think I should not be justified in making an order to wind up this company on the sole ground that it has not carried on substantially business in this country. Of course, the case which I have to deal with, as I have already pointed out, is entirely distinguishable from the one which the House of Lords dealt with. I rely to a great extent on the 83rd article, which, as I said before, gives a discretionary power to the directors, and which the directors appear to me to have exercised honestly, and for the general benefit of the company.

The result, therefore, is that the petition fails.

BRISTOW v. MASEFIELD.

Will—Construction—Residue—Inconsistent Gifts.

A testator gave his residue upon exhaustive trusts for his daughters, sons and a granddaughter in unequal shares, and made a second residuary gift in favour of the same persons in equal shares:—Held, that the first gift must prevail.

After a direction to pay debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and making certain specific bequests, the will of William Bristow, the younger, was as follows:—

"And as to all the rest, residue and remainder of my real and personal estate, I give, devise and bequeath the same unto my trustees hereinafter named or the survivor or survivors of them, their or his heirs and assigns, upon the trusts following: that is to say, upon trust in the first place to pay to my said daughter Betsy Agnes Bristow" (meaning thereby the plaintiff), "immediately or as soon as convenient after my decease, the sum of one hundred pounds sterling for her sole and separate use and benefit; and as to the remainder of my real and personal estate, I direct my said trustees, their heirs or assigns, to sell and convert such part thereof as shall not consist of money into money, either by public sale or private contract, and to divide the whole of the proceeds arising therefrom (after payment of all expenses) into four equal parts, and divide three of such parts, together with three-fourths of such portion of my personal estate not previously disposed of as shall consist of money, equally between my three daughters, Betsy Agnes Bristow, Maud Mary Bristow and Martha Bristow, share and share alike as tenants in common; and in the event of either of my said daughters dying before this trust is fully carried out and satisfied, then the survivors or survivor shall be entitled to their or her deceased sister's share, and in case of the whole of my daughters so dying as aforesaid, then this bequest shall be equally divided between my sons and granddaughter hereinafter named, or the survivors or survivor of them, their, his or her heirs and assigns: Provided always, and it is my will, that in the event of either of my said daughters dying, being married and leaving lawful issue, such issue shall be entitled to his, her or their deceased parent's share as tenants-in-common, anything hereinbefore contained to the contrary notwithstanding; and as to the remaining one-fourth share of the proceeds of my real and personal estate as aforesaid, I direct my said trustees to divide the same equally between my three sons, namely, Harry Bristow, Charles Edward Bristow and Arthur Bristow, and my granddaughter Bessie Bristow, daughter of my late son William Griffiths Bristow, or the survivor or survivors of them and the lawful issue of such as may be dead, in the same manner as is before directed in the case of my daughters, and should there be no survivor or lawful issue I direct that the whole of this bequest shall pass to my daughters in the manner above directed, their heirs and assigns: Provided always, and it is my will, that in the event of any or either of my children or my said granddaughter not having attained the age of twenty-one years at the time when the above bequests shall become payable, my said trustees shall have power to exercise their discretion, with the concurrence of my said daughter Betsy Agnes Bristow, as to the best manner in which such child or children's share or shares shall be paid or applied for his, her or their respective benefit; and as to all the rest, residue and remainder of my real and personal estate of which I may die possessed, I give, devise and bequeath the same to the whole of my said children, sons, daughters and granddaughter, or the survivors of them, their heirs and assigns, share and share alike as tenants-in-common."

The testator died in August, 1881. The action was brought to determine which of the residuary gifts was to prevail. The plaintiff was the testator's daughter, Betsy Ann Bristow, executrix of the will, and the defendants were executors with her. She claimed a declaration that she was entitled to a fourth of the residue, and in addition to the legacy of 100*l*.

The defendants demurred.

R. H. Deane, for the demurrer.—The rule in construing wills where there are two inconsistent clauses is that the latter is to prevail—Ulrick v. Litchfield (1), Coke on Littleton (2) and Jarman on Wills (3). It had been held that where there was an absolute residuary legacy and a subsequent residuary gift the latter was to take effect in case of lapse only, as in Kilvington v. Parker (4) and In re Jessop (5); a distinction was taken in the latter case between such a case as this; and here the two clauses cannot be reconciled in such way, for the first provision provides for every event, so that there can be no lapse.

Underhill, for the statement of claim.—The rule in Ulrick v. Litchfield (1) does not apply where there are two residuary gifts. The Court will not defeat an express gift or hold any part of a will to be nugatory if a reasonable construction can otherwise be put on the words. The second residuary gift is only to sweep in anything that may by any chance or possibility not be disposed of. It would manifestly defeat the intention of the testator if the careful provision he made for his family by the first residuary gift were to be abrogated. The matter is really settled by authority—Kilvington v. Parker (4) and Davis v. Bennett (6).

R. H. Deane replied.

FRY, J.—The question is whether the last residuary bequest extinguishes and puts an end to the first. If I were to construe the will to the effect that it does, I have no doubt I should be defeating the deliberate intention of the testator. It is impossible to state the provisions I have referred to without seeing that the testator has made an anxious and exhaustive division of his property by the first gift, and it is difficult to suppose that the testator intended to defeat that by the last clause. I think the last clause may and ought to have this signification, that it is intended to operate if in any case there should be anything over. The testator may have thought that in some possible event there might be something undisposed of which he intended to sweep in, and in my view that is what he did. It appears that that is consistent with the case of Kilvington v. Parker (4) and the earlier case of Davis v. Bennett (6) before the Master of the Rolls. It is quite true that that was an appointment of residuary legatees. How does that differ from such a disposition as this, only in that there is less intention and meaning shewn than in an elaborate disposition. I find here that the earlier disposition expresses more care and anxiety than the later, it is more artificial and elaborate, and ought to prevail. The result is, the demurrer must be overruled. The costs to be paid out of the estate.

In re THE MILAN TRAMWAYS COMPANY; ex parte THEYS.

Company—Winding-up—Set-off—Assignment of Chose in Action—Debt or Damages—Rules of Court, 1875, Order XIX. rule 3.

T. purchased some debts due by a company from H., who purchased them from the original creditors. Before the debts were assigned to T. the liquidator took out a summons in the winding-up of the company to make H. liable for a misfeasance, and subsequently to the assignment an order was made that H., who was an original director of the company, should pay the liquidator 2,000*l.*, "the nominal value of the eighty-five shares in the company received by H. from the promoter of the company":—Held, that as the company had elected to take the value of the shares, their claim against H. was not a debt but damages, and that therefore the 2,000*l. could not be set off against the dividends payable to T. in respect of the debts.*

Rule 3 of Order XIX., Rules of Court, 1875, is only a rule of procedure, and was not intended to give rights against third persons which did not exist before. It was held, therefore, not to affect the question of set-off.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons taken out by Alfred Theys, asking that the dividends on certain debts due from the company might be paid to him. These debts were due to various creditors, and were assigned by them to a Mr. Hutter, by several assignments between the 29th of October, 1879, and the 20th of December in that year.

Hutter was also entitled, as mortgagee, to a claim which one Greenhill had against the company.

On the 12th of January, 1877, the company was ordered to be wound up.

On the 5th of February, 1880, the official liquidator took out a summons against Hutter (who was one of the original directors of the company) under section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, for damages for a misfeasance.

On the 25th of February, 1880, Hutter assigned for value all the claims which he had against the company to the applicant Theys. Notice of this assignment was given to the liquidator on the next day, the 26th of February, and also to Greenhill; and Theys, in an affidavit made by him, swore that at the time of the assignment he was not aware of any claim or demand, at law or in equity, on Hutter in respect of the matters so assigned to him, or any incumbrance thereon.

On the 31st of May, 1880, Theys took out a summons to be admitted as a creditor in respect of these claims in the place and stead of the other creditors. On the 28th of July, 1880, an order was made on the summons for misfeasance against Hutter, for payment by him to the official liquidator of a sum of 2,000*l.*, "the nominal value of the eighty-five shares in the company received by Hutter from Charles Bernard, the promoter of the company." The ground of the order was that these shares were a bribe from Bernard to Hutter.

On the 4th of August, 1881, the dividends on the debts claimed by Theys, amounting to 11*s.* in the pound, were ordered to be paid into Court to a separate account.

On the 27th of October, 1881, Theys took out the present summons, asking that the dividends should be paid to him. This application was opposed by the official liquidator, who contended that he was entitled to set off against the amount due to Theys the 2,000*l.* for which he had obtained an order against Hutter.

Beddall (W. Pearson, Q.C., with him), for the applicant.—The claim of the company against Hutter was a claim for damages and not a debt, and cannot therefore be the subject of set-off. But even if it were a debt, it could not be set off as against Theys. The Judicature Act, 1875, s. 25, sub-s. 6, preserves all existing equities, so that the present is in effect the case of an assignment of an equitable right to a legal chose in action, and the only equities to which such an assignee is subject are those between the debtor and the original creditor. An assignee of a legal chose in action is subject to any equity between the assignor and the original debtor; but the assignee of an equitable right to a legal chose in action is not subject to any equities between the assignor—the person who has only an equitable right—and the original debtor. In equity there is no restraint on assignment, and a person who acquires an equitable right for value without notice has an absolute right. If it were otherwise, in every case of a sale of a debt it would be necessary for the purchaser to enquire not merely as to the equities between the debtor and the original creditor, but also as to any equities between the debtor and any person through whose hands the debt passed. Suppose Theys had been driven to assert his right by action, he would have sued not in the name of Hutter, but in the names of the original creditors, and the official liquidator could not have set up as a defence that he had a claim against a third person.

W. F. Robinson, Q.C., and Northmore Lawrence, for the official liquidator.—The mere fact that the amount of the claim against Hutter was unliquidated will not prevent its being the subject of set-off. In re The South Blackpool Hotel Company; ex parte James (1) is an authority to that effect. Moreover, by virtue of the Judicature Act and Rules of Court, 1875, Order XIX. rule 3, it is competent to a party to set off any right or claim, whether such set-off sound in damages or not. Therefore, if Hutter had brought an action against the liquidator, this claim might have been set off, and whatever set-off exists against Hutter exists against Theys as his assignee. In re The China Steamship Company; ex parte Mackenzie (2) decides that after a winding-up a debt can only be assigned subject to future calls, and is an authority in our favour on the second point. They referred also to Young v. Kitchin (3).

Beddall, in reply.—In In re The South Blackpool Hotel Company; ex parte James (1) the claim allowed to be set off was a debt. Order XIX. rule 3, is merely a rule of procedure, and not intended to affect existing rights. Hutter never would have brought an action. The action would have been in the name of the original creditors.

Cur. adv. vult.

KAY, J. (on Nov. 11), stated the facts as above set out, and continued as follows:—The liquidator resists the application of Mr. Theys, upon the ground that he is, as he insists, entitled to set off the 2,000*l.* for which he has obtained an order against Hutter. But this order was not obtained until long after the assignment by Hutter to Theys and the notice of that assignment given to the liquidator. Assuming that what the liquidator has recovered was damages and not a debt, there was not, at the date of the assignment and of the notice, any right of set-off either at law or in equity. Was then the 2,000*l.* recovered damages? It was recovered, as I understand, by a summons under section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862, and was, according to the order of the 28th of July, 1880, "the nominal value of eighty-five shares in the company received by Hutter from Charles Bernard, the promoter of the company." The ground of the order, I presume, was that this was in the nature of a bribe, which it was a misfeasance on Hutter's part to receive. According to In re The Caerphilly Colliery Company; Pearson's Case (4), the right of the company was to elect whether they would take the shares and their proceeds if they had increased in value, or the value of them at the time when they were presented to him. The company have elected to take the value. This was not moneys in his hands. I am not informed whether he ever had any of the value of these shares in the shape of money, but if he had I must suppose it was less than what the company have elected to take. As they have not taken the specific shares, it seems to me that the company have insisted on their right to damages or compensation, and that the 2,000*l.* was, in the strictest sense of the word, damages and not a debt.

If this be so, then, taking the assignment to be subject to equities, it seems to me that there was no equity to which it could be made subject. This is not the case of a liability for a call made in the winding-up, which, according to Ex parte Mackenzie (2), constitutes a debt from the time of the commencement of the winding-up, but the case seems to me to fall entirely within the decision in Watson v. The Mid Wales Railway Company (5), where it was held that neither at law nor in equity would a set-off be allowed against the assignee of an equitable chose in action of a debt "arising between the original parties subsequently to the notice of assignment out of matters not connected with the debt claimed, nor in any way referring to it."

An argument which I must specially notice is, that since the Judicature Act, under Order XIX. rule 3, a defendant in an action may "set off or set up, by way of counter-claim against the claims of the plaintiff, any right or claim, whether such set-off or counter-claim sound in damages or not;" and that consequently the liquidator has now this right of set-off, even though he might not have had it before that statute.

In my opinion, that rule was not intended to give rights against third persons which did not exist before, but is a rule of procedure, designed to prevent the necessity of bringing a cross-action in all cases where the counter-claim may conveniently be tried in the original action.

Section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act of 1875, making debts assignable at law, preserves "all equities which would have been entitled to priority over the right of the assignee if that Act had not passed," and it therefore does not affect the question which I have had to decide.

The summons of Theys must be allowed with costs. The liquidator may take his costs out of the estate.

Practice—Appeal—Security for Costs—Delay.

As a general rule an application for security for costs of an appeal must be made within a reasonable time, and if made after the appeal is in the paper will be too late.

A motion for security for the costs of an interlocutory appeal (the appellant being out of the jurisdiction) and the appeal itself came into the paper the same day. It appeared that the hearing of the motion for security had been delayed in consequence of the Court not having sat to hear such applications:—

Held, that under the circumstances the application must be granted.

In this case a petition, which had been presented to wind up the company, alleged fraud against the promoters of the company. Thereupon J. Ryan, one of the promoters, applied to have his name struck out of those paragraphs of the petition which contained the allegations of fraud. His application was heard and dismissed very shortly before the Long Vacation, and he gave notice of appeal for the 2nd of November.

J. Ryan being out of the jurisdiction, the respondents to the appeal gave the usual notice of motion for security for costs for the 8th of November, a Wednesday, being a day on which the Court of Appeal usually heard such applications. The Court, however, did not hear interlocutory appeals or original motions on the 8th of November, but on the 10th of November, on which day J. Ryan's appeal stood seventh in the paper.

Burton Buckley, for J. Ryan, contended that the application was made too late, as Ryan's appeal was in that day's paper—Grant v. La Banque Franco-Egyptienne (1).

In re The Indian, Kingston and Sandhurst Gold Mining Co., App.

JESSEL, M.R.—I am of opinion that this application must be granted; but it is not out of any desire to encourage these applications, for they are not to be encouraged. I feel sure that Lord Justice James, in the case of Grant v. La Banque Franco-Egyptienne (1), did not intend to lay down any general rule which would fetter the discretion of the Court upon subsequent occasions. I quite agree that in that case the application was made too late. No doubt a party who desires to obtain security for the costs of an appeal must give his notice with reasonable promptness; and, as a general rule, if he allowed the appeal to come into the paper before making his application, he will be too late. But in the case of an interlocutory appeal that cannot be always avoided, because the Court often has the interlocutory appeals so well in hand that they sometimes come into the paper in the very week in which the application is made; so that to lay down an absolute rule would, in some cases, entirely defeat the rule as to giving security. It is said that notice for security might have been given for the 2nd of November. But everybody knows that no substantial business is taken on that day, and it has never been held to be unreasonable delay not to give these notices in the Long Vacation. Therefore in this case there is no evidence of delay. Then it is said that the appeal is actually in to-day's paper. But if the Court had taken appeal motions, as usual, on the 8th of November, this motion for security would have been heard that day, whilst the appeal would not have been in the list for that day; for it stands seventh in to-day's list, and the practice of the Court is to put only eight interlocutory appeals into the paper, and some have been disposed of since the 8th of November. Therefore it was the act of the Court which delayed this application for security coming on before the appeal got into the paper. The appellant, as he was out of the jurisdiction, knew very well that he might be called upon to give security at any time, and that he could not resist it. Therefore, under the circumstances, I am of opinion that the applicant has not disregarded the rule that he must come within a reasonable time. The usual security must be given, and the appeal stayed in the meantime.

CLARKE v. YORKE.

Fraudulent Representation—Cause of Action—Action for Damages—Judgment in County Court—Second Action for Subsequent Damages.

The plaintiff, the lessee of a farm, brought an action in the County Court against the defendant, the lessor, for damages for the loss sustained by reason of the fraudulent representation of the defendant that the farm was thoroughly drained; and in July, 1880, obtained judgment for 50*l. and costs.*

In March, 1881, the plaintiff brought this action against the defendant for damages for the loss sustained since the commencement of the County Court action by reason of such fraudulent representation:—

Held, that the plaintiff's cause of action was completely exhausted by the judgment of July, 1880*; and action dismissed with costs.*

Trial of action.

This was an action, brought by Richard Clarke, a farmer, against Joseph Yorke, his landlord, claiming damages for the loss sustained by the plaintiff since the 28th of May, 1880 (the day of the commencement of an action in the County Court), by reason of the fraudulent representations made by the defendant as to the drainage of the farm.

On the 11th of June, 1876, the defendant caused the following advertisement to be inserted in Bell's Weekly Messenger:—

"To be let, a tithe free farm, with good house and suitable buildings, consisting of 152A. of arable land, 149A. meadow pasture and orchard land, together with two cottages and gardens, the whole thoroughly drained, bounded by good roads, about three miles from Tewkesbury . . . ."

The plaintiff took possession of the farm in March, 1877; and on the 7th of December, 1877, executed a counterpart lease thereof for a term of fourteen years at a rent of 500*l.* a year.

The plaintiff alleged that, in the spring of 1878, he, for the first time, discovered that the drains on some parts of the farm were extremely defective, and that other parts were wholly undrained; and, being unable to obtain any redress from the defendant in respect of the want of drainage, on the 28th of March, 1880, commenced an action in the County Court of Gloucestershire for damages sustained by him by reason of the said misrepresentation as to drainage.

On the 30th of July, 1880, the County Court action came on for trial. At the trial the plaintiff applied to the defendant to waive the limit of jurisdiction of the County Court, which the defendant refused to do. The plaintiff thereupon abandoned all his claim for damages beyond 50*l.*, and amended his "particulars." The amended particulars were as follows: "To damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the defendant having falsely and fraudulently represented to the plaintiff that the whole of a certain farm and land, known as the Mitre Farm, was thoroughly drained, whereby the plaintiff was induced to become tenant to the defendant of the said farm and lands and to take a lease thereof from the defendant, and sustained loss (after deducting from such loss the amount abandoned to bring the action within the jurisdiction of the above Court) 50*l.*"

After two witnesses had been examined on behalf of the plaintiff, the defendant submitted to a verdict and judgment for 50*l.*, and costs.

On the 31st of March, 1881, the plaintiff brought this action, alleging that he had, since the commencement of the County Court action, sustained heavy damages to his crops owing to the said want of proper drainage; and claiming, first, damages for the loss sustained by him since the commencement of the County Court action by reason of the false and fraudulent representations made by the defendant as to the drainage of the farm; and, secondly, that the defendant might make good his false representations as to drainage, or that the lease might be cancelled.

The defendant, by his statement of defence, submitted (amongst other defences) that the verdict and judgment and the payment of the 50*l.* and costs were an absolute defence to the action.

Higgins, Q.C., and F. H. Colt, for the plaintiff.—The judgment of July, 1880, is only for damages accrued up to the time of bringing the County Court action. The plaintiff is in the position of a man complaining of a continuing nuisance, the continuance of which is a new cause of action—Thompson v. Gibson (1); and has a right to bring a second action for subsequent damages—Child v. Stenning (2).

The rule in equity is, that a man is bound to make good his false representation—Fry on Specific Performance (3) and Piggott v. Stratton (4). Here the representation must be taken with reference to the thing to be enjoyed and the covenant for quiet enjoyment contained in the lease. There is, therefore, a continuing default.

The judgment of the County Court admits the fraud, and the words of the particulars shew that it was for an actual loss sustained up to the date of bringing the County Court action. The future damage will be the loss of profit until the farm is thoroughly drained. The plaintiff has no power to drain it, nor is he under any obligation to do so.

[PEARSON, J.—Here your cause of action is fraudulent representation. Is it not exhausted by the first action?]

No; because a continuance of the default with fresh damages will constitute a fresh cause of action—Mayne on Damages (5) and Whitehouse v. Fellowes (6).

defendant.—Upon the execution of the counterpart lease by the plaintiff, in December, 1877, the cause of action was complete. By including damages down to that date he has exhausted his cause of action; and no fresh action can now be brought for subsequently accruing damage —Nicklin v. Williams (7) approved (on this point) in Backhouse v. Bonomi (8).

They were then stopped.

Higgins, Q.C., in reply.

PEARSON, J. (after stating the facts of the case), said:—The question before me is narrowed to this, Whether or not the plaintiff can bring this action for damages, in respect of the misrepresentation, after having brought an action on the same subject in the County Court. I am of opinion that he cannot. I am of opinion that his cause of action was completely exhausted by the verdict in the action in the County Court. He might, if he was really entitled, in respect of that misrepresentation, to larger damages, have sought and obtained larger damages in the superior Court. If, therefore, he has recovered only 50*l.* in the County Court, and 50*l.* is not the measure of his damage, it is his own fault for having sued in a Court of limited jurisdiction instead of having sued in the superior Court.

But it has been argued very strenuously before me that this is a case of a continuing breach of a covenant or contract; and that, it being a continuing breach, as soon as fresh damage occurs, the plaintiff is entitled to bring a fresh action. I am of opinion that this is not a continuing cause of action; but that there is one cause of action only, namely, the fraudulent misrepresentation complained of in the County Court; and that, inasmuch as any damage that might arise from the fraudulent misrepresentation could have been properly assessed in that Court, the plaintiff cannot, by any possibility, be said to have a fresh cause of action now. His cause of action, being one cause only, has been exhausted by the action which he brought in the County Court.

I do not think that this case is at all analogous to the cases cited on breaches of covenant for quiet enjoyment, where, necessarily, the whole gist of the action arises each time there is a breach of the particular covenant. There was no fresh cause of action here. Whatever cause of action there may be to-day is exactly the same cause of action which there was in July, 1880, when the verdict was given in the County Court. This is an action on the advertisement of the 11th of June, 1876; and the damages that have arisen from it give the plaintiff no fresh right of action. I must dismiss the action with costs.

KELSEY v. DODD.

Restrictive Covenant — Waiver — Benefit of Covenant at Law—Non-existent Person —8 & 9 Vict. c. 106. s. 5.

On a sale of part of the C. estate, the purchasers entered into a covenant with the vendors, "their and each of their heirs and assigns, and also separately with the owners and owner, lessors and lessees for the time being, or other the persons or person for the time being entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits of any part of" the C. estate, against (inter alia) keeping a beershop on any part of the premises sold. In an action brought by subsequent purchasers of the C. estate to restrain a breach of this covenant,— Held, on the evidence adduced, that they had lost their right to bring an action by long-continued acquiescence in breaches of the covenant both by the defendant and other similar covenantors, and consequently were not entitled either to an injunction or to any damages. Semble, also, that they were not entitled to sue on the covenant at law, even for nominal damages.

This was an action by a firm of brewers, named Kelsey, to restrain the defendant from keeping a beershop on premises occupied by him. In 1865, two persons named Ward, owners of an estate called the Calverley Estate, sold a part of it, and took a covenant from the purchasers against, inter alia, keeping a beershop on any part of the premises sold. The covenant was entered into with the two Wards, their heirs and assigns, and also separately with the owners and owner, lessors and lessees for the time being, or other the persons or person for the time being entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits of any part of the Calverley Estate. The plaintiffs subsequently purchased the rest of the Calverley Estate from the Wards, and the defendant was the occupier of part of the premises subject to the covenant. The rest of the facts, and also the arguments, sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Chitty, Q.C., and Rigby, for the plaintiffs.

Ince, Q.C., and Dryden, for the defendant.

The following cases were cited or referred to: The Bishop of St. Albans v. Battersby (1), Renals v. Cowlishaw (2), Keates v. Lyon (3), Richards v. Revett (4) Hogg v. Scott (5), and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106. s. 5.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—There is some difficulty on the authorities; but I think there is sufficient in this case to enable me to decide according to the general principle. A man cannot come into a Court of equity for an injunction who has wilfully allowed it to be broken by divers persons bound to the same restrictive covenant, with the view, either of harassing or annoying, or of obtaining special advantage against one covenantor in particular.

Now it appears that in 1865 the two Messrs. Ward, the owners of a large estate called the "Calverley Estate," sold off six acres, retaining the rest, and took a covenant in rather a special form that the purchasers of that estate would not allow what I may call offensive businesses to be carried on, amongst others beerhouses. Now that was obviously a covenant for the protection of their estate from nuisance. It was not a covenant for the purpose of enabling them, and them only, to carry on the offensive trade on their estate, though, of course, it would incidentally have that effect. But that is not the primary meaning of the covenant, though it is an incidental one. Now the covenant says that they shall not "exercise or carry on, or cause or permit or suffer to be exercised or carried on, upon any part of the said piece of land and hereditaments, or in any dwelling-house or other building to be erected or built thereupon or any part thereof, any manufactory whatsoever, or trade, business or occupation of (amongst others) that of a public-house keeper, beershop keeper or brewer, or any trade or business or occupation whatsoever whereby any unwholesome or offensive or disagreeable matter, deposit or fluid, or any injurious or offensive or disagreeable noise or nuisance, shall or may be occasioned, collected, caused or made." The covenant is rather a miscellaneous one; but it is obvious what was the primary meaning of the covenant. Though it mentions public-house keeper and beershop keeper and brewer amongst them, it was intended that noisy, noisome or offensive trades or businesses generally were to be prohibited. The covenant was with the two Wards, their and each of their heirs, successors in estate, appointees and assigns; and also separately with the owners and owner, lessors and lessees for the time being, or other the persons or person for the time being entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits of any part of the said Calverley Estate. There is no definition of "Calverley Estate" in the covenant; but the evidence of Mr. Ward is clear enough that there was an estate bought by his father in 1828 or 1826, or somewhere about that date, which he named the "Calverley Estate," and that from time to time he sold a piece of it, and, of course, the "Calverley Estate" was the name of the remainder. Now I think, according to the legal view of it, the "Calverley Estate" must mean that estate which remained unsold and belonged to the Wards, and does not include portions of the estate which had been sold off, and which though at the time they were sold were properly described as forming part of the "Calverley Estate," could not, I think, be properly so described after they were sold.

Therefore "owners and owner, lessors and lessees for the time being" means the future owners of the "Calverley Estate." That applies to one portion of this statement of claim, which raises a claim both in respect of land which the plaintiffs were entitled to before 1865, as well as in respect of land to which they have been entitled after 1865, though, as I understand, the difficulty is in respect of the land to which they were entitled before 1865, because upon that there is a public-house the trade of which they think is interfered with. Now, it appears that this plot of land as to which the restrictive covenant applies is a plot of land of rather over six acres, and, deducting the roads, I should think it is rather under five acres. It does not so much matter as to that, however. There is the Western Road, which runs through it in one direction, and cuts off a small strip of land, and then there are other roads. Now we find three houses on the roads. First of all we find at the corner of Stratford Street and Western Road a beershop, Turle's; then we find at the corner of the next street, Avon Street and Western Road, Noake's; and then we find just across the road the plaintiff's public-house, which is not on the land to which the restriction applies; then if we go a little farther on we find at the corner of St. James's Road and the next road the defendant's beershop; and then if we go a little farther on there is another beershop, Brider's; then if we go back again and turn to the other side of Western Road, just opposite Avon Street, we find another beershop.

That is a piece of land well supplied with beershops, as I should say studded over with beershops; and if the plaintiffs have allowed of these beershops but one to be used for a long time, I should say they could not come into a Court of equity, and say that they had not abandoned that restrictive covenant; or to put it in another shape, that they had not, either by active or passive encouragement, so acted as to disentitle them to ask a Court of equity to grant them an injunction. Now for that purpose it is necessary to look at the dates. I must say upon this, of course, the plaintiffs are gentlemen who live in the neighbourhood, and they do not contend that they did not know what was being done. There is no dispute whatever as to what took place being within their knowledge, with the exception as to what one of their travellers did. Now, on the part of the defendant, she says this: First of all, though there is no evidence, the defendant has put in a defence as to the use of her beershop, and the plaintiffs, in default of evidence, have been obliged to read the defendants' defence, and therefore I must take that as proved. You must read it as an admission. Now, if you read it as an admission, you must read the whole of it, beginning with the words: "The said William Henry Dodds, the late husband of the defendant, in the month of August, 1878, obtained a licence, authorising the sale at the defendant's said house of beer to be consumed off the said premises; and ever since the granting of such licence the sale of beer, in accordance with such licence, has been carried on at such last-mentioned house with the knowledge of the plaintiffs, and until the 11th day of July, 1879, without any interference or remonstrance on the part of the plaintiffs or either of them."

Now, I may assume for this purpose that the plaintiffs were entitled to enforce the covenant. And what does it come to? It is supplemented a little by the evidence that it was built for a beershop. The defendant's husband in the month of August, 1878, obtained a licence, and he carried on the trade till the 11th of July, 1879—that is very nearly a year—and this he did with the knowledge of the plaintiffs and without any attempt at interference on their part. In the month of July the plaintiffs gave him notice, but they did not commence any action, the notice being disregarded until February, 1880, so that here the lapse of time must be taken into account.

Now that is the evidence. As regards the plaintiffs they have filed affidavits which first of all say, We say that the sale of beer by the defendant is injurious to us in detracting from the value of our property. That, I understand, means this—not that it is injurious to their property, but it is injurious to their beershops and public-houses, because it may carry off a part of the trade which otherwise would come to them. That is plain from the rest of the affidavits as what they meant. They do not pretend that a beershop on that piece of property injures their property generally, but only their trade. "We have never willingly allowed any house on the land, subject to the restrictive covenants in the statement of claim mentioned, to be used as a beershop; but down to the beginning of the year 1879 we were advised and believed that the user of a house for the sale of beer to be consumed off the premises did not make the house a beershop, and it was in this belief only that we did not sooner take steps to enforce a performance of the said covenant." Now there is no doubt that there are cases in which ignorance of legal right may prevent acquiescence, or may prevent its waiver; but this is a most unsatisfactory affidavit. It does not say by whom they were advised. Of course the value of advice, as I have often said, depends upon who gives it. They do not say they were advised by a solicitor, or by counsel, or by any person having legal knowledge. They do not give the date of the advice. Who can cross-examine upon such a thing as this? Of course these gentlemen do not wish to affix a meaning to their affidavits which they did not actually mean. We have an affidavit in reply, however, which I think shews what they really do mean, and what they say in the affidavit is this—"I, the said Edward Kelsey, for myself, say, in the beginning of the year 1879, I was informed by my solicitors that the user of houses on the St. James's Road Estate, in the pleadings in this action mentioned, for the sale of beer to be consumed off the premises, made such houses beershops, and such user could be restrained by us." Therefore I take him to mean that he had been advised some time previously—and very likely a considerable time previously (for a reason I am going to mention), and down to the beginning of the year 1879—that selling beer off the premises did not constitute a beershop, but he got no new legal advice till the beginning of 1879. He does not mean that the advice was going on week after week, or month after month, during that time. Now the way to construe it is this: I do not think it is possible he got such advice in the middle of 1878, for this reason, that in May, 1878, the very point was decided by the full Court of Queen's Bench, and it was a point of such importance that all solicitors to brewers must have known of it very soon afterwards. Though the report of the case would not be published at once, their attention would be immediately attracted to the case, and, it being decided in May, 1878, I should think the solicitors to any large brewers would have known of it, and must have known of it, before the middle of 1878. I have no doubt whatever that the advice he received, assuming it was legal advice, was at some anterior period to that, and certainly as early as May or June, 1878. I must take the trade to have known that this house was a beershop, and whether these gentlemen actually knew it or not does not appear to me to be very material. Then it comes to this, that after the decision and after it was generally known, namely in August, 1878, the defendant's husband gets a licence and is allowed to go on till July, 1879. Now, can the plaintiffs stand by with such knowledge, and be entitled to say, he having established a trade for eleven months and perhaps got a valuable connection, that the defendant is now to be restrained on the ground of restrictive covenant? I think they could not if it stood upon that alone. But it does not stand upon that alone. As I said before this place is really studded with beershops, and I will take them in order as to what the plaintiffs knew about them. I will first of all take Turk's. Now Turk's is in my opinion a very strong case indeed. As to Turk's shop, the defendant has filed an affidavit of Mr. Allan Anscombe, and he says: "In or about the year 1872, I purchased a house and shop erected on this property," and so on. "In the year 1872 I applied for and obtained a licence for the sale of beer to be consumed off the said house and shop so purchased by me. The said plaintiffs knew of my obtaining the said licence, and never in any way objected to my selling beer to be consumed off the said premises, but on the contrary they continually supplied me with beer to be sold in pursuance of such licence during my occupation of the said premises, which terminated about the year 1875, when I let the same to one Thomas Turk. During my occupation of the said premises I never purchased the beer of any other person than the said plaintiffs." Of course the plaintiffs will say they did not know they could restrain him. Then Thomas Turk says, "I have occupied since July, 1875, the house in question. At the time I hired the said premises of Allan Anscombe they were licensed for the sale of beer to be consumed off the premises, and I procured a transfer of such licence to myself, and have continued ever since during my occupation of the said premises to sell beer in pursuance of such licence and the renewals thereof. During the first part of the time I occupied such house the plaintiffs supplied me with beer, but I ceased to deal with them as I did not approve of the beer they sent me. They have frequently since solicited me to order beer from them, the last time being about nine months ago." Well, I think it would be very difficult for the plaintiffs after that to restrain Turk's house from being used as a beershop. Then there is an affidavit in reply, in which it is said the firm only employed two travellers, Smith and Baker, in Tunbridge Wells. "On being informed, as aforesaid, by our solicitors, that the use of the said houses for the sale of beer could be stopped by us, I instructed the said Thomas Smith not to solicit orders on the said St. James's Road Estate, but I inadvertently omitted to give similar instructions to the said Charles Baker." So Baker went on soliciting orders, and of course the result of the inadvertence must be to the injury of the plaintiffs. "Charles Baker, as I am since informed and believe, solicited orders on the said St. James's Road Estate after that time and up to the month of February, 1880"—that is, up to the time of bringing the action he solicited orders from the beershop keepers to supply them with beer. Baker makes no affidavit, though Smith does; Baker appears to have solicited generally of any one. So I understand Mr. Kelsey's affidavit.

[His Lordship then went through the evidence as to other beerhouses, and proceeded:] Now, under these circumstances, has not there been such a change as regards the carrying on the trade of a beershop keeper on this part of the estate as to have disentitled the plaintiffs to come to this Court, and to restrain one man, leaving the others selling the beer? It seems to me that in substance the covenant in question has been abandoned or waived, or that such a state of things has been acquiesced in as to make it inequitable to allow the plaintiffs now to restrain the carrying on this trade. In some cases there has been active encouragement by supplying the beer. In all the cases there has been active encouragement by soliciting orders for the beer. It seems to me, therefore, that even assuming that the plaintiffs would have power under the covenant to sue at law, about which I will speak presently, they have lost their remedy. Next, assuming that they have a legal title to sue, after the Judicature Act could they obtain a verdict with damages? I think not. I think the principle prevails that if a man comes here for an injunction as the main part of his case and for substantial damages, and it is shewn that his conduct has been such, either by direct encouragement or by tacit encouragement, as to entitle the defendant to say that he is at liberty to carry on the trade, it entitles him to say, "you shall not get any damages at all," and that he has a good defence altogether, and that if the plaintiff so encouraged him to act he ought not to sue him at all. The principles of equity which disentitle him to an injunction ought to deprive him also of even nominal damages in equity. Now I come to the question of whether the plaintiffs would be entitled to nominal damages at law, and that is a question upon which I feel considerable difficulty. First of all, the separate covenant is a covenant separately with the owners and owner, lessors and lessees, for the time being, or other the persons or person for the time being entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits on any part of the Calverley Estate. Now, under that covenant, if the plaintiffs were future owners, they being persons non-existent at the time, they could not at law take any benefit, because at law you could not covenant with a non-existing person. He could not be made a party to a legal covenant, and you could not get any effectual covenant for him at all. If, therefore, they are entitled to sue in any shape or in any way it must be under the words of the covenant entered into with the two Wards, "their and each of their heirs, successors in estates, appointees and assigns." Whether that would entitle them to say that every assignee had a right to sue without joining the others I am not prepared to say, though I think it would not. But even if it would, there would be a great difficulty in this, that it is not a covenant running with the land. I mean that in law it is a covenant not to do something on the land which has been alienated in fee, and though you may say that it ran with the land in equity, it never ran with the land, and it does not appear to me that under the word "assigns" they would get a legal right of action. Then if they would not get a legal right of action before the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, would they get it under the Act? The statute says, "Under an indenture executed after the 1st of October, 1845, an immediate estate or interest in any tenements or hereditaments, and the benefit of a condition or covenant respecting any tenements or hereditaments, may be taken, although the taker thereof be not named a party to the said indenture." Now what does that mean? It gets rid of the objection which would arise from a man not being made a party; but it does not get rid of the objection to a non-existing party. I suppose you could no more covenant now than you could before, simpliciter, with the first son of A, hereafter to be born, there being no other party to the indenture. That being so, I do not think this gets rid of that technical objection, and the words "an immediate estate or interest in any tenements or hereditaments" point to the same thing. Of course a non-existent person cannot take an immediate estate or interest, though I think it does not govern the latter words. I think it gets rid of the objection as to the covenantee not being a party when the covenant relates to lands; but I am by no means satisfied that it enables a person not a party to an indenture, and who is not in existence at the time, to sue. At all events, that does not appear to me to be within the purview of the Act, and here again, until some higher Court decides it otherwise, I should say it does not mean it.

Bankruptcy—Bill of Sale—Registration—Agreement not to register—Additional Bonus—Statement of Consideration—Defeasance or Condition—Misdescription of Grantor—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 8 and 10.

The consideration for a bill of sale was stated to be 242*l. advanced by the grantee to the grantors, the advance to be repaid by instalments, together with* 100*l. by way of interest and bonus. It was also verbally agreed that the bill of sale should not be registered, in consequence of which the bonus was higher than it would otherwise have been.*

The grantors, a father and his son, were described as mantle makers, carrying on business in partnership. They had in fact been partners, but at the date of the deed the partnership was dissolved, and the son was employed by the father as a clerk. Both father and son joined in the assignment, but the property comprised in the bill of sale belonged to the father alone. The father filed a liquidation petition:—

Held, first, that the agreement not to register was collateral, and not therefore a part of the consideration for the deed; secondly, that it was not a "defeasance or condition" to which the deed was subject under section 10, sub-section 3, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878; thirdly, that there was not a sufficient misdescription of the grantors to render the registration invalid.

Appeal from the County Court at Manchester.

On the 26th of November, 1880, James Storey and William French Storey (a son of James Storey) executed a bill of sale of certain furniture, chattels and effects in and about their dwelling house at Hazelhurst, and their business premises 7 Red Lion Street, Manchester, in favour of James Frederick Townend, to secure 342*l.* The grantors of the bill of sale were described as "both mantle manufacturers, carrying on business together at 7 Red Lion Street, aforesaid, under the style or firm of James Storey & Co." The bill of sale contained a recital that the grantee had agreed to lend 242*l.* upon the grantors agreeing to pay 100*l.* by way of interest and bonus, and then witnessed that in consideration of 242*l.* at or before the execution of these presents paid by the grantee, the grantors assigned the chattels therein specified to the grantee, subject to redemption on payment of 342*l.* in certain instalments as therein mentioned.

The bill of sale was duly registered, the affidavit filed on registration stating the residence and occupation of the grantors in the same terms as they were stated in the deed.

In August, 1881, James Storey filed a petition for liquidation under which a trustee, Popplewell, was appointed.

The trustee applied to have the bill of sale set aside, on the ground that the consideration for the deed was not truly stated, inasmuch as before its execution it was verbally agreed between the grantors and grantee that it should not be registered, for which the grantee demanded and obtained a much larger sum for bonus and interest than was usual in such cases.

There was evidence that the grantors had formerly carried on the business of mantle manufacturers in partnership together, but that they had compounded with their creditors and dissolved partnership before the execution of the bill of sale, when William French Storey was only his father's clerk.

The grantee alleged that prior to the execution of the deed the grantors represented to him that they were carrying on the business in partnership together.

The County Court Judge having refused the application the trustee appealed.

Ambrose, Q.C., and Bradbury, for the appellant.—The consideration has not been truly stated as required by the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 8—Hamilton v. Chaine (1). The condition not to register, for which a higher bonus was obtained, was a condition or defeasance within section 10, sub-section 3, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878; and therefore, not having been reduced into writing or set out in the affidavit filed on registration, this bill of sale is void—Ex parte Southam (2) and Ex parte Collins (3). There has also been a misdescription of W. F. Storey; he was only a clerk or manager in the business and he is described as one of the partners. This is enough to invalidate the bill of sale.

Winslow, Q.C., and J. M. Yates, for the respondent Townend, were not called on.

Bacon, C.J. (on March 6).—I cannot interfere with the order. The argument before me proceeded upon certain facts which were before the learned Judge, and were dealt with by him, and upon those facts three points have been argued before me. First, it is said that there was an agreement between the parties that this bill of sale should not be registered. Then, extending that a little, it is said that the 100*l.* which was paid for interest and bonus was agreed to be paid in consideration of the forbearance of the money-lender to register his bill of sale. That was before the learned Judge, and was the subject of evidence before him, and he negatives the proof of any such agreement; but if there had been any such agreement there is no necessity for stating in the bill of sale more than is in effect stated. The truth was told in the bill of sale. If it is neither a defeasance, nor a condition, nor a declaration of trust, by no violence of construction can it be said that it falls within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10, or that therefore it was necessary to state it in the bill of sale. I find it stated honestly and plainly, so that nobody could doubt upon that that it is not a part of the consideration: and with as much skill at least as was necessary to prevent it being considered as part of the consideration. The recital in the deed is made plain and distinct, the only consideration, which is fully and truly stated in the deed, being the advance of the 242*l.* The receipt for the money at the back of it is explicit in its terms, and nobody has doubted that the whole 242*l.* was handed over at the time the bill of sale was executed. The recital is that the borrower applied to the mortgagee to lend him 242*l.*, which he has agreed to do upon the mortgagor paying the sum of 100*l.* by way of interest and bonus, and upon having repayment secured of the sums advanced and payment of the bonus, making the principal sum of 342*l.* Where is the want of explicitness and distinct truth in that recital? Nobody can impeach it in the slightest degree. Now the Act of Parliament requires that the consideration shall be stated, which means fully and truly stated. The deed is plain in its terms. I cannot conceive that there can be any impeachment of the validity of the bill of sale under these circumstances. I discard the notion that there was a collateral agreement that the bill of sale should not be registered; and if there had been, I say it was not necessary to insert it in the bill of sale.

(2) 43 Law J. Rep. Bankr. 39; Law Rep. 17 Eq. 578.
(3) 44 Law J. Rep. Bankr. 78; Law Rep. 10 Chanc. 367.

Then the other objection to it is that the parties are not properly described in the affidavit. If the two come together and say, "We have or may have some interest in the property," what does it signify to the mortgagee to what degree or extent each of them is entitled to the property which is assigned? I think the description is perfectly just and right, and it is the description which these parties have assumed to themselves. Then when the affidavit is made in which the description is repeated, the man making the affidavit has the bill of sale before him, and he says that they who were therein described as carrying on business, and so on, executed this deed, and it was duly executed in his presence and attested by him. Every condition required by the Act of Parliament is fulfilled and complied with, and there is no ground whatever for disturbing the judgment on that point.

Then the third point is that the property is treated as joint property. Well, these two men had been partners together, and they had compounded with their creditors, the consequence of which was that if the composition was paid, the property which was theirs would remain theirs. The son must have had some interest in that property, and whether he had a large or small interest, or whatever it was, or whatever accretions had been made to it by the father during the period he carried on business alone, was wholly immaterial. The two men come and say, "Whatever our interest is we will assign it to you to secure this 240*l.*" The words are enough to cover every interest which they, or either of them, had. Mr. Ambrose says that the words "or either of them," are not to be found in the deed, and he grounds some argument upon this. I am against him. Whatever interest, large or small, either of them had might have passed by this deed; and, in my opinion, there is nothing which should induce me to say that this is not a perfectly valid bill of sale, and that the judgment pronounced by the learned Judge, who seems to have taken great pains in the matter, is not a right one. In my opinion he came to a right conclusion.

From this decision the trustee appealed.

The appeal came on to be heard on the 8th of June, 1882.

Ambrose, Q.C., and Bradbury, for the appellant.—The agreement not to register the bill of sale formed part of the consideration for the bill of sale, and should have been so stated. The real consideration was 242*l.* plus an agreement not to register. There was one entire contract—Hamilton v. Chaine (1). At any rate the agreement not to register was a defeasance or condition to which the bill of sale was subject, and under section 10, sub-section 3, it should have been set forth in the copy of the bill filed on registration—Ex parte Collins (3) and Ex parte Southam (2).

[JESSEL, M.R.—That case is quite distinguishable.]

Next we say there was a misdescription of the grantors. W. F. Storey was not a mantle maker at the time of the granting of the deed, nor were the father and son then carrying on business in partnership together. The grantors are described as "the mortgagor," and the property assigned is expressed to be the property of "the mortgagor," whereas in reality the goods were not joint property but belonged to the father alone.

Winslow, Q.C., and J. M. Yates, for the respondent, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R.—This is one of the many applications under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and if ever there was a case of splitting straws it has been in some of the decisions under that Act and the prior Act of 1854. Of course the Act was intended to give reasonable information to those who deal with persons who have executed bills of sale, but it is not meant to be a mere trap for those who advance money on such securities. It is the duty of a Judge to construe the Act fairly; but, on the other hand, he ought not to adopt a literal construction when it would lead to an absurdity. In the present case James Storey, one of the grantors of a bill of sale, has filed a liquidation petition. His son William French Storey, the other grantor, had no interest in the goods comprised in the deed. He had formerly been in partnership with his father, but the partnership had been dissolved, and it is alleged that the son was then occupying a subordinate position in the employment of his father. Townend, the grantee, is a money-lender. He alleges that the father represented to him that his son was in partnership with him; that he would not consent to have the bill of sale registered; and that higher terms were charged for the loan because the bill of sale was not to be registered. In the result, a bill of sale was given for 342*l.*, of which 100*l.* was to be paid by way of interest and bonus—not for the loan, for those words are struck out of the printed form, but by way of interest and bonus generally.

The first point raised is that the consideration for the bill of sale is untruly stated, because the agreement not to register was part of the consideration, and ought therefore to have been stated in the deed. What is it which the Act requires to be stated? It says that the bill of sale "shall set forth the consideration for which such bill of sale was given." The agreement not to register was a collateral agreement. The consideration for the deed was the 242*l.*; that was what the grantors got for giving the bill of sale. The agreement not to register was the motive which induced the grantors to consent to pay an additional bonus, but it was not part of the consideration for the deed. If it had been inserted at all in the deed, it would have been by way of a covenant by the grantee not to register the deed. It might as well be argued that every covenant in a deed is part of the consideration for it.

Then it was argued that if the agreement not to register was not part of the consideration for the deed, it comes within sub-section 3 of section 10 of the Act, as being a "defeasance or condition not contained in the body" of the deed. Is it a defeasance? As I have always understood, a "defeasance" is something which defeats the operation of a deed or document. If it is contained in the same deed it is called a condition. The agreement in question is not contained in any other document, for it was a parol agreement. It cannot, therefore, be a defeasance. Is it a condition? A condition is something which defeats or qualifies an estate. It is argued that the agreement not to register the bill of sale, if carried out, might defeat its operation in certain events—that is, in case of the bankruptcy of the grantor, or in case of an execution being levied on the goods. That is not so, nor was it ever intended by the parties; it was never intended to defeat the estate as against the grantee. The object was to protect the grantor's credit. They did not want to protect their creditors. It is an incident of the Act that it might defeat the grantor's security, but it would have been entirely contrary to the intention of the parties if the agreement had been inserted in the deed. It is not a condition, it is a mere collateral agreement, and it is not within either the words of the Act or their fair meaning.

The other point is certainly a most singular one. It arises in this way. James Storey is properly described by his residence and occupation. His son, who is joined with him as a grantor, is properly described as to his residence, but his occupation is described as that of a mantle manufacturer; and it is said that he, having ceased to be in partnership with his father, and having become a clerk in his father's employment, is not properly described as a mantle manufacturer. Before considering whether this is a misdescription, we must see whether it is material. If the requirements of the Act are complied with by the father being properly described, we need not consider whether there is any misdescription of the son. Now what does the Act say? It says that an affidavit made on registration shall give "a description of the residence and occupation of the person making or giving" the bill of sale. This is part of the registration; and if the bill of sale is not duly registered it is to be void as against the trustee in bankruptcy of the person whose goods are comprised in it. Who is the person against whose creditors the bill of sale is to be void if the Act is not complied with? James Storey. He is the bankrupt, and it is against his trustee that the deed is to be void. Who was "the person making or giving" the bill of sale? William French Storey, the son, joined in the deed; but he had nothing to give—he had no interest in the property comprised in the deed. His description therefore is immaterial. The Act means that the bill of sale must be duly registered quoad the person whose credit will be affected by it; and the joinder in it of a person who had no interest in the goods and had nothing to convey is mere surplusage. Is the description which is given of James Storey right? It is said that it is not, because he is described as carrying on business with his son. But all that the Act requires is that there should be a description of the residence and occupation of the grantor. Is the father's occupation the less duly described because the affidavit goes on to say that he is carrying on business in partnership with his son? I think not. These words are mere surplusage. The additional words are in no way misleading in this case; if they were it might be necessary to consider whether they could cut down the effect of the prior correct description. It appears to me that the father was sufficiently described, and I think we should be straining the words of the Act if we were to hold that the additional words render the previous description untrue. One other point was suggested. The two grantors are described together in the deed as "the mortgagor," and then the assignment is of all the furniture and other chattels "belonging to the mortgagor," and it was said that, because they are thus described and included in the word "mortgagor," they are to be tied together, and the assignment is to be read as applying only to those chattels which belong to them jointly, and cannot, therefore, have any operation when one of them owns all the property and the other owns none. Suppose that, instead of being included under the term "mortgagor," both of the grantors had been separately named in the assignment, would any lawyer doubt that the whole of the property belonging to them or either of them would pass by the assignment? It is quite plain that the whole of it would pass. The whole property must equally pass when the two grantors are, to avoid repetition, described under one word. I notice this argument, though it was only faintly urged, because it is the duty of a Judge to notice every argument which is addressed to him. I think that the decision ought to be affirmed, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I also am of opinion that the bill of sale is valid as against the trustee in the liquidation of James Storey. We need not consider what would have been the result if W. F. Storey had been a bankrupt.

The first objection is that the consideration for the deed is not truly stated in it. The consideration stated is the sum of 242*l.*, advanced by the grantee to the grantor, and the grantor agrees to pay 100*l.* by way of interest and bonus, and the sum of 342*l.* is secured by the deed. As I understand it, the sum of 242*l.* was actually advanced by the grantee to the grantor, and that in ordinary parlance is called, and I think rightly called, the consideration for the bill of sale. It is said that there was another consideration—namely, the promise of the grantee not to register the bill of sale. I do not think that is so. I think the consideration was the sum which is stated as such. We must look at the words of the Act, and I think we should be straining them if we were to hold that this agreement not to register was part of the consideration for the deed. It was part of the bargain between the grantor and the grantee which resulted in the consideration being given, but it was not part of the consideration itself.

The next point taken is that the bill of sale was subject to a defeasance or condition, because there was this agreement not to register it. The agreement was obviously not a defeasance. Was it a condition? I think not. Upon this point Ex parte Collins (3) is a valuable authority. In that case Lord Justice James made these important observations: "The Act does not say that a bill of sale shall be invalid if it does not contain a true representation of the transaction; it simply puts a registered bill of sale on the footing on which an unregistered one stood before the Act. If this transaction had taken place before the Act, is there any doubt that the creditor would have had all the rights which are in terms given by the bill of sale? The bill of sale is framed so as to conceal a fact which would have been very damaging to the debtor's credit—namely, that he agreed to give 30*l.* for a loan of 100*l.* for three months; but there is no such false recital as the debtor could take advantage of."

So here, as I understand, it is not necessary that the bill of sale should state every part of the bargain between the parties; and this is a mere collateral agreement.

With regard to the alleged misdescription, the son is not a bankrupt, and if we construe sections 8 and 10 of the Act together, as I think we ought to do, I am of opinion that the residence and occupation, which must be stated, are those of the bankrupt or execution debtor, and not those of some other person. There is no misdescription of the liquidating debtor in the present case: his residence and occupation are properly described. There is this addition, "carrying on business together" at the address which is mentioned. Supposing this meant that the father and the son were then carrying on business in partnership together, does it render the previous description of the father's residence and occupation incorrect? It is mere surplusage, and it is not shewn to have been in any way misleading or to have misled any one. Of course, there might be additional words which would be misleading, and in such a case it might well be that the description would not satisfy the requirements of the Act. The other objection is really the same thing in another shape.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

[IN THE COURT OF APPEAL.]

LORD SELBORNE, L.C.
JESSEL, M.R.
COTTON, L.J.
Nov. 4.

THE EAST AND WEST INDIA DOCK COMPANY v. HILL.

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy of Assignee of Lease—Disclaimer by Trustee of Assignee—Sub-demise at Nominal Rent—Liability of Original Lessee on Covenants—Rent accrued since Disclaimer—Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 23.

The disclaimer of a lease by the trustee of a bankrupt assignee of a lease has no effect upon the rights and liabilities subsisting as between the lessor and original lessee, and the lessor is entitled to recover from the original lessee rent which has accrued since the date of the disclaimer.

Semble,—the Court would order possession of the disclaimed property to be delivered over to the lessee, if possession was capable of being given.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of Hall, V.C., overruling a demurrer put in by him to the plaintiffs' statement of claim.

The facts were as follows:—

On the 2nd of December, 1875, the plaintiffs demised a public-house, called the Brunswick Tap, to the defendant for twenty-one years, from the 25th of March, 1875, at the annual rent of 300*l.*, and subject to the observance and performance of the covenants on the lessee's part contained in the lease.

On the same day the defendant, in consideration of a sum of 1,150*l.* paid to him by Clarke, assigned the premises to him for the remainder of the term, Clarke covenanting with the defendant to pay the rent reserved in the lease, and to perform the covenants, and indemnify the defendant from liability for rent and covenants.

On the 3rd of December, 1875, Clarke demised the premises to Truman, Hanbury & Co. for the residue of the term, except the last three days, at a peppercorn rent, by way of mortgage, to secure the repayment of 1,000*l.* advanced by them.

On the 10th of February, 1881, Clarke filed a petition for liquidation, and his trustee, in March, applied to the Court for leave to disclaim the debtor's interest in the lease, on the ground that the property was not worth the rent, and he served notice of his application on the defendant, on the mortgagees, and on the plaintiffs. The application was heard on the 9th of April, 1881, and was opposed both by the plaintiffs and the mortgagees, on the ground that the disclaimer would destroy in the one case the lease, in the other the under-lease. The Registrar, however, gave leave to the trustee to disclaim, and his order was upheld by the Court of Appeal in June, 1881.

The case on appeal is reported 50 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 789; Law Rep. 17 Ch. D. 759.

The plaintiffs subsequently brought the present action against the defendant, claiming rent due up to the date of the issue of the writ.

The defendant demurred to so much of the claim as required payment of rent accrued due between the date of adjudication and disclaimer, and in the alternative to so much of the claim as claimed payment of rent accrued since the date of disclaimer.

Hall, V.C., overruled the demurrer.

W. Pearson, Q.C., and McSwinney, for the appellant.—By the operation of the disclaimer the lease is to be deemed to be surrendered—that is, a surrender must be assumed, with all its logical consequences. The entire lease is got rid of, and not a part of it only—In re Latham; ex parte Gregg (1) and Ex parte Allen; in re Fussell (2); and therefore the liability of the original lessee on his covenants to the lessor cannot be enforced. The term being gone, all the rights and liabilities incident to it have gone too. It would be hard upon the lessee, who has no longer the property, and therefore derives no benefit from it, that he should still remain liable in respect of it.

The present question has not yet been before the Court of Appeal.

In the case of Ex parte Walton (3) no opinion is expressed as to the effect of a disclaimer by the trustee of a bankrupt assignee of a lease upon the position of the original lessee; and in Harding v. Preece (4) Williams, J., treats the point as open, except for the decision of Hall, V.C., in this very case, and which he followed as the decision of a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction.

In Ex parte Stephens (5) the question as to the right of the trustee in bankruptcy, who had disclaimed, to the fixtures, that is, as to the right of severance, depended on whether the lease was still in existence or was gone, and the Court held that the trustee, although still in possession of the leasehold, could not remove them, because, as James, L.J., says, "by the joint operation of the disclaimer and the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act the term is to be deemed for all purposes to have come to an end on the day of the adjudication. . . . . When he did disclaim the lease the term was at once gone."

So, too, in Ex parte Brook; in re Roberts (6).

[LORD SELBORNE.—In those cases there was no question as to any right of third parties.]

No; but the question as to the determination of the term was before the Court. See, too, In re Mercer and Moore (7).

In Manning v. Flight (8), a case under the Act of 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 75, it was held that, on the delivery up of the lease by the bankrupt assignee, the original lessee remained liable on his covenants, but there were no words in the earlier Act which had the effect of determining the term.

The plaintiffs in this case have a remedy against the sub-lessees, whose rights and liabilities are unaffected—Smalley v. Hardinge (9) and Ex parte Walton (3); and have also their remedy under the final clause of the section.

In Smyth v. North (10) the only thing necessary for decision was that the original lessee was liable to pay rent which accrued due before the disclaimer, and Bramwell, B., was clearly of opinion that the lessee would not have been liable to pay rent accrued subsequently to the disclaimer.

The cases of O'Farrell v. Stephenson (11) and Taylor v. Gillott (12) were referred to.

Kekewich, Q.C., and W. Latham, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

LORD SELBORNE, L.C.—We are all of opinion, looking to the decisions which have taken place under this and the former statutes in various Courts, and to the opinions which have been expressed (without determining whether those decisions have been so made as to bind this Court), that they amount to so considerable a mass of judicial opinion expressed in a certain direction as to make it proper that that opinion, if it is to be overruled, should be overruled by a higher authority.

The only thing that one may safely call clear in this matter is that the construction of the clause in the statute is a matter of considerable difficulty. An opinion has been expressed—I need not say whether in a manner which, if I were forced to determine it, I should hold absolutely binding upon this Court, which is the same tribunal—but an opinion has been expressed in the case of Ex parte Walton (3), that, as between the original lessor and the person holding under him as under-lessee, the lease could not be destroyed by any disclaimer—the effect of the original lease remains, and is not taken away by the statute; and although I certainly do appear to have thought that it might not have been necessary to determine that question for the purpose of the case, yet, as a matter of fact, the Lords Justices did express a deliberate opinion to that effect, and they embodied it in the terms of their order. The Court of law in Smyth v. North (10), undoubtedly with some difference of opinion (but it was yet a difference which I can hardly reconcile with the present appellant's argument even as to Lord Bramwell), decided, I think, in the same sense. I will not speak of later decisions, because they really depend upon those authorities; but before those authorities, under an earlier Bankruptcy Act, Lord Tenterden and the Court of Queen's Bench, in Manning v. Flight (8), had decided that the effect of that earlier Act, when it said that not only the assignee disclaiming, but the bankrupt delivering up the deeds, was to be absolutely relieved from all liabilities under the lease, was that it operated only as between the persons expressly relieved from liabilities by the statute and the lessor, and left untouched all other rights which the lessor might have had under the covenants embodied in the lease against anybody else. I agree that the word "surrender" occurs here and did not occur in that statute, in that seems to me to be the only clear difference; but in endeavouring to consider whether the undoubted effect of that statute in favour of the bankrupt by the delivery up of the lease to the lessor must not necessarily involve something between those parties at all events tantamount to surrender, I have great difficulty in seeing how it could be otherwise.

So that it does appear to me that the more recent authorities decided upon this particular statute were led up to by the previous authorities decided under the statute which preceded it. I have said that there is undoubted difficulty; but, on principle, it is certainly desirable in construing a statute, if it be possible, to avoid extending it to collateral effects and consequences beyond the scope of the general object and policy of the statute itself, and injurious to third parties with whose interest the statute need not, and does not, profess to directly deal; and not only in many cases, but in this case, upon the assumption of the lease at the peppercorn rent being a subsisting lease, it seems quite manifest that the effect of the statute, if it were construed according to the appellant's argument, would be to do a great deal more harm to third parties outside the administration of bankruptcy than it would do good to anybody else.

Then it is further to be observed that the words are not, in several points, very clear, and, after all, what is spoken of is the property of the bankrupt and the property disclaimed, which, "if a lease, is to be deemed to have been surrendered on the same date"; certainly those words leave a good deal to be supplied by construction as to the consequences of its operation. It is clear what the statute meant as between the persons exonerated expressly and the persons to whom they were liable; but what is to happen as to third parties is certainly not expressed in the way in which I think it might have been expected to be if the same effect had been meant to be attributed to a surrender by a trustee in bankruptcy as must be attributed to a voluntary surrender by a person not a bankrupt voluntarily accepted by the lessor.

Then follow the words which have several times been referred to: "Any person interested in any disclaimed property may apply to the Court, which may order the property to be delivered up, or do what is just." If a lease is the disclaimed property, any person interested in the lease may apply, and if the Court thinks it just that the lease should be delivered up, it may be. Suppose that the original lessee, having assigned to a person who becomes bankrupt, is held liable, as these authorities tend to hold him liable, upon his covenant to the lessor, and being called upon by the lessor to pay his rent he applies to the Court and says, The bankrupt to whom I made an assignment and his trustee have disclaimed, the landlord holds me liable for the rent, and he therefore is not content as between him and me to treat the lease as at an end, is it not just and equitable that I should have the possession? If the possession were beneficial he would have an interest in making that application. I shall not attempt to decide beforehand a question not before the Court, but if it were just that the possession should be delivered up to him, I cannot help thinking that the Court would have sufficient authority and power to do it; and if, as in the present case apparently, that could not be done, because there is an under-lessee who would have had the right to retain possession of the property, still the question only comes to this—who is to prove for the loss in bankruptcy? I have referred to these as considerations which have evidently influenced, or probably influenced, the minds of the Courts which have had the questions before them, and which have hitherto all concurred in similar judgments and opinions, and, as I say, in that state of things the Court does not consider that it ought now to depart from what has been previously decided and dealt with.

JESSEL, M.R.—Concurring as I do in the observations of the Lord Chancellor, I merely wish to make one remark—that, having listened with great attention to the elaborate argument addressed to us, I see no reason whatever, as far as I am concerned, to alter the opinion I have already expressed at considerable length in the case of Ex parte Walton (3).

COTTON, L.J.—I agree in the judgment expressed by the Lord Chancellor.

Adjudication — Power to Annul — Insufficient Petitioning Creditor's Debt— Advertisement—Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), s. 10.

An adjudication in bankruptcy not appealed from and duly advertised will not afterwards be annulled under the general jurisdiction of the Court on the ground that there was no sufficient petitioning creditor's debt to support the adjudication.

Appeal from the County Court at Ryde.

In May, 1881, the debtor, a miller, realised his property to the amount of 100*l.*, and went to Canada, for the purpose of seeing his son settled there, as he alleged, but without any intention of remaining there himself.

On the 19th of May two creditors, French, whose debt was alleged to amount to 42*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.*, and Clark, whose debt was admitted to be 25*l.* 10*s.*, presented a petition in bankruptcy, the act of bankruptcy alleged being that the debtor, being a trader, had departed from his dwelling-house with intent to defeat or delay his creditors; and on the 5th of July the debtor was adjudicated bankrupt, and the adjudication was duly advertised. Proceedings were taken in the bankruptcy, and French was appointed trustee. Towards the end of July the debtor returned from Canada, and on the 4th of October applied to the County Court Judge to annul the adjudication and set aside the proceedings in the bankruptcy on the ground that he disputed the debt to French. The County Court Judge directed an issue to try the amount of French's debt, and the jury found that it amounted to 22*l.* only, so that the two debts on which the adjudication was made did not together amount to 50*l.* Thereupon the County Court Judge made an order that the adjudication should be declared void and all proceedings thereunder invalid, and directed French to pay the costs. French appealed from this order.

Crump, for the appellant.—There was no appeal against the adjudication, which having been duly advertised is by section 10 conclusive. The Court has power to annul an adjudication in three cases only —first, under its general jurisdiction where good reason is shewn—Ex parte Ashworth (1); secondly, under section 84, where no trustee is appointed; and, thirdly, under section 28, where a composition or scheme is assented to. If this adjudication is to be annulled it must be under the general jurisdiction, but no good reasons have been shewn. The absence of a sufficient petitioning creditor's debt is clearly no good reason on the authorities—Robson on Bankruptcy (2), Revell v. Blake (3) and Ex parte Hooper (4).

He also cited Ex parte Wigg; in re Johnson (5).

F. C. Willis, for the debtor.—The cases cited are distinguishable, as in them the debtor had an opportunity of disputing the petitioning creditor's debt. In this case, the debtor had no opportunity of disputing it till the time for appealing against the order had elapsed. As soon as he returned to England he took immediate steps to get the order annulled. The order of the County Court was, therefore, right under the circumstances of this case.

No reply was called for.

BACON, C.J.—In my opinion the proceedings of the 4th of October were a mistake. Proceedings in bankruptcy are for the benefit not only of the petitioning creditor, but of all the creditors. To get rid of all troubles and expenses the advertisement of the adjudication is made evidence of the fact against all the world. If the Act does not mean that, it means nothing at all. Here regular proceedings were taken in bankruptcy, the two debts amounting to more than 50*l.*; that was proved, and the adjudication was made, and there was no attempt to appeal against that order, and the time for appealing against it has elapsed. Then what right has the debtor to annul the adjudication? The petitioning creditor's debt is one of the elements enabling the Court to pronounce the adjudication, and the Court must be satisfied that there are debts which exceed the amount. Then the adjudication is advertised, and thereupon the rights of the creditors arise—not of the petitioning creditor alone—to have the estate administered in bankruptcy. What could the debtor complain of? He admits that he went to Canada with 100*l.*, and admits that he knew of the adjudication in the month of July when he returned. Then he finds some one to advise him that he can get the adjudication annulled and deprive the creditors of their rights under the administration of the estate in bankruptcy. Even if less than the amount of the alleged debts was due, that can be no ground to set aside the adjudication. Revell v. Blake (3) decides that very clearly. It is clear from the judgments in that case that advertisement in the Gazette is conclusive. At Law Reports, 7 C.P. p. 308, Chief Justice Bovill says, "By the 10th section a copy of the Gazette containing an order of the Court shall be conclusive evidence of a debtor having been adjudged bankrupt, and of the date of the adjudication." At p. 310 the same learned Judge said: "If the contention of the defendant could be maintained, then a party might, after the failure of a series of appeals, and after any lapse of time, contest the question of the jurisdiction of the Court in any action in which the validity of the adjudication might be material. This seems to me precisely what the Act was intended to prevent." The whole of the judgment is extremely instructive, and shews the care the Judge bestowed on the matter. Mr. Justice Byles says the same thing. He says, "I think it has been sufficiently shewn, by reference to the sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, that this objection cannot now be sustained. . . . One great object of the recent Bankruptcy Act was to supersede the old expensive enquiries at Nisi Prius as to petitioning creditors' debts, trading, and act of bankruptcy by making the order of adjudication conclusive evidence of these essentials." Mr. Justice Brett entertained some other notion. But the other Judge, Mr. Justice Grove, entirely agrees with the reasons stated by the Lord Chief Justice. In my opinion, therefore, the County Court Judge had no power to annul the adjudication. There is not even any reason suggested why he should have annulled it, taking away from the creditors the right of having the estate administered, and throwing a heavy burthen, as it would appear, on the trustee. I wish it to be understood that I decide this case on the general principle recognised in bankruptcy. I say that this absconding debtor comes too late, in the month of October, to set aside an adjudication which the statute says shall be valid and binding from the time of the advertisement. I think the order was altogether wrong. It is no reason, even if the petitioning creditor's debt is not established, that the other creditors should be deprived of their rights. The order must be discharged in toto, with costs of this appeal and costs in the Court below.

STANFORD v. ROBERTS.

Jurisdiction — Practice — Settled Estate — Infant — Costs of Application to Parliament.

Where an estate was settled on legal limitations in favour of one for life, with remainder to an infant tenant-in-tail, the Court declined to order that the costs of an application to Parliament for a private Act to carry into effect a proposed sale which was beneficial to the estate should be borne by the estate whether such application were or were not successful.

But, the tenant-for-life consenting, the Court, being of opinion that the proposed application to Parliament would be for the benefit of the infant, sanctioned the application on the terms that the costs were to be borne by the tenant-for-life, unless an Act of Parliament was obtained otherwise directing.

Adjourned summons.

W. Stanford, who died in April, 1853, by his will, dated the 10th of December, 1852, devised all his real estate to Smith and Williams for the term of 1,000 years upon certain trusts, and subject thereto to the use of his sons and their children in strict settlement, with remainder to the use of his daughter, the plaintiff, for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to her first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainders over. The will contained the usual power of sale by the trustees, to be exercised with the consent of the person for the time being entitled in possession, if of full age, the usual directions being given for the investment of the proceeds of sale in real estate to be settled to the like uses.

There were no sons of the testator. The plaintiff, in 1867, married Mr. Benett, and had issue one son, an infant of the age of thirteen years or thereabouts, who was made a defendant to this action.

In July, 1854, a decree was made for carrying the trusts of the will into execution, and for administration of the real and personal estate of the testator.

On the 17th of May, 1882, a provisional agreement was entered into between the plaintiff, who was the tenant-for-life, and the Corporation of Brighton, for the sale to the corporation, for the sum of 50,000*l.*, of sixty-three acres of land, forming part of the estates settled by the will, for the purposes of a public park.

The present summons, dated the 11th of June, 1882, was taken out by the plaintiff, asking, in effect, that the agreement of the 17th of May, 1882, might be approved and carried into effect; that the plaintiff might be at liberty to apply to Parliament for power to sell the land; that the draft bill for such purpose might be settled by the Judge; and that the costs of the application and all proceedings consequent thereon might be costs in the cause.

There were certain funds in Court in the cause which represented the proceeds of sale of portions of the settled estate.

It appeared that the sixty-three acres comprised in the agreement formed part of the park or ornamental grounds attached to the mansion-house of the settled estate, and were not subject to the power of sale contained in the will. There was evidence that the mansion-house was not used for residential purposes, and that, by reason of the extension of the town of Brighton (which had now reached to the outskirts of the settled estate), and for other reasons, it was probable that when any person became absolutely entitled under the will, either the house would be converted into a villa residence, or the site on which it stood, together with the whole of this part of the estate, would be converted into a building estate. There was also evidence that the price now offered by the Corporation of Brighton was very nearly the value of the land as building land. The agreement for sale contained a covenant that the portion of the land adjoining the mansion-house should not be built upon, and it was urged that this circumstance, and the fact that the land agreed to be sold was to be used as a public park, would materially enhance the value of the rest of the estate for building purposes.

A private Act of Parliament for the purpose of enabling the trustees to grant building leases had been obtained in the year 1871, but such Act did not extend to this portion of the estate.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and J. Beaumont, for the summons, having opened the case, KAY, J., objected that the Court had no jurisdiction to charge an estate settled upon legal limitations in favour of an infant with the costs of an application to Parliament, whether such application were successful or not. He referred to Dunne v. Dunne (1).

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and J. Beaumont, submitted that the Court had jurisdiction where the application was manifestly for the benefit of the infant. They referred to In re Arbuckle (2). They, however, proposed, on behalf of the plaintiff, that a clause should be inserted into the intended Act of Parliament providing for the costs, the plaintiff being willing personally to pay the same in the event of the application to Parliament being unsuccessful.

Kekewich, Q.C., and Whiteway, for the Corporation of Brighton.

Cecil Russell, for the trustees of the will.

KAY, J.—The question what power the Court has to impose on the estate of an infant or upon a settled estate the costs of prospective improvements has been very much considered of late, and the last decision, to which I have several times referred, is In re Venour's Settled Estates (3). In that case the Master of the Rolls decided that the Court has no power under the Settled Estates Acts to charge, mortgage or sell part of a settled estate in order to make roads and sewers on building land forming other part of the estate; nor has it power to apply for that purpose money which is liable to be laid out in the purchase of lands to be settled to the same uses as the settled estate. His decision on the point is quite express, and was pronounced after considering a good number of cases, and amongst others the case of In re Gilbert (4), in which Vice-Chancellor Stuart directed money which happened to be in Court, subject to the same uses as the building land, to be applied in making roads, which the Master of the Rolls seems to have disapproved; and to the more recent cases of In re Newman's Settled Estates (5)—in which the Lord Justice James allowed part of similar moneys to be applied in building a new house—and Drake v. Trefusis (6), in which a similar thing was done; but the Court declined to lay out the money on repairs and improvements of old buildings, proceeding on the ground that the laying out of money in erecting new buildings, and in repairs and improvements to old buildings, rest on a different footing. The Lord Justice James, in Drake v. Trefusis (6), said, "We never intended to go further than this, that the expending money in building a house on a vacant piece of ground forming part of the settled property is in substance the same thing as buying a house"—that is to say, where the trust is to buy new land, you may rebuild on other part of the settled estate, because that is the same as buying new land; and he went on to say, "Repairs and permanent improvements do not come within this principle. I am therefore of opinion that the proposed expenditure in reinstating the mansion cannot be sanctioned, nor any outlay in permanent improvements which do not put new buildings on the ground." And I have referred very often to the case of Dunne v. Dunne (1), where the limitations being legal, and the claim to raise money to improve the settled land out of a fund liable to be invested in land to be settled to the same uses, it was said by the Lord Justice Knight-Bruce that the thing could not be done without an Act of Parliament—that is to say, that the Court of Chancery had no inherent jurisdiction, and no power, even under the Settled Estates Acts, to charge an estate which is settled on legal limitations with the costs of proposed improvements. Now the Chancery Division, in the present case, by this summons, as it originally stood, is asked to allow an application to be made to Parliament for an Act sanctioning a sale of part of the settled estate, which there is no power to make either under the trusts of the will, or under the Settled Estates Act, or under the private Act of Parliament which was obtained. To say now that in any event, whether the Act is passed or not, these costs shall be paid out of the settled estate, seems to me in principle the same thing as allowing repairs or improvements of the settled estate to be a charge upon the settled estate, which, according to In re Venour's Settled Estates (3), and according to my very clear opinion ever since the case of Dunne v. Dunne (1), it is not within the inherent jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery to order, and I feel very considerable difficulty in now making an order, that, in any event, whether the Act is passed or not, the costs should be a charge upon the settled estate, or should be paid out of moneys which represent part of the settled estate, which have arisen from a sale already made, and are subject to a trust for investment in land again. My present view is that the Court of Chancery has no inherent jurisdiction to make such an order as that, and that it requires either the authority of an Act of Parliament, as was said in Dunne v. Dunne (1), or an express trust in the instrument of settlement to enable the Court to do anything of the kind. Therefore, if that kind of application were pressed, I should certainly desire that the opinion of the Court of Appeal should be taken, and should decline to make an order. I understand, however, that it is not pressed. Application is made by the tenant-for-life that the Court will, on behalf of the infant tenant-in-tail in remainder, express an opinion that the purposes of this Act of Parliament, if obtained, will on the whole be beneficial to the estate. The facts are these: [His Lordship then referred to the facts of the case, shewing the desirability of the proposed sale, and continued:] But the tenant-for-life now says, "I am willing to vary the application to this extent: let it be at my own risk as to costs; if the application fails I will take the costs upon myself. I will try to get a clause introduced making the costs a charge on the estate; if I do so, well and good: if not, I will pay the costs myself." Therefore, all that the Court is now required to do is to express an opinion, which may be of some use and value, as it is said, in applying for the Act of Parliament, in the character of guardian of the infant defendant. On behalf of the infant defendant I feel myself at liberty to express my opinion. I think the proposed Act will be beneficial, so far as I am able to judge, speaking in the character which the Court has of guardian of an infant defendant. But I desire it to be clearly understood that I do not in any way intimate the least opinion that these costs could be charged on the settled estate or the interest of the infant unless the Act should be obtained. The order will be that the Court, on behalf of the infant ward of Court, being of opinion that the proposed application to Parliament will be for the benefit of the infant, sanctions such application on the terms that all the expenses of such application are to be borne by the tenant-for-life, unless an Act of Parliament is obtained otherwise directing.

BROWN v. BURDETT.

Will—Direction to Brick up House and Furniture for Twenty Years—Validity of Trust—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 3.

Testatrix devised her freehold dwelling-house, yard, garden and outbuildings, and also her furniture, to trustees, with directions to them to block up the doors, windows and chimneys of the house, except the kitchens and hall, and to leave the house with the furniture in it so blocked up for the period of twenty years from her death; and further, to put a married couple in the occupation of the kitchens, garden and outbuildings, at a nominal rent of one halfpenny per week, in consideration of their looking after the premises, and in particular the blockade; and after the determination of the term of twenty years, and subject to the trusts aforesaid, the testatrix devised the premises to devisees beneficially :—Held, that the trusts of the real and personal estate were invalid, and that such real and personal estate passed as undisposed of for the term of twenty years from the death of the testatrix.

Ann Maria Burdett, who died in 1872, by her will dated the 22nd of May, 1868, and two codicils dated respectively the 26th of September, 1868, and 22nd of May, 1871, appointed the plaintiff, Thomas Brown, and the defendants, R. Burdett and T. Baxter, her executors and trustees, and devised her dwelling-house, situate at Gilmorton, in the county of Leicester, with the yard, garden, orchard, carriage-house, buildings and appurtenances, then in her occupation, and also her household goods and furniture, linen, china and carriages, to her trustees, upon trust that they should immediately after her funeral, on the same day, remove out of her dwelling-house all her plate, jewellery, trinkets and watches, to be disposed of as mentioned in her will, and then upon further trust, as soon as might be after her funeral and on the same day as far as practicable, and in their personal presence, and also of Thos. Worth, he having been previously requested to attend her funeral (provision having been made to that end immediately after her decease), to proceed to cause all the windows in and about the said premises (except the doors and windows belonging to the kitchen, back kitchen, middle attic and hall) to be closely and effectually boarded up, and nailed with good long nails, to be bent down on the inside; the inside shutters to be closed and then covered up with sheet iron and zinc; the window in her bedroom at the back to be removed and the opening to be bricked up as part of the wall; the fireplace in her bedroom to be effectually bricked up, and then the door closed and bricked up in a good and substantial manner; the opening from the kitchen to her bedroom to be covered with zinc or iron a foot larger each way than the openings, and then bricks to be stacked upon it and mortared down or cemented; the several doors to be sealed up with large boards screwed down with long screws, and sealed with seals, one to be provided for that purpose by each of her trustees, and each seal to be a distinct seal from the other; the chimneys to have a piece of slate placed over them so as to effectually cover them, and then bricked over and cemented. And she directed that all the said articles of furniture, linen, china and carriages thereinbefore mentioned, and that might be inside the rooms so directed to be blocked up as aforesaid at her decease, including her clock, should be left therein and not be removed therefrom; and she directed that the work so directed to be done should be renewed and repaired as and when occasion should require, so as to keep the same in a good, effectual and sufficient state of repair for the term of twenty years next after her decease; and, subject to the trusts and directions aforesaid, upon trust that the trustees should place some respectable married couple (with full power to remove at pleasure), to be selected by them or him, her said trustees or trustee, or a majority of them, from time to time as occasion should require, in the actual occupation of the said kitchen, back kitchen, middle attic and hall, and to allow them to live therein and to occupy the same, and also the yard, garden, orchard and other outbuildings belonging thereto, at a nominal rent of one halfpenny per week, in consideration of their taking care of the said messuage or tenement or premises, and particularly the blockade to the said doors, windows, chimneys and other places therein, and to see that the same were in nowise tampered or meddled with, and, upon any meddling or tampering therewith, or any need of repairs, forthwith to give notice thereof to her said trustees or trustee in order that the same might be immediately attended to. And from and after the determination of the said term of twenty years, and subject to the trusts aforesaid, she gave and devised her said messuage or tenement, with the yard, garden, orchard, carriage-house, outbuildings and appurtenances, then in her occupation, unto and to the use of the said R. Burdett and his assigns, during his life, and after his decease, but subject to the said term of twenty years and to the trusts aforesaid, unto and to the use of the said T. Baxter, his heirs and assigns, for ever. And she further directed her trustees to visit and inspect the said messuage or tenement or premises once in every three months to see that the trusts thereinbefore contained were effectually carried out. Provided always, and she thereby declared her mind and will to be that, if and in case her said trustees, or any one or more of them, should neglect or refuse to carry out the trusts aforesaid in reference to her real and personal estate at Gilmorton aforesaid, that then or in such case any real or personal estate by her given or intended for such trustee so neglecting or refusing, should go to, and she thereby gave and devised the same unto, Henry Penfold, Charles Bloxsam and Martin Bloxsam, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, as tenants-in-common.

The will and codicils were disputed in the Court of Probate, but ultimately established in 1875. The plaintiff then brought an administration suit, which now came on for further consideration, and one question was as to the validity of the trusts of the term of twenty years.

Millar, Q.C., and Brett, for the plaintiff, submitted the case to the Court.

Marten, Q.C., and S. Hall, for R. Burdett.—We contend that the house and furniture directed to be blockaded are undisposed of for the term of the blockade. The will only takes effect under section 3 of the Wills Act, which empowers "every person to devise, bequeath or dispose of by his will . . . . all real estate and all personal estate which he shall be entitled to at law or in equity at the time of his death, and which, if not so devised, bequeathed or disposed of, would devolve upon" his heir-at-law or personal representative. That section gives a positive power of disposition, but here the testatrix has not made any positive disposition at all, and the negative trust to leave the property unenjoyed for twenty years is, in effect, an intestacy for that period. The trust cannot be supported as a charitable trust.

Hemming, Q.C., and Yate Lee, for T. Baxter, submitted the case to the Court.

Langley, for Henry Penfold.—The trust is a valid trust, and ought to be carried out according to the terms of the testatrix's will, so that if the trustees fail to discharge their duties the donees over are entitled under the forfeiture clause. There is nothing illegal or against public policy in the condition—Jarman on Wills (1). The objection taken on section 3 of the Wills Act is groundless, for here the property is disposed of to the trustees to allow the married couple to live there. If the trust had been for a period of one, two or three months from the testatrix's death, it could hardly have been contended that it was invalid, and if so, the length of the period should make no difference.

E. K. Karslake, Q.C., and Phillips, for the co-heiresses-at-law.

BACON, V.C., said that he should unseal this useless property, and made a declaration that the trusts of the real and personal estate in question were invalid, and that such real and personal estate passed as undisposed of for the term of twenty years from the testatrix's death.

POPPLE v. SYLVESTER.

Mortgage — Covenant — Judgment — Merger.

A mortgagor covenanted to pay principal and interest on a day certain, and after that day to pay interest so long as any part of the principal remained due on the security:—Held, that the liability on the covenant to pay future interest was not destroyed by a judgment for the principal sum and interest.

On the 30th of July, 1864, the defendant, who was a beneficed clergyman, mortgaged certain policies of insurance to the plaintiff to secure an advance of 3,000*l.* thereunder, and interest. The defendant covenanted to pay the principal sum of

(1) 4th ed., chap. xxvii.

3,000*l.*, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. in the meanwhile, on the 30th of January, 1865, the day fixed for redemption; and, further, that in case the principal sum of 3,000*l.* should not be repaid on the day appointed, "so long as the said sum of 3,000*l.*, or any part thereof, should remain due on the security" of the mortgage, to pay interest on the part remaining unpaid. The defendant also covenanted to keep up the policies; that it should be lawful for the plaintiff, in default of his doing so, to pay the premiums; and further that he would repay the amount of premiums paid by the plaintiff, with interest at seven per cent.

On the 23rd of September, 1869, the plaintiff obtained judgment against the defendant for 3,145*l.* 10*s.* 7*d.*, the amount then due for principal and interest, in respect of the loan of 3,000*l.*, and for a premium on a policy comprised in the mortgage which had been paid by the plaintiff. The defendant's benefice was sequestered, and payments were made to the plaintiff by the sequestrator from time to time, which satisfied the amount for which judgment was obtained with interest at four per cent.

The statement of claim alleged that the plaintiff was entitled to be paid by the defendant 652*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*, being the difference between interest at seven per cent. and four per cent. he had received from the sequestrator, and a sum of 1,753*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.* in respect of premiums paid on the policies comprised in the mortgage since the judgment was obtained. The plaintiff claimed an account of what was due on the mortgage of July, 1864, and a subsequent mortgage, and payment of what should be found due, and costs.

The defendant demurred to so much of the statement of claim as related to the 652*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.* and 1,753*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.*, but at the bar the demurrer was given up in respect of the latter sum.

Cookson, Q.C., and Plummer, for the demurrer.—The debt and the covenants to pay the debt and interest are all merged in the judgment—The European Central Railway Company v. The Oriental Financial Corporation (1).

(1) 46 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 57; Law Rep. 4 Ch. D. 33.

Glasse, Q.C., and Nalder, for the statement of claim.—The security remained notwithstanding the judgment; the mortgagee could foreclose, or pursue any other remedy on his security, and the money was still due on the security, though it was not a debt. The question depended on what was the contract between the parties, and the contract was to pay so long as anything was due on the security. The plaintiff was therefore entitled to the full interest—Cook v. Fowler (2), In re The Agricultural Insurance Company; ex parte Hughes (3) and Goodchap v. Roberts (4).

Cookson, Q.C., replied.

FRY, J.—It appears to me I am bound to look at the express contract between the parties, and to consider how far that is put an end to by the judgment. Now the contract is this: so long as anything shall remain due on the security, to pay interest at the rate of seven per cent. Has that been extinguished by the judgment obtained in September, 1869? In other words, what was the effect of that judgment? In my view that was to extinguish the covenant to pay the 3,000*l.* on the day named. But it appears to me it did not determine the security. It did not put an end to the charge. The security on the policies remained. The defendant himself has taken the same view, because, by not arguing the portion of the demurrer which related to the premiums, he has admitted that the premiums were paid during the continuance of the security, because it is only during the continuance of that security that the mortgagee could pay the premiums and recover them. However, I proceed not on any admissions, but on my own view. I hold that, although the prior covenant was extinguished, the charge remains. I hold, therefore, that the express covenant to pay interest so long as the same or any part thereof shall remain on the security remains.

The demurrer must be overruled with costs. There is only one observation I think I ought to make. The case of The European Central Railway Company v. The Oriental Financial Corporation (1) was a decision not only by Vice-Chancellor Malins, but also by the Court of Appeal. In that case the company had granted debentures, and bound themselves to pay to the debenture holders the amounts of the debentures with interest at six per cent., the principal sum to be paid on the 11th of October, 1865, and the interest to be paid in the meantime until the repayment thereof. Now the Court held that the words "until repayment" meant until the time fixed for repayment. There was, therefore, in that case no covenant to pay interest beyond that date. The case is, therefore, entirely unlike this case, in which there is an express covenant to pay after that date. The case, therefore, seems to me in no way to bear on the present case.

Practice—Service of Writ out of Jurisdiction—Order XI. rule 1.

No leave will now be given to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction except in cases within Order XI. rule 1.

This was an ex parte appeal from Day, J., sitting as Vacation Judge, refusing the plaintiff leave to serve the writ on the defendant, who was out of the jurisdiction.

The action was to administer the estate of a testator who was domiciled in Ireland. The defendant, who was the sole trustee and executor under the will, lived in Scotland, and had proved the will in Ireland.

All the testator's property was in Ceylon.

The plaintiff was the sole legatee under the will. His applications to the defendant for accounts had been disregarded, and he therefore sought administration in the English Court.

Willis Bund, for the motion, admitted that the case was not within Order XI. rule 1; but submitted that under the old practice leave would have been given—Drummond v. Drummond (1)—and that the old practice still applied.

JESSEL, M.R., said—It does not matter what was the practice before the Judicature Acts. The old practice on this point is entirely at an end. I am of opinion that no leave can now be given to serve a defendant out of the jurisdiction, except in cases within Order XI. rule 1. The application must therefore be refused.

DE GEER v. STONE.

Alien—Statute—Construction—7 Anne, c. 5—4 Geo. 2. c. 21—13 Geo. 3. c. 21.

By the common law a person born in a friendly foreign country, where his father is in the military service of the British Crown, is not a British subject.

The status of a British subject is not extended by statute beyond grandchilden of the last ancestor born in British territory.

This was a suit for the administration of the real and personal estate of a testator, Jan Louis Mackay. The testator died in 1840. One question in the cause was whether the testator was a British subject, or an alien, and therefore incapable of holding land.

The testator, his father, and paternal grandfather were all born in Holland, but his paternal grandfather's father, Æneas Mackay, was a natural-born British subject. He was the second son of John Lord Reay. Under the permission of Charles II. he raised a regiment known as the Mackay regiment, of which he was the proprietor and colonel. The regiment formed part of a Scotch Brigade which served under the Prince of Orange in the Low Countries.

The regiment visited England in 1685 and again in 1688. About the year 1691 it was despatched by King William III. to the Low Countries to take part in the war between the allies and Louis XIV. The regiment visited England for the last time in 1697. From that time it remained in Holland till it was disbanded. It appeared that to the year 1696 the regiment was in the service of King William and Queen Mary, and was paid by the paymaster of the English or Scotch forces. There was no trace of the Scotch Brigade, of which the Mackay regiment was part, being in the English or Scotch establishment after 1697, and it was, as the Judge presumed, after that date in the pay of the States-General. In the year 1756 it was enacted, by 29 Geo. 2. c. 17, that if any of his then Majesty's subjects should, from and after the 4th of June, 1756, accept commissions in the Scotch Brigade, he should subscribe the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, under a penalty of 500*l.* And it was in evidence that Daniel Mackay, the father of the testator, did take such oath on his being appointed an ensign in a regiment of the brigade.

There were in evidence certain communications between the English Government, their ambassador at the Hague, and the Dutch Government, as to the right of the English Government to the use of the troops. When the war between England and Holland broke out in 1752, a demand was made by the States-General upon the officers of the Scotch Brigade to take an oath of allegiance to that Government. Certain officers refused to do so, and were placed on the establishment of the 94th regiment.

Colonel Æneas Mackay married a Dutch lady, and had issue a son Daniel, the testator's grandfather, who was born in 1696 in Holland; he became an officer of the Mackay regiment, and died in 1745. One of his sons, Daniel, was the father of the testator Jan Louis; he was born in 1744 in Holland. He became an officer in a regiment of the Scotch Brigade, and died in 1782. The testator's grandfather, Daniel Mackay, is here referred to as Daniel 1, and the testator's father as Daniel 2.

Westlake, Q.C., and Phillimore; Everitt, Q.C., and Byrne, for members of the Mackay family.—The statutes of 7 Anne, c. 5, 4 Geo. 2. c. 21, and 13 Geo. 3. c. 21, gave the children of fathers who were British subjects born abroad the status of natural-born British subjects for all purposes. That, therefore, gave them the power, if males, of transmitting their nationality to their descendants; and as the testator was descended entirely through males from an ancestor under the common law a British subject, he was capable of holding land; and so it was decided in The Athlone Peerage Case (1), the only authority on the subject. If, however, the power under the Acts of Anne, Geo. 2 and Geo. 3, of transmitting to issue born abroad was limited to two generations, yet the testator was a British subject for all purposes except the power of transmitting his status to children born abroad, because his great-grandfather Æneas, a British subject born within the realm, was at the time of the birth of Daniel 1 serving the king as a soldier; and therefore Daniel 1 was by common law a natural-born British subject, and capable, by the later statutes, of transmitting his status to his son's son, the testator—Parliament Roll, Ed. 3. (2); 25 Ed. 3. stat. 2. It did not affect the matter that the mother of Daniel 1 was an alien—Bacon v. Bacon (3), Calvin's Case (4), Doe v. Jones (5) and Collingwood v. Platt (6). They argued also that the Scotch Brigade continued in the service of the British Crown down to 1697, and the testator's father, by taking the oath of allegiance under the statute 29 Geo. 2, and by force of that statute, was a British subject in the same way as if he had been born in this country, and therefore transmitted his power to hold land to the testator.

The Attorney-General (Sir Henry James, Q.C.), The Solicitor-General (Sir Farrer Herschell, Q.C.) and Stirling, for the Crown. —It would be absurd to construe the Acts which give the status of British nationality to the children and grandchildren of British subjects to extend further, for, if that were so, any one who could trace back his ascent through paternal ancestors could claim the privileges of a British subject. In passing the Act extending the privilege to grandchildren, 13 Geo. 3. c. 21, the Legislature had put the narrower common-sense construction on the earlier Act; and the opinion of Lord Cockburn (7) and Mr. Westlake (8) was decisively in favour of this construction, and that the decision in The Athlone Case (1) could not be supported.

The common law rule that an ambassador's children were British subjects was founded on the fact that the ambassador's dwelling was considered British territory, and did not apply to the children of a soldier serving in a friendly country; nor did any rule relating to a child born in a hostile territory in occupation of the king's troops. Therefore Daniel 1 was not a natural-born British subject by common law.

Moreover, the better opinion was that except under the later statutes a person born abroad, to have the privileges of a British-born subject, must be the child of British parents, mother as well as father.

The statute 29 Geo. 2 did not purport to and did not affect the status of any one. By taking the oath under that Act

KAY, J. (on Nov. 15, after stating the facts and deciding questions on the construction of the will), said—Reliance is placed, on the part of those who contend that Daniel 1 was a British subject, on the Parliament roll 17 Ed. 3, in the year 1343. I have extracted the words of that roll, which are in Norman French. I need not read them, but the effect is this—It recites great doubt and difficulty between the nobles of the realm and the commoners, and also the gentlemen of the law, as well as others, whether children who should be born beyond the sea could inherit, after the decease of their ancestors, in England; because that no certain law had been passed upon this matter, and it seems to have been demanded by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the prelates and grandees of the realm in Parliament whether the children of our lord the king who should be born in parts beyond the sea could inherit in England. Then it states that the prelates were unanimously agreed, as to the children of our lord the king there was no manner of doubt that they could inherit wherever they might be born, and as to other children it is allowed in this Parliament — Perhaps I had better read the words here, which are, "Et endroit des autres enfantz, accordez est en ce Parlement, q'ils soient aussint enheritez queu part q'ils soient neez en le service le Roi." That is the part on which great stress has been laid in this argument. Then it proceeds—but seeing that the Parliament was about to depart, and that this business demanded great consideration and deliberation, it goes on to say that it should be left to the next Parliament to consider how a certain law should be ordained, and the justices and other sages were charged by the king and nobles to consider what the law should be.

It is not alleged that this has the force of an Act of Parliament, but it is cited as an authoritative statement of the law, which, from its antiquity, is worthy of respect. But it must be observed that the statement, though emphatic as to the children of the King of Great Britain, is by no means so as to the children born of persons in the service of the king. The great doubts and difficulties which are said to have existed must be as to these latter, because it is stated that there is no manner of doubt as to the children of the king born abroad. But the whole subject was, according to that Parliament roll, postponed to be considered in a future Parliament, and the first statute of 25 Ed. 3, in the year 1350, reciting that a petition had been presented to the Parliament of 17 Ed. 3, declared that the king's children born abroad were entitled to inherit, "and that all children inheritors which from henceforth shall be born without the ligiance of the king, whose fathers and mothers at the time of their birth be and shall be at the faith and ligiance of the King of England, shall have and enjoy the same benefits and advantages, to have and bear the inheritance within the same ligiance as the other inheritors aforesaid in time to come, so always that the mothers of such children do pass the sea by the licence and will of their husbands." From that it would seem that, prima facie, the mother must be an Englishwoman. In Calvin's Case (4), it is stated that there are three incidents to a subject born—first, that the parents be under the actual obedience of the king; secondly, that the place of his birth be within the king's dominion; and, thirdly, the time of his birth. And with respect to the place, it is stated, "the place is observable, but as many times ligiance or obedience without any place within the king's dominions may make a subject born, but any place within the king's dominions without obedience can never produce, a natural subject." And, therefore, that if any "of the king's ambassadors in foreign nations have children there of their wives, being English-women by the common laws of England, they are natural-born subjects, and yet they are born out of the king's dominions." Lord Coke therefore states it to be a condition, even in the case of an ambassador, that his wife shall be an Englishwoman.

But in Bacon v. Bacon (3), which was decided in 1641, the daughter of a merchant who resided abroad for merchandizing was held entitled to inherit land in England, and it was stated "it is not material although his wife be an alien, for she is as Berkeley said sub potestate viri and quasi under the allegiance of the king." It is to be observed that in Bacon v. Bacon (3) the wife was actually an Englishwoman, so that this was obiter dictum.

In Doe v. Jones (5) Chief Justice Lord Kenyon considers the language of 25 Ed. 3 and the authority of these cases, and says, "If we were now called upon for the first time to put a construction on the words of this statute I should not think that they ought to be extended further than the natural import of the words, but that in order to be entitled to the privileges and benefits of that Act the children must be born of natural-born parents both father and mother within the faith and ligiance of the king"; and, referring to the contest of authorities, he states it is his view "that the opinion of Lord Hale in Collingwood v. Platt (6) would overturn the decisions to the contrary." Lord Hale's language in that case is "De natis ultra mare, 25 Ed. 3, declares that the issue born beyond sea of an Englishman upon an Englishwoman shall be a denizen. Yet the construction hath been, though an English merchant marries a foreigner and hath issue by her beyond the sea, that issue is a natural-born subject," and he refers to Bacon's Case (3) and Calvin's Case (4), which I have cited as authorities. I must, therefore, take it to be decided that it is not necessary that the wife of an Englishman resident abroad should be an Englishwoman, but that under the statute the issue may be capable of inheriting, although the mother was a foreigner. Accordingly, Daniel 1, being son of Æneas, a natural-born subject, though by a mother who was a Dutch lady, was capable of inheriting, and must be considered by force of the statute a natural-born subject of Great Britain. Daniel 1 lived to 1745. By 7 Anne, c. 5, passed in 1708, it was enacted that "the children of all natural-born subjects born out of the ligiance of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, should be deemed and taken to be natural-born subjects of this kingdom to all intents, constructions and purposes whatsoever." This enactment was explained by 4 Geo. 2. c. 21, passed in 1730, to include children born or to be born of fathers who by common law were natural-born subjects. By 13 Geo. 3. c. 21, passed 1772, it was provided that all persons born or to be born out of the ligiance, whose fathers were, by the last-mentioned Acts, entitled to the rights of natural-born subjects, "shall and may be adjudged and taken to be, and are hereby declared and enacted to be, natural-born subjects of the Crown of Great Britain, to all intents, constructions and purposes whatsoever, as if he and they had been and were born in this kingdom." Daniel 1 being entitled by the Act of Anne to the status of a natural-born subject, his son Daniel 2, being the son of a father who was made a subject by the statute of Anne, was also entitled to the rights of a natural-born subject under the Act of Geo. 3. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, in his Treatise on Nationality, pp. 7 to 10, refers to these statutes, and considers them as not being declaratory of the common law, but substantive enactments. He deals also, at page 94, with an argument which has been addressed to the Court in this case—that the posterity of a natural-born British subject, though born abroad, are by the common law to be treated as British subjects for ever. For this the Lord Chief Justice says there is no foundation, and indeed, if that were the common law, such legislation as I have referred to, giving the status of a British subject first to children born abroad and then to chidren of fathers so born, would have been unnecessary, and as a declaration of the law would have been insufficient and inaccurate. The Earl of Athlone's Case (1), which has been cited to me, is not sufficient to overrule these considerations. Mr. Westlake, in the second edition of his valuable book, p. 289, treats it as of doubtful authority. I must take the law to be that the grandchild born abroad, whose father was also born abroad, being respectively grandchild and son of a man who was by the common law a natural-born British subject, would be himself a natural-born British subject, but that his children, if born abroad, would be aliens. By this law Daniel 2, the grandson of Æneas, would be a natural-born British subject; but the testator, who was the son of Daniel 2, would be an alien. However, it is argued that the position of the Scotch Brigade would, independently of these statutes, give the status of a natural-born subject to the officers serving in it and their children. Of the testator's ancestors, the father of Daniel 1 was the only one who was an officer in that brigade during the time that it was, strictly speaking, in the service of the Crown of England.

Æneas is the last of the testator's ancestors who was by the common law a natural-born British subject, and the position of the Scotch Brigade does not save the testator from being treated as an alien. Daniel 2, the father of the testator, took the oath of allegiance and abjuration in conformity with the statute 29 Geo. 2. But this was proper and necessary, as he was a natural-born British subject by statute, though without the power of transmitting that status to his children born abroad. It has been argued as though this act on his part amounted to naturalisation, or gave him somehow the status of a British subject at common law. I do not think it had such an effect. The Scotch Brigade seems to have been in an anomalous position after 1697, when it ceased to be on the establishment of the British army. It was officered to some extent by British subjects. But the statute of Geo. 2, requiring any British subject to take the oaths of allegiance and abjuration before accepting service in it, and the subsequent dismissal from it of all British officers who refused to swear allegiance to the States-General, prove that it was no longer part of the British army; and I cannot hold that service in it after 1697 could give the status of a British subject by the common law. Even if Daniel 1 or Daniel 2 had been in the service of the British Crown abroad, I cannot find any authority for saying that this would have given them the status of natural-born British subjects by the common law. In a note to page 9 of the first edition of Mr. Westlake's Treatise on International Law, the reason that ambassadors' children were treated as natural-born subjects is said to be that an "Ambassador's house is reputed part of his Sovereign's realm," and the learned author continues, "the 25 Ed. 3. stat. 2, shews that the same exception was not made in favour of children whose parents served the king abroad in any other capacity." The case of ambassadors' children is treated as an exception in Sir A. Cockburn's Treatise on Nationality, at p. 7, and for the same reason. This reason does not apply to a child born abroad to a soldier in the British service abroad. Such a child might be a natural-born subject under the provisions of the statutes I have mentioned, but not by the common law. Sharp v. De St. Sauveur (11) decides that the Naturalization Act, 1870, is not retrospective. The consequence is that the real estate of the testator belongs to the Crown.

DAVIS v. HARFORD.

Power—Agreement for Lease by Tenant-for-Life—Death of Tenant-for-Life—Infant Tenant-in-Tail—Trustees.

A tenant-for-life, with a power of leasing, had entered into an agreement for a building lease within the power, and the intending lessee had done everything which was necessary to entitle him to require the tenant-for-life to grant him a lease.

The tenant-for-life died without having granted the lease, and was succeeded in the possession of the estates by an infant tenant-in-tail, during whose minority the trustees could exercise the power of leasing:—

Held, that the trustees had power to grant a lease in accordance with the agreement.

Special Case.

The following question was submitted: Whether the defendants were bound to grant, or had power to grant, to the plaintiff a lease in accordance with an agreement of the 21st of July, 1881, whereby P. W. S. Miles, since deceased, agreed to grant a building lease to the plaintiff. At the date of the agreement, P. W. S. Miles was tenant-for-life of certain freehold estates, which were devised by the will of P. J. Miles, who died in 1845, to the use of P. W. S. Miles for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to the use of trustees during the life of P. W. S. Miles upon trust to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of the first and every other son of P. W. S. Miles respectively in tail-male with remainders over. The will contained a power enabling the tenant-for-life and also the trustees during the minority of any person under the same will entitled to an estate for life or in tail male by purchase to appoint, by way of lease, all or any parts of the above-mentioned freehold estates (except as therein mentioned) upon building leases.

It was admitted that the agreement was for a lease within the power, and that the plaintiff had done everything requisite to enable him to require P. W. S. Miles to grant him a lease pursuant to the agreement. In October, 1881, P. W. S. Miles died, without having granted a lease, and leaving an only son, P. N. Miles, who was an infant, aged 16. The existing trustees, who were the defendants to this action, were willing to grant the lease if the Court should be of opinion they had power to do.

Dunning, for the plaintiff.—The power runs through the whole settlement, and is exercisable for the benefit of the estates. Therefore the trustees can execute this lease, although they have not exercised a discretion with reference to the agreement. There is no authority in my favour or against me.

Mills, for the defendants.—Between the plaintiff and defendants there is neither privity of contract nor of estate, nor can the trustees be said to have exercised their discretion under the power.

It may be that the Settled Land Act, 1882, when it comes into operation, will cure the defect in future cases (see sections 2, 16, 56 and 60), but the point is one these trustees felt bound to submit to the Court, as many other agreements under the same power turn on this decision.

Dunning, in reply.

CHITTY, J.—The actual point I have to decide is not covered by direct authority, but the case is a simple one.

The tenant-for-life, who had a power of granting building leases, entered into an agreement with the plaintiff to grant him a building lease. It is admitted that the agreement was within the power; consequently it was an equitable exercise of the power of leasing. The plaintiff entered under the agreement and erected buildings on the land. Inasmuch, therefore, as there is a power of leasing in the settlement, and that power has been equitably exercised, all persons entitled under the settlement are bound. The only question is how the legal estate is to be vested in the lessee, there being a perfect equitable title, and all persons entitled under the settlement being bound.

The question is, whether the parties who have the control of the legal estate, and who can give legal effect to the contract, are authorised to grant a lease. I am of opinion that they have that power, and that they are authorised to grant such a lease. If the agreement had not been for a lease in accordance with the power, it might have been otherwise; but since all parties under the settlement are bound by the equitable contract so as to pass to the lessee the equitable interest, I am of opinion that the persons who have a power sufficient to vest the legal estate are authorised by the power to execute a deed necessary for that purpose.

[His Lordship accordingly pronounced his opinion that the defendants, the trustees, had power to grant to the plaintiff a lease in accordance with the agreement; and the plaintiff's counsel having moved for judgment, gave judgment for the plaintiff for specific performance, with costs.]

BANKRUPTCY.
JESSEL, M.R.
BRETT, L.J.
COTTON, L.J.
July 13, 14.

Ex parte COCKS; in re POOLE.

Bankruptcy—Trustee—Administration of Bankrupt's Property—Application for Directions—Power of Court to direct Trustee to disregard Resolutions of Creditors—Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), ss. 14 and 20.

Where a trustee in bankruptcy applies to the Court for directions under section 20 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the Court has power, in cases where just cause is shewn, to direct the trustee to disregard directions previously given to him by the creditors.

Where it was evident that resolutions passed by the creditors were supported by the majority, with the view of favouring the debtor and of concealing fraudulent preference, the Court considered that just cause was shewn for directing the trustee to disregard the resolutions.

Section 20 may be interpreted by reference to section 14.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar Hazlitt sitting as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

The debtors in this case were a firm of marble masons, who carried on business under the name of Henry Poole & Sons. In November, 1879, they filed a liquidation petition.

On the 16th of December, 1879, the first meeting of the creditors was held, when a liquidation by arrangement was resolved upon and a trustee appointed. The assets were realised by the trustee, and a dividend of 2*s.* in the pound was paid to the creditors.

It was afterwards suspected that shortly before filing their petition, the debtors had made payments to members of their family and to one Holder, which amounted to fraudulent preferences; and that the business of the debtors was being collusively carried on for their benefit, and with a view to their resuming it, by one Piercy, who was formerly a clerk in their employment. The trustee being advised that proceedings might be successfully taken by him to recover the money fraudulently paid by the debtors, at his instance, during the year 1881, several witnesses were examined under section 96 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. The trustee's account rendered up to October, 1881, shewed a balance in his hands of 525*l.*, which was, however, subject to some deductions. The estate was fully realised with the exception of what might be recovered by the contemplated proceedings of the trustee, the result being that if a final dividend were declared, it would amount to 6*d.* or 7*d.* in the pound.

In November, 1881, at a general meeting of the creditors summoned by the trustee in pursuance of a requisition of creditors, under the Bankruptcy Rules, 1870, rule 305, resolutions were passed directing the trustee to take no further steps in the examination of witnesses or the commencement of litigation, and further directing him to distribute the estate left in hand without delay, and to take the necessary steps to close the liquidation as speedily as possible, and to call a meeting of creditors to consider the close of the liquidation, the release of the trustee, and the discharge of the debtors.

Twenty-nine creditors, whose debts amounted to 7,155*l.*, voted in favour of these resolutions, and among the twenty-nine were those who were suspected of being the objects of the fraudulent preference, their debts amounting together to about 90*l.* The majority also included a number of creditors for very small sums. Two creditors voted against the resolutions, their debts being respectively 4,960*l.* and 20*l.*

Ex parte Cocks; in re Poole (App.), Bankr.

The trustee applied to the Court for directions, and supported his application by an affidavit, from which it appeared that, after paying all expenses, the assets in his hands would only produce a dividend of 2*d.* in the pound, and that if proceedings were taken as advised, it was believed that a considerable sum would be obtained for the creditors.

The Registrar directed that the resolutions should not be carried out by the trustee, but should be vacated.

Some of the creditors who had supported the resolutions appealed.

Gerard Laing (H. Matthews, Q.C., with him).—The application of the trustee was under section 20 of the Act, but there was no fraud in the passing of these resolutions; the Registrar, therefore, had no power to interfere when the creditors had given directions to the trustee. The Court has no power to interfere provided the resolutions are intra vires—Ex parte Emmanuel (1). There Brett, L.J., said:—"If what they (the creditors) have done is within their power, but is erroneous, I am not sure how far the Court can interfere; but if what they have done is beyond their power, the Court is justified in interfering and putting an end to it."

[BRETT, L.J.—"Erroneous" does not mean "dishonest." I meant that the mere fact that there was a difference of opinion between the Court and the creditors would not be a sufficient ground for setting aside their resolution. I was not referring to the question of jurisdiction.]

Under section 20 the trustee may either summon a meeting of creditors to ask for their directions or he may apply to the Court. He has an option. Where the creditors have given directions, and there is no fraud, the Court cannot interfere. Directions given by creditors as to the administration of the estate are certainly intra vires.

[JESSEL, M.R.—You must read section 20 in connection with section 14.]

Section 14 relates to resolutions passed at the commencement of the bankruptcy, while section 20 relates to resolutions as to administration. That is an important distinction.

These are not resolutions which require to be registered; there is no power, therefore, to order them to be vacated. In Ex parte Baum (2) the order was only to cancel the certificate of registration. The proposed proceedings cannot result in any benefit to the creditors.

[JESSEL, M.R., referred to Ex parte Cobb (3).]

Sidney Woolf, and F. M. Abrahams, for the trustee, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R.—This is a case of very great singularity, and I do not remember any case at all like it. It is alleged that the bankrupts assigned the goodwill of their business to a Mr. Piercy, who had been a clerk in their employment, with the view of resuming it again. It is said that the goodwill is an asset of the bankrupts to which their creditors are entitled. It is also said that some family creditors have been preferred by the bankrupts to the extent of 500*l.* or thereabouts. The trustee in the bankruptcy desired to litigate these matters for the purpose of recovering assets for distribution among the creditors. A general meeting of the creditors was called, at the instance of some of the creditors, for the purpose of giving directions to the trustee, and a resolution was passed directing him to stay all further proceedings in relation to these matters, and to divide the assets which were in his hands. It is important to see what was the position of the assets then. According to the evidence of the trustee, their value was sufficient to pay a dividend of 2*d.* in the pound to the creditors. According to the imperfect accounts which were before the meeting, there appeared to be sufficient to pay a dividend of between 6*d.* and 7*d.* in the pound, but it was stated that the amount would be subject to some deductions. It does not appear that anybody asked the trustee at the meeting what the amount of the deductions would be. On the larger debts the sums which would be yielded by such a dividend would be very small;

(1) 50 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 307; Law Rep. 17 Ch. D. 35.

(2) 47 Law J. Rep. Bankr. 48; Law Rep. 7 Ch. D. 719.

(3) 42 Law J. Rep. Bankr. 63; Law Rep. 8 Chanc. 727.

on the smaller debts it would be something too ridiculous to mention. Still, the majority of the creditors with the greatest ardour voted in favour of the resolution. Independently of what the Registrar has said about it, it strikes one at once that this could hardly be a bona fide proceeding. I can quite understand that creditors who had a substantial amount of assets to divide among them might say: We will not risk any further litigation; but we will divide what we have got, and not take the chance of losing it altogether. But, when there is nothing substantial for division, that cannot have been the motive for passing such a resolution. It could not have been done with a view to the better administration of the bankrupt's estate, but there must have been some collateral motive. The only motive which I can see must have been the desire to put a stop to the proceedings which the trustee had commenced. The Registrar has come to that conclusion, and I have no doubt that he is right. Therefore, in my opinion, the action of the creditors was not legitimate.

Then a question has been raised as to the jurisdiction of the Court. It is said that the Court has no power at all to interfere, but that the resolution of the creditors is binding on the trustee, and must be carried into effect, unless it is actually fraudulent. I do not mean to say that there was any actual fraud in the present case. But section 20 says that the trustee shall have regard to any directions given by resolution of the creditors at any general meeting; that he may summon general meetings of the creditors for the purpose of ascertaining their wishes; and that he may also apply to the Court for directions in relation to any particular matter arising under the bankruptcy. Some one must have the supreme power of direction. It cannot mean that the Court is to be subordinate to the direction of the creditors; it must mean that the direction of the creditors is to be subordinate to the direction of the Court. I should have said that this was the meaning, looking at the words of section 20 alone. But the question does not depend only on that section. Section 14 is in pari materia, and it says that the creditors "may, by resolution, give directions as to the manner in which the property is to be administered by the trustee, and it shall be the duty of the trustee to conform to such directions unless the Court for some just cause otherwise orders." The meaning of that is plain beyond all controversy, and it is impossible to suppose that the very similar words used in section 20 with regard to a subsequent meeting of the creditors were intended to have a different meaning from that of the words used in section 14 with regard to the first meeting in the bankruptcy. It is manifest that the true reading of section 20 is that which I should have given to it independently of section 14. It is for the Court to decide whether there is "just cause" for directing the trustee not to follow the directions of the creditors. In my opinion, in the present case just cause has been shewn why the resolution of the creditors should not be carried out. The word "just" does not add much weight, though it may add a little. It means some substantial reason must be shewn. In my opinion, such a reason has been shewn in the present case, and the decision of the Registrar is right. I think it is our duty to dismiss the appeal with costs.

BRETT, L.J. — The trustee being of opinion that, if he went on with the proceedings which he had commenced, a considerable sum might be recovered for the creditors, a resolution of a most trenchant description was, contrary to his wish, arrived at by the meeting.

They directed him to take no further steps in the proceedings to distribute the assets which he had realised (that is, in fact, to give a great many of the creditors nothing at all in the shape of a dividend), and they also resolved that he should take the necessary steps to close the liquidation, and should call a meeting to consider the close of the liquidation, the release of the trustee and the discharge of the debtors. The trustee does not propose that the Court should set aside this resolution; it cannot do so, for it is not a resolution which requires registration; but he asks the Court to direct him whether, under the circumstances, he should disobey or disregard it. If the Court has power to do so, no one can doubt that it ought to direct him to disregard the resolution. The question is whether the Court has power to give such a direction. It is argued that the Court has not the power. It is admitted, however, that if there had been any kind of fraud in the passing of the resolution the Court would have had this power, on the ground, I suppose, that the resolution would then be absolutely void. There may not have been in the present case that kind of fraud which makes the resolution absolutely void, but there was this impropriety, that it is impossible to say as to some of the creditors who voted in favour of the resolution that they were acting bona fide for the benefit of all the creditors. But, notwithstanding this, it is said that the trustee is bound to obey such a resolution, and that the Court has no power to direct him to disobey it. Section 20 seems to me to shew that this contention cannot be maintained. It says that the trustee is "to have regard to" the directions of the creditors, not that he is to obey them. This is a remarkable phrase; it is not so absolute as if it had said that the trustee should obey the creditors' directions. I do not mean to say that it would be a proper thing for the trustee, without coming to the Court for its direction, to act contrary to the resolution of the creditors. But, when you read further, the section says that, subject to the provisions of the Act, and to such directions as aforesaid, the trustee shall exercise his own discretion in the management and distribution of the estate, and that he may summon a general meeting of the creditors for the purpose of ascertaining their wishes, and he may also apply to the Court for directions in relation to any particular matter arising under the bankruptcy. It does not say that as an alternative he may apply to the Court for directions, but that he may "also" apply to the Court. That is to say, having ascertained the wishes of the creditors, he may then apply to the Court for its direction, and if he may apply to the Court, the Court may make an order directing him to disregard the resolution of the creditors. I also entirely agree with the Master of the Rolls that section 20 may be interpreted by reference to the similar words of section 14. There you find that the Court would have power, notwithstanding a resolution of the creditors at their first meeting, for right or "just" cause to interfere by a direction to the trustee, and it seems to me that the words of section 20 must have the same meaning. If, therefore, there is just cause for directing the trustee not to act in accordance with the creditors' resolutions, I think the Court has power to give such a direction. Without, therefore, vacating the resolution of the creditors, I think that a direction ought to be given to the trustee that, notwithstanding the resolution which has been so improvidently passed, he should proceed with the examination of witnesses. It seems to me that the Registrar's order was in substance right.

COTTON, L.J. — The first question is, whether the Court had power to make the order which the Registrar has made.

It was argued that section 20 gives an alternative power to the trustee, and that if he has applied to a general meeting of the creditors for directions, he cannot afterwards apply to the Court. That, in my opinion, is not a correct view. I think that the power of applying to the Court for directions is superadded to the power of applying to the creditors. That question, however, does not really arise in the present case, because the meeting was called, not by the trustee, but by a requisition of some of the creditors. If, however, the meeting had been summoned by the trustee himself, he could still, in my opinion, have afterwards applied to the Court for its directions.

Had, then, the Court power to make the order which has been made? It is plain that under section 14 the Court has power to overrule and disregard a resolution of the first meeting of the creditors, and it would be a strange thing if it had not the same power with regard to the resolution of a subsequent meeting. In the present case I am of opinion that it would be reasonable for the trustee to disregard the resolution. The Court must be considered as having the supreme direction of what is to be done in bankruptcy, and under section 14 it clearly has power to overrule the direction of the first meeting of the creditors, and to direct the trustee to disregard it. I am of opinion that it has a similar power under section 20. Then arises the question whether the Registrar has rightly exercised this power, and I think that he has. The exercise of the powers which are given by the Act to the majority of the creditors ought to be most carefully watched, for we cannot help seeing that attempts are often made to use these powers for purposes for which they are not given. As Lord Justice James said, in Ex parte Page (4), "The Legislature has given great power to the majority; but it must be exercised bona fide in the interest of the creditors, and not from motives of kindness to the debtor. There must be a bona fide resolution of the creditors dealing as creditors." In other words, the power must be exercised with a view to the administration of the estate in such a way as to provide the best possible dividend for all the creditors. In the present case, it appears to me that the resolution was passed, not for that purpose, but for some indirect object. In my opinion, there has been really no exercise of the power at all—I mean not such an exercise of it as can bind a dissentient minority. The Registrar has come to the conclusion that the direction was given to the trustee, not for the purpose of obtaining a dividend for the creditors, but for some collateral purpose—for the purpose either of screening those persons who are said to have been fraudulently preferred by the bankrupts, or of enabling the bankrupts to resume their business. We must look also at that which is tacked on to the resolution—directions to the trustee to call a meeting to consider the close of the liquidation, and the discharge of the bankrupts. It is said that this latter part of the resolution would be ineffectual because the requisite statutory majority was not obtained. But, in considering what was the object of certain resolutions, you must look at the resolutions as they were proposed to the meeting, and not only to that part of them which can be made effectual. The Registrar has arrived at the conclusion that the resolutions were passed, not for a legal purpose, not in bona fide exercise of the power given to the creditors by the Act. He has arrived at that conclusion on reasonable grounds, and I do not dissent from it. It is not necessary for us to say that the resolutions are bad altogether; it is sufficient to say that enough appears to justify the Court in saying, and, indeed, to require it to say, that the resolutions are not binding on the trustee, but that he ought to act contrary to them. In my opinion, the Registrar's order is right, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

MAPLE AND COMPANY v. THE JUNIOR ARMY AND NAVY STORES.

Copyright — Engravings — Illustrated Catalogue—Copyright Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45).

The plaintiffs issued a catalogue containing illustrations of articles of furniture sold by them, and registered it as a book under the Copyright Acts. The book contained no letterpress such as could be the subject of copyright, but the illustrations were engravings from original sketches executed for the plaintiffs by artists employed by them. The book was not published for sale, but was used by the plaintiffs as an advertisement. The defendants also issued an illustrated price list containing many engravings which had been copied from those of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs brought an action to restrain the defendants from printing and publishing any catalogue containing illustrations copied from the plaintiffs' book: — Held (affirming the decision of HALL, V.C.), that they were entitled to an injunction.

There is nothing in the Copyright Act to exclude from the benefit of its protection books consisting of pictures only, or to restrict the Act to books containing letterpress. A book is not less the subject of copyright because it is used only as an advertisement and not published for sale.

Cobbett v. Woodward (41 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 656; Law Rep. 14 Eq. 407) overruled.

The plaintiffs, a firm of upholsterers and furniture dealers, in 1881 published a printed catalogue containing illustrations of the articles of furniture sold by them. This catalogue, which consisted almost entirely of engravings of pieces of furniture with short descriptions and prices, was registered at Stationers' Hall under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. The engravings in the catalogue had been executed by an artist, who in the first place had made sketches of the pieces of furniture, and the total cost of the production of the book was about 4,000*l.* It was used by the plaintiffs as an advertisement, and not offered by them for sale. The defendants also sent out an illustrated price list containing many engravings which had been copied from those in the plaintiffs' catalogue.

The plaintiffs accordingly brought an action to restrain the defendants from printing, publishing, issuing, circulating or distributing any catalogues, circulars, books or prints containing any plates or illustrations of furniture copied from or being a colourable imitation of the plates or illustrations contained in the plaintiffs' catalogue.

A motion for an injunction was heard before Hall, V.C., on the 25th of May, 1882.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Beddall, for the plaintiffs.—This illustrated catalogue is a book within the Copyright Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, and the plaintiffs are entitled to copyright in the engravings as part of a book. No doubt in Cobbett v. Woodward (1) Romilly, M.R., held that there could not be copyright in an advertisement, but that case was disapproved of by your Lordship in Grace v. Newman (2). Moreover, in Cobbett v. Woodward (1) the decision in Hotten v. Arthur (3) was not cited to Romilly, M.R., and if it had been his decision might have been otherwise. The question is not whether the publication is of lasting benefit to the world, but whether the man has, by his labour or expenditure, got together a useful compilation.

It will be said that we are not entitled to an injunction because the catalogues are not sold but given away; but this, though it may be material as to damages, cannot affect our right to protection. Both in Hotten v. Arthur (3) and Grace v. Newman (2) the publications for which protection was claimed were given away. Moreover, although the defendants are not in form selling these catalogues, they are so in substance, because by giving them away they promote the sale of their goods. We ask your Lordship to treat Cobbett v. Woodward (1) as no longer law, and to follow your own decision in Grace v. Newman (2). They referred also to Kelly v. Morris (4).

W. Pearson, Q.C., and F. A. Lewin, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs here are claiming copyright, not in any letterpress in their catalogue, but simply in the engravings. It is only where there is copyright in the letterpress that the work is a "book" the subject of copyright under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. This is clear from Bogue v. Houlston (5), which decided that if you can once establish copyright in the letterpress, you can have copyright also in the explanatory designs, but not otherwise. Hotten v. Arthur (3) was not a case of a mere advertisement, but of original literary matter entitled to copyright. Cobbett v. Woodward (1) was the case of a mere advertisement, expressly governing the present case, and Hotten v. Arthur (3) was not cited because it had no relevancy to such a case as that, or as the present case, or, indeed, as Grace v. Newman (2).

If this catalogue was entitled to copyright at all, it could only be under the Engravings Acts, and the provisions of

(1) 41 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 656; Law Rep. 14 Eq. 407.

(2) 44 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 298; Law Rep. 19 Eq. 623.

(3) 1 Hem. & M. 603; 32 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 771.

(4) 35 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 423; Law Rep. 1 Eq. 697.

(5) 5 De Gex & S. 267; 21 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 470.

those Acts have not been complied with. But further, if copyright could be established under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, then the plaintiffs cannot maintain this action, because they have not correctly stated the date of the first publication, as required by sections 13 and 24; for a large portion of the matter contained in the registered editions of these catalogues was not for the first time contained in those editions, but had been already published in previous editions, so that the entries in the register are untrue.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., in reply.—Murray v. Bogue (6) practically decided that where there is new matter in a new edition of a book, the book, so far as such new matter is concerned, is entitled to copyright. The catalogues of 1878 and 1881 were registered, and we are therefore entitled to be protected as to all matter which appears in the catalogue of 1881 and does not appear in any preceding catalogue other than that of 1878, and we are willing that the injunction should be so qualified. He referred also to Stannard v. Lee (7) and Prince Albert v. Strange (8).

HALL, V.C.—The questions which have been discussed in this case are, no doubt, questions which cannot be said to have been finally set at rest by any of the decisions which have been referred to, and which will, no doubt, be again submitted to the Court either here or elsewhere. But upon the present occasion I must found my decision upon what I consider to be the state of the law as it is to be collected from the authorities which have been referred to, and also having regard to the fact that this being an interlocutory application, and not final, it may be right to consider the balance of convenience and inconvenience on the one side and the other.

Now, as regards the merits of the case, I consider that it is substantially made out that, to a very large extent, the defendants have copied and availed themselves of the labour and expenditure of the plaintiffs. I start with that. That being so, I am certainly not inclined to do otherwise than put the matter on that footing on which it ought to stand, according to the principles of honesty and rectitude of proceeding in that which concerns the public. Even in the case of Cobbett v. Woodward (1), where the Master of the Rolls refused the main part of the injunction which was asked for, he nevertheless refused to give the defendant his costs, which he would have been entitled to ordinarily as a matter of course on succeeding in the main part of his defence. He refused to give him his costs by reason of his having acted in a way which was thought to be not fair and right as between man and man. In Grace v. Newman (2) I said that I thought the judgment of the Master of the Rolls might have been otherwise if he had considered Hotten v. Arthur (3), and that if that case had been called to his attention he might have declined to act upon the proposition that an advertisement cannot be the subject of copyright. I thought so then, and I see no reason to think otherwise now. So far as my judgment goes, I think that the proposition which I have referred to, and which the Master of the Rolls thought was at the bottom of the case before him—namely, that there can be no copyright in an advertisement—is not correct. It has been said that in Grace v. Newman (2) there was some copyright which might have sustained my judgment, if it were in other respects wrong; but, without saying that there is not an equivalent copyright in the present case in the passages which have been read to me from the catalogues, I am certainly prepared to say that in my judgment for the present purpose the circumstance of the writing being an advertisement is not a reason why it is not a "book" within the meaning of the Act of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. It is in itself a book, and a book is a thing which the Act of Parliament protects. That provision, no doubt, is founded upon, or has reference to, the preface or preamble to the Act; but what I go upon is that I consider this catalogue answers the description in the Act of Parliament, and that there is no clause in the Act which limits the operation of the word "book" in such a way as to exclude its application to an advertisement. Prima facie, therefore, I hold the law to be in favour of extending the Act to advertisements.

(6) 1 Drew. 353; 22 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 457.
(7) 40 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 489; Law Rep. 6 Chanc. 346.
(8) 1 Mac. & G. 25; 1 Hall & Tw. 1; 18 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 120.

Coming now to the other points of law which have been discussed, I consider that for the present purpose I cannot give weight to them. A distinction has been drawn between first and second editions, and it has been said that you cannot have copyright in a second edition if you cannot claim copyright in the first, always assuming that the first edition could have been made the subject of copyright by being properly registered. For the present purpose I certainly hold that that is unsound, and that you can have a separate copyright in the two separate editions. Having obtained a copyright in the second edition, you are certainly not excluded from that right by reason of failure to establish a copyright in the first edition. At present I must take it that copyright exists in both. It may be that there are some drawings in the book before me as to which the evidence is not express and complete; but if I am satisfied, as I am, that a great number have been copied into the defendants' book, I shall certainly consider that that proof as regards a considerable number is sufficient to justify the Court in preventing the defendants from publishing the different drawings in their book. I shall consider for the present purpose of the interlocutory injunction that the protection of the plaintiffs' whole book is established. This is only an interlocutory application, and I may hear something more of the case at a future stage. The balance of convenience and inconvenience seems to me to be greatly in favour of the plaintiffs. They have spent their money, and the defendants have availed themselves to a large extent, as I am satisfied on the evidence, of that expenditure, and have appropriated it to themselves. If ever in this case the question should ultimately come to be determined with reference to damage, I give no opinion as to how that damage is to be ascertained, whether by the mere value of the book or the number of copies sold, or by taking into account (as I suppose could be done by a jury) the damage occasioned to one side or the other by reason of the injunction. Of course, the plaintiffs on this occasion will give the ordinary undertaking, and be liable in damages in the ordinary way.

On the whole case, this being an interlocutory application, I consider that I ought to interfere in favour of the plaintiffs, qualifying the order in the manner suggested, so as not to entitle them to any injunction in respect of those pictures which have been published in any book not entitled to copyright. That seems to me to be right.

I give no weight at all to the contention that this is a case in which compliance with the Engravings Act ought to have been attended to. I do not consider that the case comes within that Act at all.

W. Pearson, Q.C., and Lewin, for the appellants.—The plaintiffs' engravings are not protected by the Copyright Acts. Their book is merely an illustrated price list upon which no literary labour has been bestowed; it is not, therefore, the subject of copyright. The preamble of the Copyright Act shews that it is only intended to protect literary labour. Bogue v. Houlston (5) decided that engravings forming part of a book which is the subject of copyright are protected as part of the book; if the book is not copyright the engravings cannot be. Cobbett v. Woodward (1) is exactly in point, and there an injunction was refused. In Hotten v. Arthur (3), which was followed by Hall, V.C., in the present case, the book contained original matter, and was properly the subject of copyright. In Grace v. Newman (2), too, the book was not a mere advertisement, but was the subject of literary copyright.

[JESSEL, M.R.—I don't think Cobbett v. Woodward (1) is good law. If there is any original matter in a book it may be the subject of copyright.]

The illustrations cannot be protected unless they are connected with the letterpress which is the subject of copyright, and in the plaintiffs' book there is no letterpress of such a character as that copyright can be had in it.

[JESSEL, M.R.—There was no literary copyright in Bogue v. Houlston (5). The publication in that case was of the old story of "Reynard the Fox," with new designs, but no new letterpress.]

The literary merit was in adapting the new designs to the old letterpress; besides, there were other stories in the plaintiffs' book in that case which would make it the subject of copyright.

[JESSEL, M.R.—The defendant only published "Reynard the Fox," which he had a right to do, and if the illustrations were not protected per se, they could not be protected by that story being bound up with original stories, if there were any.]

It was decided that the book must be taken as a whole, and that there was literary copyright in all the original matter.

[JESSEL, M.R.—No; the decision was that when there is copyright in a book it extends to protect the illustrations as well as the letterpress.]

In Copinger on Copyright (9) the author commenting on Bogue v. Houlston (5) says, "Where there are designs forming part of a book in which a person has copyright, such copyright extends to the illustrations and designs of the book equally as to the letterpress." Here there is no literary work, and the case of Hotten v. Arthur (3), on which Hall, V.C., relied, does not contradict Cobbett v. Woodward (1); they can very well stand together.

Hastings, Q.C., and Beddall, for the respondents, were not heard.

JESSEL, M.R.—I am of opinion that this catalogue is the subject of copyright, and that the engravings are protected. In the first place, it is a book, and so clearly comes within the words of the Copyright Act of 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), s. 2. There may be such things as picture-books for those who cannot read letterpress. The preamble of the statute has been referred to, but it cannot restrict the enacting part of the statute if the enacting part is clear, and, moreover, the preamble can in no case have much effect unless it is itself clear. Here the enacting part is quite clear. It says what a "book" is and what "copyright" is. "The word 'book' shall be construed to mean and include every volume, part or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letterpress, sheet of music, map, chart or plan separately published," and "the word 'copyright' shall be construed to mean the sole and exclusive liberty of printing or otherwise multiplying copies of any subject to which the said word is herein applied." The preamble does not help the appellants, "Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to copyright, and to afford greater encouragement to the production of literary works of lasting benefit to the world." It does not say that it is expedient to afford greater encouragement to the production of literary works of lasting benefit to the world, and to amend the law of copyright relating thereto, but that it is expedient to amend the law of copyright generally, merely adding the principal reason for doing so. There is, therefore, nothing in the preamble to cut down the enacting part even if the enacting part had not been clear. I see nothing in the Act to exclude a book which consists of pictures only, or to restrict the Act to books containing letterpress. If we can construe the Act so as to promote fair and honest dealing, such a construction is to be preferred. Several decisions have been cited which are not very consistent with each other. The view I take of Bogue v. Houlston (5) is that there was no copyright in the letterpress. The plaintiffs' publication contained the old story of "Reynard the Fox," and other stories, to which it was not necessary to refer, as the defendant had only copied that one and the illustrations to it. I do not think the judgment turned upon the fact of there being other stories in the volume. The two which are mentioned in the report were certainly old, and there is nothing to shew that there were any new ones. I think that the decision turned on the meaning of the word "book." The Vice-Chancellor says (p. 274), "The plaintiff said that his publication was a book, and that his name was duly registered at Stationers' Hall as the proprietor of that book, and he referred to the provisions of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, as giving him a copyright in such book within the definition in that Act, 'every volume, part or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letterpress, sheet of music, map, chart or plan, separately published.' This definition does not extend to prints or designs separately published, but only to the prints and designs forming part of a book, and the book is not less a book because it contains prints or designs or other illustrations of the letterpress. This Act vested in the proprietor so registered the right to sue in respect of any invasion or infringement of the copyright of his book. It appears to me that a book must include every part of the book, it must include every print, design or engraving which forms part of the book, as well as the letterpress therein which is another part of it. Prints published separately do not appear to have been within that Act by that express definition." It had been contended before the Vice-Chancellor that there could only be copyright when there was letterpress, but I think that what he meant to say was that prints forming a book were within the Act, though prints published separately were not, and that if published together in a volume they formed a book whether there was letterpress or not. The case which has done all the mischief is Cobbett v. Woodward (1). The late Master of the Rolls there says: "But at the last it always comes round to this, that in fact there is no copyright in an advertisement. If you copy the advertisement of another you do him no wrong, unless in so doing you lead the public to believe that you sell the articles of the person whose advertisement you copy." I think that this is not the law. I am not aware that the use to which a proprietor puts his book makes any difference in his rights. His copyright gives him the exclusive right of multiplying copies, and he may use them as he pleases. I think, therefore, Cobbett v. Woodward (1) will not bear legal examination. There are two cases tending in the opposite direction to Cobbett v. Woodward (1), namely, Hotten v. Arthur (3) and Grace v. Newman (1). It is true that in Hotten v. Arthur (2) there was considerable literary work in the ordinary sense of the term—the publication was more than a mere catalogue—still its primary object was that of an advertisement to promote the plaintiffs' trade. The weight of authority, then, is against the doctrine that there cannot be copyright in a book issued as an advertisement, and I cannot see any principle in support of that doctrine. There would be difficulty in protecting these designs as engravings under the Act relating to engravings, it is easier to protect them as parts of a book. The defendants thought that the law allowed them to appropriate the results of other men's labours, and they call upon us for an indulgent construction of the Act in their favour. It is, in my opinion, the duty of the Court to construe Acts of Parliament with a view to the furtherance of justice, and such persons are not entitled to call upon us to strain the law in their favour. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LINDLEY, L.J. — I am of the same opinion. The question is one of some importance. The plaintiffs' work is original in this sense, that they employed artists to make original drawings from pieces of furniture, and from these drawings engravings were made which the plaintiffs made into a book with descriptions and prices. The primary object of the plaintiffs was to advertise their goods. That the work was original in the sense I have mentioned is clearly proved; and originality, not mere literary skill or merit, is the test whether a work is subject of copyright. I should have felt no difficulty in this case were it not for the decision in Cobbett v. Woodward (1). If that case were reconcilable with the other cases on the subject I should be slow to overrule it, but it appears to me difficult to reconcile it with other cases, especially Bogue v. Houlston (5).

[JESSEL, M.R. (having examined the record in Bogue v. Houlston (5), which had been sent for during the argument).— I find that the bill did not claim copyright in any letterpress, and did not state that there were any other stories than "Reynard the Fox" in the plaintiffs' book.]

That case, then, is very strong, for it is a decision that there may be copyright in a set of engravings forming part of a book, though there is none in the letterpress; and that governs this case, for copyright in the engravings could not be obtained by binding them up with something else in which there was no copyright. Hotten v. Arthur (3) does not apply so closely, for in that case there was original letterpress. In Cobbett v. Woodward (1), Lord Romilly did not follow

Bogue v. Houlston (5) even as then understood, for it was admitted that part of the plaintiffs' book consisted of original letterpress, and I cannot follow his reasoning founded upon the book being an advertisement. We have to choose between the decisions, and in my opinion the true view of the Acts is that taken in Bogue v. Houlston (5), Hotten v. Arthur (3) and Grace v. Newman (2)—that a collection of illustrations put together into a book, as distinguished from engravings intended to be sold separately, is within the Copyright Act. They certainly form a book so as to come within the words of the Act; and I see no reason why we should be astute to construe the Act so as to exclude them. The defendants have made a use of the plaintiffs' work which, as observed by Lord Romilly in Cobbett v. Woodward (1), would not be considered fair among fair traders, and we ought not to strain the Act to make such a proceeding legal.

[IN THE COURT OF APPEAL.]

BANKRUPTCY.
JESSEL, M.R.
COTTON, L.J.
HANNEN, SIR J.
1882.
Nov. 17.

In re WARD; ex parte WARD.

Bankruptcy—Rules of Stock Exchange—Defaulter—Amount of Differences fixed by Official Assignee of Stock Exchange—Liquidated Sum—Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 6.

The amount fixed by the official assignee as the amount of the differences due by a defaulter on the Stock Exchange upon the premature closing of his accounts, in accordance with the rules of the Stock Exchange, must be treated as fixed for all purposes, and constitutes a liquidated sum within section 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, upon which a petition in bankruptcy can be presented.

This was an appeal by William Ward, a stock and share broker, against an order of Mr. Registrar Pepys adjudicating him a bankrupt upon a petition presented by Harris, Goldsmid & Co., stock and share dealers.

The facts are fully reported in 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 752; Law Rep. 20 Ch. D. 356, upon an appeal by the same bankrupt, when an order of the Registrar, requiring the debtor to give security as the condition for staying proceedings on the debtor's summons, pending the trial of an action to try the validity of the debt on which the debtor's summons was founded, was affirmed.

Ward had purchased, for M. Bebro, on the Stock Exchange, from Harris & Co. a large number of shares in the Quartz Hill Consolidated Gold Mining Company. When the contracts for the purchases were entered into no special settling day for the shares of the company had been fixed, but subsequently the 28th of December, 1881, was appointed as that day.

Owing to the failure of Bebro to supply Ward with funds, Ward was unable to fulfil his contracts, and was declared a defaulter on the 30th of December, 1881; and on the same day, in accordance with the Stock Exchange rules, the official assignee closed all Ward's stock exchange transactions, and distributed his stock exchange assets, which were of small amount, among his stock exchange creditors. Harris & Co., then, with the assent of the other stock exchange creditors, issued a debtor's summons against Ward for the amount fixed by the assignee as due to Harris & Co.—namely, the sum of 5,623*l.*; whereupon Ward appealed, with the result above mentioned. Ward failing to give the security claimed, Harris & Co. proceeded with a bankruptcy petition presented by them, founded on the act of bankruptcy committed by Ward by non-compliance with the debtor's summons. The petition alleged that Ward was indebted to them in the sum of 5,623*l.*, "the amount of loss sustained by them by reason of his not fulfilling his contracts with them in respect of certain shares in the [said] company sold by them to him in October and November, 1881."

Ward objected to an adjudication being made on the petition, upon the ground that the claim was not for a liquidated sum, but for unliquidated damages for breach of contract, and that he had a right to have the amount ascertained in an action, and that such unliquidated damages could not, under section 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, support a petition in bankruptcy.

This objection was overruled by Mr. Registrar Pepys sitting as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, who adjudicated Ward bankrupt.

The rules of the Stock Exchange material for this case are as follows:—

51. The Stock Exchange does not recognise in its dealings any other parties than its own members. Every bargain, therefore, whether for account of the member effecting it or for account of a principal, must be fulfilled according to the rules, regulations and usages of the Stock Exchange.

52. No member shall attempt to enforce by law a claim arising out of Stock Exchange transactions against a member or defaulter, or against the principal of a member or defaulter, without the consent of such member, of the creditors of the defaulter, or of the committee.

143. A member unable to fulfil his engagement shall be publicly declared a defaulter by direction of the chairman, deputy-chairman or any two members of the committee.

149. Creditors for differences shall have a prior claim on all differences received by or due to a defaulter's estate.

167. Two or more members shall be appointed annually by the committee to act as official assignees, whose duty it shall be to obtain from a defaulter his original books of account and a statement of the sums owing to and by him, to attend meetings of creditors, to summon the defaulter before such meetings, to enter into a strict examination of every account, to investigate any bargains suspected to have been effected at unfair prices, and to manage the estate in conformity with the rules, regulations and usages of the Stock Exchange.

169. The assignees shall collect and pay the assets to the credit of their joint account at a banker's, and shall distribute the same as soon as possible.

170. In every case of failure the official assignee shall publicly fix the prices current in the market immediately before the declaration, at which prices all persons having accounts open with the defaulter shall close their transactions by buying of or selling to him such stock, shares or other securities as he may have contracted to take or deliver, the differences arising from the defaulter's transactions being paid to or claimed from the official assignees. In the event of a dispute as to the prices named they shall be fixed by two members of the committee.

Davey, Q.C., Cooper Willis, Q.C. (Yelverton with them), for Ward.—The point raised on this appeal was not before this Court on the former appeal—namely, that the claim of the petitioners is not a liquidated sum within section 6 due either at law or in equity—it is merely for damages for breach of contract, which would have to be ascertained by a jury. The appellant has a right to have it determined by a jury. The petitioners are not really proceeding upon the amount fixed by the official assignee, but the amount so fixed in accordance with the rules of the Stock Exchange is only for what may be called the "domestic bankruptcy" on the Stock Exchange and Stock Exchange purposes; but if the creditors choose to avail themselves of legal proceedings they must be bound by the rules of law and claim only upon an ascertained sum. In an action Ward might have the opportunity of shewing that the real loss of the petitioners was considerably less than the amount fixed by the official assignee.

Winslow, Q.C., and Linklater, contra, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R.—The only question is whether the demand of the respondents is for a liquidated sum. By the rules of the Stock Exchange, which are binding both on the appellant and the respondents, a mode is provided of ascertaining the amount of the difference due by a defaulter. The purchaser in this case became a defaulter, and he must be treated as every other defaulter. It is really as if the rules of the Stock Exchange were imported into the contract. The provisions of the rule must be considered as inserted in the contract, and to that extent they alter the wording of the contract. So that we have the contract altered in this way—that the purchaser is to pay for the shares on the settling day, "provided always that if he becomes a defaulter before then the amount due from him is to be ascertained in accordance with the rules of the Stock Exchange." If that is so, there appears to be no foundation for the argument that this rule is to be limited to ascertaining the amount of the claim of the assignee of the Stock Exchange. The amount is ascertained for all Stock Exchange purposes—that is, for the purposes of this contract—and Mr. Davey was driven to admit this. By the rules of the Stock Exchange a defaulter is called upon to pay a portion of his liabilities if he can, and this is the mode in which his liabilities are ascertained, and he pays accordingly. It therefore appears to me that this demand was for a liquidated sum, and that the judgment of the Registrar is right.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Rule 170, in the case of a defaulter, really alters the original contract and provides a new contract as between a defaulter and his creditor, and then the amount of his liability is fixed and ascertained in accordance with that altered contract. It is said that this is only for the purposes of the Stock Exchange, and particularly with reference to the domestic distribution of what I may call the "House Fund." But the difference once ascertained is the difference for all purposes, notwithstanding that the rule may only provide for its payment out of a particular fund. In my opinion this demand is for a liquidated sum.

SIR JAMES HANNEN.—I am of the same opinion.

[Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.]

In re FEATHERSTONE'S TRUSTS.

Will — Construction — Gift to Children of A and B—Lapse—Gift to Class—Direction to vest at Testator's Death.

A testator gave the residue of his estate to trustees upon trust to pay legacies, and subject thereto "unto and equally amongst all the children of my said brother-in-law, Dr. J. D., and the said R. A., and I direct that the same shall be vested legacies at the time of my decease":—Held, that the gift was to the children of Dr. J. D. and R. A. himself.

R. A. having died during the testator's lifetime,—Held, also, that the words directing the vesting of the legacies indicated an intention on the part of the testator to give the whole of the residue to such only of the residuary legatees as should be living at his death.

Petition.

William Featherstone, who died in May, 1880, by his will, dated 1869, gave all his real and leasehold estates to trustees upon trust for sale, and directed that the proceeds of sale should be deemed part of his personal estate, and should be subject to the dispositions declared concerning his residuary estate; and as to the residue, after payment of debts, &c., the testator gave the same to his trustees upon trust to pay 10,000*l.* equally between his nephew and nieces (naming them), the four children of his brother-in-law Dr. John Dowson, and in case any one or more should die in his lifetime leaving issue, then he gave his or her share to such issue as tenants-in-common. He also directed his trustees to pay a sum of 900*l.* to Robert Abbey, one of the children of his late relative Thomas Abbey, and in case he should die in the testator's lifetime leaving issue, the legacy should go to such issue as tenants-in-common. And the testator, after bequeathing other legacies, directed as follows:—"And if there shall be any residue of my estates and property remaining after payment of the foregoing legacies, and the costs, charges, disbursements and expenses attending the above trusts, then I give the same residue unto and equally amongst all the children of my said brother-in-law Dr. John Dowson, and the said Robert Abbey, of Coatham. And I direct that the same shall be vested legacies at the time of my decease." Robert Abbey died in the lifetime of the testator, and left children who survived the testator. One of the children of Dr. Dowson died before the testator.

A sum of money, representing the residue of the testator's estate, had been paid into Court, and this was a petition presented by the surviving children of Dr. Dowson, asking to have the fund paid out to them; and the following questions arose upon the construction of the gift of the residue:—first, whether the gift was to Robert Abbey himself, or to his children; secondly, if the gift was to Robert Abbey himself, then, he having predeceased the testator, who was entitled to the share which he would have taken?

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Reginald Hughes, for the petitioners on the first question.—The gift is to Robert Abbey himself, and not to his children. For the latter construction it would be necessary to interpolate the word "of," but it is possible to give the words a plain grammatical construction without doing so; the Court, therefore, will not so interpolate it—Lugar v. Harman (1), Peacock v. Stockford (2) and Hawes v. Hawes (3).

Davenport, for the children of Robert Abbey.—I submit that the children of Robert Abbey take under this gift, and not Robert Abbey himself. The word "of" is not necessary for my construction—see Hawkins on Wills, 114, where the learned author says, "But although it may be more idiomatic to speak of the children of A and of B, it may perhaps be doubted whether usage requires the repetition of the particle; and in the cases of Mason v. Baker (4) and In re Davis's Will (5) this distinction was disregarded, and a gift to 'the children of A and B' was held to mean the children of B as well as of A." Moreover, the testator has already given a legacy to Robert Abbey, which is in favour of my contention.

KAY, J.—I will at once give my decision on the first question, as to whether Robert Abbey takes a share as one of the legatees, or whether his children take shares equally with the children of Dr. Dowson. According to the proper grammatical construction of the words used, in order to enable the children of Robert Abbey to take it would be necessary to insert the word "of"—the children of Dr. Dowson and "of" the said Robert Abbey. In Lugar v. Harman (1) a bequest of residue to be divided equally "amongst all the children of my late cousin E. L., and my cousin P. F., and their lawful representatives," was held to be a bequest to the children of E. L. and P. F. himself, and not to the children of P. F., for to make the gift to the children of P. F. the word "of" would have to be understood, whereas, as the words stood, they had a plain grammatical sense—namely, to the children of E. L. and to P. F. himself. There have been various subsequent cases, particularly that of Peacock v. Stockford (2), where a testator bequeathed life interests in four distinct funds to four nieces respectively, and directed that upon the decease of any or either of them, the principal fund, the interest of which was to be received by her or them, should be held in trust for "the benefit of all and every the lawful children of her or them so dying, and of the survivors or survivor of my other nieces hereinbefore named in equal shares." One of the nieces having died leaving two children, it was held that her fund was divisible amongst these children and amongst the children of the three other nieces, it being proper to give some force to the word "of," and that word being referable to the word "children" as the last antecedent; and Lord Justice Turner said, "Now, in this case, the terms of the disposition are, 'in trust for the benefit of all and every the lawful children of her or them so dying, and of the survivors or survivor of my other nieces,' not 'in trust for the benefit of the children of her or them so dying, and the survivors or survivor of my other nieces.' Had the disposition been in the latter form, the surviving nieces must, we think, have been held entitled, according to the decision in Lugar v. Harman (1) and what is said in Doe v. Janville" (6). In Hawes v. Hawes (3), by a voluntary settlement, A and his cousin limited certain gavelkind lands to a relative C for life, with remainder to her issue, and in default of such issue "to the use of the right heirs of E. deceased, and J.," who was then living, "the two sisters of A, their heirs and assigns, as tenants-in-common for ever." The present Master of the Rolls in that case, referring to Lugar v. Harman (1), said: "The case of Lugar v. Harman (1) is very precise. There it was a gift to 'all and every the child and children of my late cousin Edward Lugar, and my cousin Philip Fearis, and their lawful representatives.' Now, that is a much stronger case in favour of the defendants than the case before me, for a gift 'to all and every the child or children' is totally different from a gift 'to the use of the right heirs.' In the case of Lugar v. Harman (1) it was a gift 'to all and every the child and children' of the person named, which is certainly more favourable to the defendants. There it was held that you could not put in the word 'of,' and that you must understand the words as they stand in their plain grammatical sense"; and after referring to various other cases, he declined to read the limitation as a limitation to the right heirs of E. deceased and of J., but held that J. herself took a vested interest in remainder in fee-simple in a moiety of the property expectant on the death of C without issue. Therefore I consider that, on the grammatical construction, the question has been settled by authority, and that Robert Abbey, if he had survived the testator, would have been entitled to take with the children of Dr. Dowson. The question is, whether there is anything in the will which overrides this construction. It has been said that the testator's direction that the legacies should be vested at the time of his decease must receive consideration, because, as Robert Abbey was living and of age at the date of the will, the words were unmeaning and unnecessary as regards him. But, according to my construction of the will, Robert Abbey would have taken along with a class some of the members of which might have been infants at the time of the testator's death to whom the words might properly apply. There is, therefore, no indication that the words are not to be read in their ordinary grammatical sense. It was also said that as Robert Abbey had a legacy of 900*l.* given to him in a previous part of the will, the testator did not intend that he should have a beneficial interest in the residue; but it should be remembered that the testator also gave the sum of 10,000*l.* to the children of Dr. Dowson, as well as shares in the residue, and therefore there is no indication from those circumstances that he did not mean Robert Abbey to take, but his children. Besides, it is a common thing enough for a testator to make to legatees bequests of pecuniary legacies in one part of the will, and afterwards to increase them by giving them shares of the residue. As I see no reason to induce me to depart from the grammatical construction of the will, I shall hold that the residue would have been divisible between the children of Dr. Dowson living at the death of the testator and Robert Abbey himself.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Reginald Hughes, on the second question.—We submit that the gift was to a class of which Robert Abbey was a member, and he having predeceased the testator, his share goes to the surviving members of the class—Porter v. Fox (7), Clark v. Phillips (8), In re Stanhope's Trusts (9), Aspinall v. Duckworth (10) and Shaw v. McMahon (11). In Jarman on Wills (12) the distinction between the popular and legal meaning of the word "class" is explained. The only cases against us are In re Chaplin's Trusts (13) and In re Allen (14). Jarman, 269, where In re Chaplin's Trusts is doubted. The direction in the will as to the vesting of the legacies clearly shews the testator's intention that the residue should be divided amongst such only of the residuary legatees as should survive him.

Loughborough, for the heir-at-law and next-of-kin of the testator.—It is true that in Jarman on Wills (12) a distinction is drawn between the popular and legal meaning of the word "class," but I submit that there is one primary and fundamental idea underlying the word in all the reported cases—namely, a set of persons filling some common capacity, or answering some common description, whether of relationship or otherwise. Porter v. Fox (7), Shaw v. McMahon (11) and Stanhope's Trusts (9) belong to a class of cases where a testator, having referred to a class, adds the name of some individual, a member of that class—e.g. a gift "to all my nephews, including J. W." The rule in such cases is that it is not the less a class merely because one of the members is referred to by name. That rule, however, does not apply where the named individual is a stranger to the class, as was the case in In re Chaplin (13) and In re Allen (14). Of course, it may be possible to gather from the will an indication of intention on the part of the testator to give his residue to A and the children of B, so as to make an aggregate class. The only words relied on as indicating such intention are the words directing that the legacies shall vest at the testator's death: but I submit that those words are mere surplusage, and only express what the law would otherwise imply. On the death of Robert Abbey, the share intended for him lapsed, and the heir-at-law and next-of-kin are entitled to it.

Hughes, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

KAY, J. (on Nov. 6).—William Featherstone, by his will, in 1869, gave all his real estate in the county of York to trustees upon trust to sell, the proceeds to be subject to the disposition of his residuary personal estate; and he gave the residue of his personal estate to the same trustees upon trust to pay certain legacies, and subject thereto, "unto and equally amongst all the children of my said brother-in-law Dr. John Dowson and the said Robert Abbey, of Coatham, and I direct that the same shall be vested legacies at the time of my decease."

I have already decided that under this bequest Robert Abbey, and not his children, would take an equal share of the residue with the children of Dr. Dowson.

But it seems that Robert Abbey died in the testator's lifetime, and the question is —who is entitled to the share intended for him? I have reserved my judgment to consider the authorities. It seemed to me upon this point that they were somewhat in conflict.

In Porter v. Fox (7) a bequest for the benefit of the testator's grandchildren and his nephew Thomas Owen, to be distributed as they should become of the age of twenty-five years respectively, was held to be void for remoteness as to Thomas Owen as well as to the grandchildren, although he was nineteen years of age at the death of the testator. The Vice-Chancellor said the testator meant each person's share to be determined by the number of the class, consisting of his grandchildren and Thomas Owen who should be living when the first attained twenty-five.

In Shaw v. McMahon (11) the gift was "amongst all my grandchildren living at my death, including my sons Beresford and William," and by a codicil the gift to William was revoked. Lord St. Leonards held that the gift was to a class, and that the other residuary legatees took the whole.

This was followed by Vice-Chancellor Stuart in Clark v. Phillips (8), where the gift was to the children of A, the children of B, to C, to the children of D and to E in equal shares.

In In re Stanhope's Trusts (9) the gift was of residue to the testator's daughters, A, B, C and D and their issue, and if he should have any other daughters they should be equally entitled with them to such residue as though named in his will share and share alike. One of the daughters named died in his lifetime, and Lord Romilly held that it was a gift to a class, and therefore there was no lapse.

In re Featherstone's Trusts.

In In re Ann Wood's Will (15) a gift to the testator's nephew A, and to the testator's brothers and sisters or their children, and to his relation B, was held to lapse as to the share of B, he having died in the testator's lifetime.

In Drakeford v. Drakeford (16) the same learned Judge held that a gift to A for life, and at his death to be equally divided between his surviving children and his niece Rosamond Willows, was not a gift to a class, because a class must be ascertained at one and the same time. His Lordship said:—"I have no doubt that if there be a gift to the children of A and to my niece Rosamond and to my niece Mary, and so on, that may be a class, but to make this one a class it must be to this effect: 'I leave the whole of my funded property to my brother for his life, and at his death the property to be equally divided amongst his children and my niece Rosamond Willows, or such of them as shall survive the tenant-for-life.' In all these cases the class would be ascertained at a particular period, and if one died there would be no lapse. But here Rosamond Willows is to take the share at all events—it is absolutely to her, and the only persons to be ascertained are the children of the brother, and they are to be ascertained at his death. There is in this sense a class—namely, certain surviving children—but they do not form the whole of the class. If Rosamond had survived the testator she would, on his death, have taken a vested interest in a share, liable to be increased or diminished by the deaths or births of the children of the brother." And he held that Rosamond having died in the lifetime of the testator, her share lapsed.

In Aspinall v. Duckworth (10), the gift was unto and equally amongst the testator's nephew A and the children of his sister B, or their respective executors, as tenants-in-common (A not being a child of B). Lord Romilly said it was a gift to a class; and if one of them happened to die in the testator's lifetime, the survivors would take the whole; and if only one survived, he would take the whole fund. In the case of In re Chaplin's Trusts (13), the gift was of residue equally between "all and every the children of my late cousins A and B as shall be living at the time of my decease, and C, D, E and F" (the named persons being cousins of the testator). C died in the testator's lifetime, and Lord Hatherley held that C's share lapsed. "A gift to a class," he said, "was a gift to a set of persons all filling one common character or holding some definite position, and a gift to a number of residuary legatees did not thereby constitute them a class. Where there was a gift to children as tenants-in-common, this was a gift to a class as tenants-in-common, the members of the class not being ascertained until the death of the testator. In the same way a gift to executors as such, being made to them in that capacity, was a gift to them as a class; and on the death of one of the persons named in the testator's lifetime his share would not lapse, but go to the survivors." In the case of In re Allen (14) there was a direction to divide the residue amongst the children of A, the child of B, and C, share and share alike. The child of B having died before the testator, it was held that the share lapsed. The learned Judge said: "I can understand a class being described, that is, persons being described, by a general description if it be obvious on the face of the will that it was a class to be ascertained at the date of the will, although it was an immediate gift. But it appears to me to be impossible to hold here that the named persons, or the described individuals, are members of a class in that sense. Of course, it may sometimes happen that the testator, simply by way of precaution, has named the individual who is included in the class description, directing that individual to be included. Perhaps he may have some doubt as to the legitimacy of the individual, or something of that kind; and it may be held that the mere naming of an individual who would otherwise have been included in the class did not alter the rule of construction. But that cannot apply to the case before me, where the individual in question would certainly not be included amongst the children of A, he being a grandchild." From the last two cases it would seem that in order to constitute a named person a member of a class for this purpose, he must have a common character with the unnamed members of the class, as, for example, A and the children of B.

Robert Abbey was not one of the children of John Dowson, and therefore was not in that sense a member of the class; and if the question of lapse depended solely on that consideration, I should have great difficulty in distinguishing this case from those two decisions. But the last words of this gift are "and I direct that the same shall be vested legacies at the time of my decease." And it is argued that those words were intended to mean that the whole residue should be divided amongst such only of the residuary legatees who should survive the testator. Upon consideration, I think that this is the proper meaning to attribute to this sentence. Indeed, it seems to me that unless that be the meaning the words are entirely superfluous and useless; and as I think that the Court is bound to give some effect to them if possible, and also to construe the will as far as may reasonably be done to avoid an intestacy, I hold that those words sufficiently indicate the testator's intention to give the whole residue to such only of the residuary legatees as should be living at his death.

PEARSON, J. 1882. Dec. 11, 12. } EADIE v. ADDISON.

Specific Performance—Agreement for Lease—"Proper Clauses"—Clause against Underletting.

By an agreement in writing (contained in two letters) the defendant agreed to grant to the plaintiff, a brewer, a lease of a public-house for a certain term, at a certain rent, "a proper lease to be drawn up with all proper clauses, and approved of by" the defendant and his solicitor. Afterwards the defendant refused to grant a lease unless it contained a clause against underletting. In an action to enforce specific performance of the agreement,—Held, that the clause was not a "proper clause"; that the defendant was bound to grant a lease without putting in any such clause; and specific performance decreed.

Action with witnesses.

This was an action for specific performance of an agreement for a lease.

In the year 1880 the defendant Daniel Addison was the owner in fee of a freehold public-house, called the Tweeddale Arms, at Tamworth.

The plaintiff James Eadie was a brewer, living at Burton-on-Trent, having a large business at Tamworth, and holding several public-houses there.

On the 12th of August, 1880, the defendant wrote to his solicitor, Mr. Thomas Argyle (who was also the solicitor for the plaintiff for his local business at Tamworth), the following letter:—

"Tamworth, August 12, 1880.

"Dear Sir,—You may make Mr. Eadie (the plaintiff) an offer of the Tweeddale Arms Hotel, at 150*l.* per annum, from Lady Day, 1881. Tenant to pay all rates and taxes (except property tax), and do the internal and external painting and repairs, walls and roofs being kept in repair by landlord. Term ten years from commencement of lease. A proper lease to be drawn up with all proper clauses, and approved of by me and my solicitor, and executed before the commencement of tenancy; and if not this offer be void."

That letter was sent, with the consent and knowledge of the defendant, by Mr. Argyle to the plaintiff, who wrote back as follows:—

"Cross Street Brewery, Burton-on-Trent, August 13, 1880.

"Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your letter of yesterday containing Mr. Addison's offer of the Tweeddale Arms Hotel, Tamworth. I consider the rent very high, and the terms somewhat stringent; but, as the house stands well and is respectable, I accept the offer. Please prepare and send me draft lease in due course."

Shortly afterwards the defendant discovered that he could not determine the tenancy of the then tenant of the Tweeddale Arms before Michaelmas, 1881; and accordingly, in November, 1880, he wrote to the plaintiff to substitute Michaelmas, 1881, for Lady Day, 1881, as the commencement of the term.

In February, 1881, Mr. Argyle ceased to act as solicitor for the defendant; and in June, 1881, the plaintiff brought this action, stating that he was willing to take a lease as from Michaelmas, 1881, if the defendant could not previously terminate the then tenancy; and claiming, first, specific performance of the agreement constituted by the two letters of August, 1880, the plaintiff offering to accept, if necessary, a lease as from Michaelmas, 1881; secondly, a declaration that the defendant was not entitled to require, in the lease to be made pursuant to such agreement, the insertion of any clause restrictive of the right of the plaintiff to underlet; and, thirdly, compensation and damages in respect of the lease not taking effect as from Lady Day, 1881.

The defendant, by his statement of defence, submitted that no concluded agreement was ever come to between himself and the plaintiff; and relied upon the Statute of Frauds as a defence to the action.

The main question in argument was, whether the words, "a proper lease to be drawn up with all proper clauses and approved of by me and my solicitor," in the defendant's letter of the 12th of August, 1880, entitled him to insist on the insertion in the lease of a clause restraining the plaintiff from assigning or underletting without the lessor's consent.

[A question arose during the examination of Mr. Argyle as to the production of a certain letter of the 18th of August, 1880, written by the defendant to him: but the Court held, on the authority of Minet v. Morgan (1), that it was a privileged document.]

Higgins, Q.C., and Medd, for the plaintiff.—The two letters of August, 1880, constitute a complete agreement. A clause against underletting without the lessor's consent is not an "usual covenant" or a "proper clause"—Hampshire v. Wickens (2); and therefore the defendant has no right to require such a clause to be inserted in the lease to the plaintiff.

Karslake, Q.C., and E. W. Byrne, for the defendant.—Admitting, for the sake of argument, that a clause against underletting is not an usual covenant, the letter of the 12th of August, 1880, expressly provides that the lease is "to be approved of" by the defendant. He is, therefore, entitled to say that he will not approve of a lease which does not contain a clause against underletting—Winn v. Bull (3).

[PEARSON, J., referred to the judgment of Lord Cairns in Hussey v. Horne-Payne (4).]

That was a case of a contract for the sale of land; and there is a great difference between approving the title to freehold property and approving the clauses in a lease.

They also referred to Hudson v. Buck (5).

Higgins, Q.C., was not called upon to reply.

PEARSON, J. (after reading the two letters of the 12th and 13th of August, 1880), said—Those two letters seem to me to contain an offer on the one side comprising all the terms that are necessary, and an acceptance on the other side in the plainest possible manner.

In process of time Mr. Addison found that he could only give his tenant a notice to expire at Michaelmas, 1881. That fact was communicated to Mr. Eadie. Mr. Eadie was not content with that, and said, "I am willing to take the lease at Michaelmas, 1881; but you must compensate me for not giving me the lease at Lady Day, 1881." After that some letters pass between the parties, which are not material to allude to. Mr. Addison ceases to employ Mr. Argyle as his solicitor, and then declines to grant Mr. Eadie a lease unless there is put into the lease a clause absolutely restraining Mr. Eadie from underletting the house. I use the word "underletting" as implying all the other words that would be found in an ordinary clause of this kind. Mr. Eadie thereupon brings this action.

Now the question which I have to determine is whether Mr. Addison is bound to grant Mr. Eadie a lease without the clause to which Mr. Eadie objects, and which he says is not included in the letter of the 12th of August, 1880. And it is very ingeniously argued for Mr. Addison that there is no perfect contract in this letter, because, although the letter states that there are to be all proper clauses in the lease, it goes on to say that the lease is "to be approved of by Mr. Addison and his solicitor"; and that those words impose a term upon all the matter that goes before, and shew that there was no complete agreement as to what the terms of the lease were to be.

Mr. Addison relies principally upon the case of Winn v. Bull (3), which, it is said, shews very clearly that those words "to be approved of by me and my solicitor" cannot be disregarded, and that they leave it open to Mr. Addison to say what the form of the lease should be. I am of opinion that that is not so. Mr. Addison knew that Mr. Eadie was a brewer; and he must, I think, have known that Mr. Eadie was not living at Tamworth, and that it was not at all likely that Mr. Eadie was going to carry on the business at the public-house himself. I cannot, therefore, put the meaning on those words that Mr. Addison was at liberty to put into the lease a clause which he knew would make it absolutely impossible for Mr. Eadie to accept the lease he offered.

But it is said that I am bound by authority. Now the case of Winn v. Bull (3) is by no means free from difficulty. It is one of those cases in which the contract runs so near the line that it is almost impossible to say on which side of the line it is—whether the letters form a positive binding agreement, or whether there is not something outside the letters to be done afterwards, and which is necessary to be done before it can be said that either party is bound. The agreement entered into in that case ends with this clause, "This agreement is made subject to the preparation and approval of a formal contract"—that is to say, "here is an agreement; but it is not to bind either party until it has been carried into effect by a formal contract." Then when the formal contract came to be made the parties differed about it; and the Master of the Rolls held that the defendant in that case had a perfect right to say, "the only contract I intended to enter into is the one I have tendered to you; and if you do not like to accept it, the bargain is off." But here I have a letter containing more plainly than most letters do all the terms of the lease; and I am asked to import a term which if put in the letter would have shewn that Mr. Addison never intended to make an offer to Mr. Eadie of a lease of this public-house. It is impossible for me to do that.

A similar case to this, Hussey v. Horne-Payne (4), recently came before the House of Lords. In that case there was a contract (contained in two letters) for the sale of a freehold property, the second letter accepting the offer "subject to the title being approved by our solicitors." When that case came before the Court of Appeal, the Master of the Rolls—I will not say, following his decision in Winn v. Bull (3), but deciding on the same line on which he had decided Winn v. Bull (3)—expressed his opinion that those words constituted a new term, which had never been accepted, and that therefore there was no binding agreement. That decision of the Court of Appeal was overruled in the House of Lords.

I am of opinion that the words in this case, "a proper lease with all proper clauses, to be approved of by me and my solicitor," are not at all stronger than the words, "subject to the title being approved by our solicitors"; and that any lease which was to contain "all proper clauses" would be subject to the jurisdiction of this Court as to whether or not the clause objected to was proper or improper.

Then it is said that the word is "proper," not "usual." But that argument seems to me to have great weight on behalf of the plaintiff; because a clause against underletting, which might have been proper with regard to the publican to whom the house was to be let, would be manifestly improper with regard to Mr. Eadie, who was known to be a brewer and to have no intention whatever of going into the trade of a publican.

I am, therefore, of opinion that there is a perfectly good binding contract; and, as no other defence has been raised, except the question whether the contract is good or bad, I must hold that Mr. Addison is bound to perform it. He must pay 100*l.* a year, by way of damages, from Lady Day, 1881, until possession of the public-house is given to the plaintiff. There will be a declaration, as claimed, that the restrictive covenant is not to be put in the lease; and the defendant must pay the costs of the action.

Practice — Infant Defendant — Default of Defence—Motion for Judgment — Affidavits — Notice of Trial — Order XIX. rule 17; Order XL. rule 1; Order XXIX. rule 10; Order XXXVII. rules 1 and 2.

In an action for sale in lieu of partition the sole defendant was an infant. The facts were simple, and no defence was put in. The plaintiffs moved for judgment, and supported their motion by affidavits which verified the statement of claim. The guardian ad litem did not object to the proposed minutes of judgment: — Held, that, under the circumstances, the plaintiffs had taken the proper course, and that notice of trial need not be given.

There is nothing in the Rules of Court, or in Ellis v. Robbins (50 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 512), or The National Provincial Bank v. Evans (51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 97), to the contrary.

This was an action for sale in lieu of partition of certain freehold messuages and hereditaments. The plaintiffs were entitled to two equal undivided third shares of the property, and the defendant, who was an infant, to the remaining third share. A statement of claim had been delivered by the plaintiffs, and a guardian ad litem had been duly appointed on behalf of the defendant. The plaintiffs gave notice of motion for judgment for the relief claimed by the statement of claim, and according to minutes which the guardian ad litem did not object to. A question was, however, raised, whether, having regard to the case of The National Provincial Bank v. Evans (1), the action ought to be brought on upon notice of trial or motion for judgment.

The statement of claim was verified by affidavit evidence which was not printed.

G. N. Marcy, for the plaintiffs, submitted that motion for judgment supported by affidavits was the proper mode of obtaining the judgment of the Court against an infant defendant whose guardian ad litem did not put in a defence. His argument appears in the judgment, and he called the attention of the Court to the following rules and cases: Order XIX. rule 17, Order XXV., Order XXIX. rule 10, Order XXXVI. rule 3, Order XXXVII. rules 1 and 2, Order XXXVIII., Order XL. rules 1 and 11, Wilmott v. Young (2) Senior v. Hereford (3), Ellis v. Robbins (4) and The National Provincial Bank v. Evans (1).

Tahourdin, for the infant, preferred motion for judgment, as the cheapest process.

CHITTY, J.—This is an ordinary partition action by the plaintiffs, who are entitled as tenants-in-common to two-thirds of certain property, against an infant, alleged to be entitled to the other third. A statement of claim was put in, and a guardian ad litem appointed to the infant.

In re Fitzwater.

The guardian, in discharge of his duty, has not thought it necessary—and indeed it is not—that he should put in any defence; and the plaintiff now moves for judgment. The judgment which he asks for is the ordinary judgment in a partition action — a simple case, as simple as can be very well conceived. In support of his motion for judgment, he has filed affidavits, and counsel for the infant does not make any objection; but in discharge of the duty which he owes to the infant, he considers, and I think rightly, that the best thing for the infant is that the action should be disposed of in the cheapest and most expeditious manner; consequently he raises no opposition.

Now, the point which I am asked to decide is, whether a judgment can be given in such a case as this on motion, or whether it is necessary that there should be a notice of trial—if, indeed, a notice of trial would be the proper mode of procedure.

Now, I will say one word with reference to the duties of a guardian ad litem to an infant. In such a case as this I think the guardian discharges his duty by not putting in any defence, or not requiring a more expensive mode of obtaining judgment. But there may be cases on contested facts when the Court, looking even at the statement of claim, where no defence is put in on behalf of the infant, would say that it is the duty of a guardian to see that a proper defence is raised, and that the matter ought not to be disposed of in so expeditious a form, or in what might be to the infant so dangerous a manner, as merely moving for a judgment on affidavit; and if the Court saw that the guardian was not performing his duty, it would refuse to allow the judgment to go on the motion, but direct that the guardian should take steps that there should be a trial, and upon viva voce evidence.

The answer of infants under the old practice was very common, and in the shortest possible form: "I am an infant, and I submit my rights to the Court." It is not necessary in such a case as the present that the guardian should put in any defence at all. At the same time the Court, in the exercise of its discretion and in the discharge of its duty, does look after the interests of the infant, and would take care in a proper case that the infant did not suffer by any negligence on the part of the guardian.

Now Mr. Marcy has gone through the various Orders and Rules having a bearing on this subject, and I will state shortly my opinion with reference to the points that are raised, and with reference to the particular rules to which he has referred. Order XIX. rule 17, provides that "Every allegation of fact in any pleading in an action, not being a petition or summons, if not denied specifically, or by necessary implication, or stated to be not admitted in the pleading of the opposite party, shall be taken to be admitted, except as against an infant." So it is quite plain upon that, that the old practice is not altered, and that a plaintiff must prove his case as against an infant. The next order that I refer to is Order XL. By rule 1 of that order it is provided that, "except where by the Act or by these rules it is provided that judgment may be obtained in any other manner, the judgment of the Court shall be obtained by motion for judgment." There is no other provision to be found in the rules applicable to this case, and it seems to me that this is a general rule. The case does not fall within the exception in the rule, and therefore this is a right mode of obtaining the judgment of the Court. In fact, except in the special cases covered by the exception, this rule exhausts every case.

Then rule 10 of Order XXIX. is to the effect that in all other actions than those that are specified, if the defendant makes default in delivering a defence or demurrer, the plaintiff may set down the action on motion for judgment, and such judgment shall be given as upon the statement of claim the Court shall consider the plaintiff to be entitled to. In my opinion, that does apply to the case where there is an infant defendant, but not so as to override the effect of rule 17 of Order XIX. The plaintiffs only obtain in this action, as against the infant defendant, such an order as, upon a statement of claim, the Court considers them to be entitled to. But at the same time the plaintiff must, by reason of rule 17 of Order XIX., prove his case in some way or other against the infant. Now, on a motion for judgment, may he support his case by affidavit? In reference to that question, I refer to Order XXXVII. rule 2, which, without stating any exception at all, provides that, upon any motion, evidence may be given by affidavit. I see no reason for introducing any implied exception to the generality of this provision; and I think it is competent, on motion for judgment, to support the case, as against an infant, by affidavit.

I have now gone through what appear to me to be the material Orders and rules with reference to this question, but I will also refer to some of the Orders on the question as to proceedings in an action of this kind on notice for trial.

Now the first of the material Orders on this point is Order XXV., which relates to the close of pleadings, and provides that, "as soon as either party has joined issue upon any pleading of the opposite party simply, without adding any further or other pleading thereto, the pleadings, as between such parties, shall be deemed to be closed." It is difficult to say there is a joinder of issue with the infant, within the Order which I have gone through, or the Orders in general, where there is no defence put in on the part of the infant.

Then Order XXXVI. rule 3, provides, "that at any time after the close of the pleadings notice of trial may be given;" and in such a case as this it may be fairly said that there is no close of pleadings within Order XXV., and consequently it is not a case in which notice of trial should be given.

I now proceed to deal with, as part of this question, the question of convenience. There is another rule—namely, rule 12 of Order XXIX.—which bears upon this point, and which provides that, "If the plaintiff does not deliver a reply or demurrer, or any party does not deliver any subsequent pleading or a demurrer, within the period allowed for that purpose, the pleadings shall be deemed to be closed at the expiration of that period," and the statements of fact in the pleading last delivered shall be deemed to be admitted. If a notice of trial is required to be given, then it is plain that, on rule 1 of Order XXXVIII., read in connection with Order XXXVII., there must be a formal consent in writing by the guardians to take the evidence by affidavit. Order XXXVII. was referred to by Mr. Marcy, and upon the question which he raised I think it right to express my opinion with regard to the words, "but the Court or Judge may at any time for a sufficient reason order that any particular fact or facts may be proved by affidavit, or that the affidavit of any witness may be read at the hearing or trial," that the words "at the hearing or trial" relate to the former as well as the latter branch of the sentence. I consider that there is power for a Judge, for sufficient reason, to order that particular facts be proved by affidavit at the trial, or that the affidavit of any witness be read at the trial, and I think this Order generally relates to evidence at the trial.

Upon the inconvenience of adopting the method of proceeding by notice of trial I refer to rule 6 of Order XXXVIII., which requires the affidavits to be printed, which involves the parties in additional expense, and under rules 2 and 3 of the same Order time is given to the opposite party to file affidavits.

Now, I have arrived at the conclusion that the practice which has been proposed to be adopted on the part of the plaintiff is right under the Orders, and is the most convenient and the least expensive.

I will just refer to one or two authorities mentioned to me, to shew that what I am deciding has not been already decided by any Judge of the Chancery Division. I mention first Wilmott v. Young (2), where the Master of the Rolls did allow affidavits to be used on motion for judgment. In that case there was no infant defendant, but still he did not find any reason why affidavits should not be used in support of a motion for judgment. Probably that rule which I have referred to was within his Lordship's mind, though it does not appear to have been mentioned—I mean the rule by which affidavits are allowed to be made use of on any motion.

In the case of The National Provincial Bank v. Evans (1) there was an infant. The action was disposed of informally by giving notice of trial as against the infant, and on motion as against other defendants. Vice-Chancellor Hall was there asked by the plaintiffs' counsel to allow the motion to be set down, and that was therefore the only point his Lordship had to consider. He was not asked to give judgment on the motion as against the infant, and he stated that the course sought to be adopted was the proper one. In that case, so far as it is reported, if I may say so respectfully, there is no doubt that was the proper course; because objections had been taken by the solicitors for the infant defendant as to the admissibility of the evidence. It is plain there was a question of contested fact, and it was not one which ought to have been disposed of in the manner proposed; but there is no decision on the part of the Vice-Chancellor that the course sought to be adopted here is not a proper one. The next case is that of Ellis v. Robbins (4). That was a question of rectifying a settlement—a case that requires, as a rule, great care and great attention—a case which even ought to be proved by oral testimony. The learned Vice-Chancellor's judgment is given in the shortest possible form, and he does not appear to have had his attention called to the various Orders to which my attention has been drawn. Order XXXVII. rule 1, was referred to, but Order XXXVII. rule 2, which has an important bearing on the question, was not mentioned to his Lordship.

I have gone through those cases in order to ascertain whether there is any settled practice in contravention of that which I think is the right one, and the result is that I find no such authority, and I consider, as I have already said, this is the proper course.

CHITTY, J. 1882. July 13, 19, 20. } In re WALA WYNAAD INDIAN GOLD MINING COMPANY.

Company — Winding-up — Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 40—Shares held by Petitioner and Registered in his Name—Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71).

A shareholder was placed on the register in May, 1881, and remained on it at the time when he presented a winding-up petition in February, 1882. On the 26th of August, 1881, he filed a liquidation petition, under which a trustee was appointed. On the 28th of October, 1881, he executed a composition deed, and on the 7th of January, 1882, the trustee reassigned the shares to him:—Held, that the petitioner's shares had been held by him and registered in his name for a period of at least six months during the eighteen months previously to the commencement of the winding-up, within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1867, s. 40.

The above-named company was formed early in 1881. On the 18th of May, 1881, the petitioner was placed on the register as the holder of 1,900 shares; on the 26th of August, 1881, he filed a liquidation petition; on the 29th of September, 1881, a trustee in his liquidation was appointed; on the 28th of October, 1881, he executed a composition deed; on the 7th of January, 1882, the trustee in his liquidation reassigned the shares to him, and on the 28th of February, 1882, he presented this petition. Up to the appointment of the trustee in his liquidation, the petitioner had been on the register for a little over four months, and from the reassignment of the shares to the presentation of this petition was a period rather under two months; the two periods together amounted to a trifle over six months.

Romer, Q.C., and Northmore Lawrence, for the petitioner.

Macnaghten, Q.C., and Seward Brice, for opposing shareholders.—We desire to take the preliminary objection that the petitioner's shares have not been "held by him and registered in his name for a period of at least six months during the eighteen months previously to the commencement of the winding-up," within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1867, s. 40. Upon the appointment of the trustee in liquidation, all the petitioner's interest in the shares passed to the trustee just as they would have passed to a trustee in bankruptcy—In re Bissell (1) and In re Bonham and MacDonnell (2)—and thereupon the petitioner ceased for a time to be a contributory. That being so, the term "held" in section 40 of the Companies Act, 1867, can only be satisfied by such a holding as would have qualified a man to be a contributory. Another point is, that two fragmentary holdings, such as those up to the appointment of the trustee in liquidation and from the reassignment of the shares to the presentation of the winding-up petition, cannot qualify the petitioner under section 40 if he was not otherwise qualified, because the holding must be continuous in order to constitute "a period" within section 40.

(1) 40 Law J. Rep. Bankr. 68; Law Rep. 6 Chanc. 605.

Romer, Q.C., and Northmore Lawrence, for the petitioner.—The petitioner, and he alone, has been on the register in respect of these shares. At the time of the presentation of the winding-up petition he was a contributory, and he is therefore entitled to present this petition.

Macnaghten, Q.C., in reply.

Everitt, Q.C., and MacClymont, appeared for the company.

Ince, Q.C., Crossley, Q.C., and Beddall, appeared for other parties.

The following sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, were commented on and referred to: sections 11, 15, 22, 94, 95 and 125, sub-section 5, as also Lindley on Partnership (3) and Billon v. Hyde (4).

CHITTY, J.—The question raised is whether the petitioner is capable of presenting a petition, and the argument has turned on the meaning of the 40th section of the Companies Act, 1867. The words are (to read them shortly)—"No contributory shall be capable of presenting a petition unless (to take a particular case) the shares in respect of which he is a contributory, or some of them, either were originally allotted to him, or have been held by him and registered in his name, for a period of at least six months during the eighteen months previous to the commencement of the winding-up." The question is, whether this petitioner has, within the meaning of that section, "held," as the registered owner of shares, the shares in respect of which he is a contributory for a period of at least six months during the eighteen months previous to the commencement of the winding-up, which in this case would be the presenting of the petition.

Mr. Macnaghten, who argued the case most ingeniously, insisted that the meaning of the word "held" is held so as to qualify him to be a contributory. Now, to begin with, I will just go through one or two sections of the principal Act, the Companies Act, 1862, and see how the case would have stood apart from this section. Under the 82nd section the persons who may petition are amongst others "contributories." It is quite plain he is a contributory at the present moment. It is quite plain that he was a contributory at the time when he presented this petition. His name has been on the register for a period preceding the commencement of the winding-up considerably more than six months.

Now what is the meaning of the word "held"? I think that the word "held" there has no specific technical meaning. I think it is sufficient that the shares have been registered in the contributory's name at the period mentioned, and that, if they have been registered within the meaning of the two Acts of Parliament, which I am entitled to read together, it must be said that the shares have been "held" by him for that period. The 25th section of the Act of 1882, which requires a register of members to be kept, uses the term "held" with reference to the shares which appear against a member's name on the register. The words which occur in sub-section 1 of that section are "the names and addresses," &c., of the members of the company, with the addition, in the case of a company having a capital divided into shares, of a statement of the shares "held" by each member. That plainly shews that the term "held" has no specific force, but shares are held by the person in whose name they are registered.

Then there is the 26th section, in which similar terms occur: "The number of shares 'held' by each of them," which means simply the number of shares in respect of which they appear on the register. There are other sections, which I will not refer to, in which the term "held" is used, and used, as I consider, in that sense only. Table A, which I merely refer to for the purpose of elucidating this proposition, uses the term "holder" and "held" not unfrequently, and in no other sense except the sense of a registered owner. I will take one or two of the articles of table A. For instance, article 1 speaks of several persons "registered as the joint holders"; article 2 specifies the shares "held" by him. I take these as illustrations. There are many others; for instance, in article 9, where the form of transfer is given "subject to the several conditions on which I 'hold' the shares." There are other articles to the same effect. Take 27, as to offering the shares to members, where the term "held" also occurs. I believe there are several others, but I do not think it necessary to refer to them. In the articles of this company, which are before me, I find similar expressions. Take article 72: "Every shareholder shall have one vote for every entire number of five shares 'held' by him." That plainly means those shares which stand in his name on the register. Nothing can be more plain than that. No one can vote at a meeting where the company's capital is divided into shares, except those who are on the register as holders of shares. Article 74 also has the same expression: "The shares which, if 'held' by one person," and so on. I think, then, that the true meaning of the word "held" in the 40th section of the Act of 1867 is simply that the contributory has had his name upon the register as the holder of the shares for the period in question. That really decides the case. I should say it is very likely that in drawing this section the mind of the draughtsman was alive to the sections under which the shares might pass to bearer, and it was seen that if the term "held" by him was used simply, there would have been a question whether the holder of shares to bearer could present a petition. Therefore, it appears to me that the words "and registered" were added in order to preclude such a shareholder from presenting a petition. I use now myself the term which is common in the Courts, "a shareholder," that means the holder of the shares. It is the common term used, and only means the person who holds the shares by having his name on the register. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider the grammatical questions which have been raised and argued with a great deal of skill by Mr. Macnaghten. It is unnecessary also, to my mind, to go into the question of the Bankruptcy Act, and the more or less minute questions that have been raised with reference to the position of this gentleman. It is, however, my opinion that a person who is bankrupt at the time he presents a winding-up petition could not maintain the petition on the ground that he is not a contributory by virtue of the 77th section, because, as I have stated, under the 82nd section of the Act of 1862, it is only a contributory who can present a petition.

I may add that in the proviso in the 40th section, which no doubt only relates to marriage, the terms are "held by or registered," evidently shewing that in the mind of the Legislature there is no distinction between the two for this purpose. The term "registered" is the stronger term of the two.

The result, therefore, is that I overrule the preliminary objection.

[The petition was then heard upon the merits, and a winding-up order was made.]

John Clarke, who died in 1850, by his will devised two freehold cottages upon certain trusts for Anne Parker and E. Parker her husband, during their respective lives, and after the death of the survivor for their children.

The South Yorkshire Railway Company, in the year 1852, under their compulsory powers, took the cottages and paid the purchase-money into Court, pursuant to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The money was afterwards invested and produced a sum of 425*l.* 10*s.* Consols.

Anne Parker died in January, 1860, and the dividends on the 425*l.* 10*s.* Consols were paid to the trustees of the will until the year 1864, after which date the fund was apparently lost sight of by the parties interested, and remained undealt with, and the dividends were now represented by a sum of 225*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* cash.

A petition was now presented by the children of Mr. and Mrs. Parker and the surviving trustee of the will for the payment out of the fund in Court. As the fund with the accumulated dividends exceeded 500*l.* it became necessary under the Chancery Funds Rules, 1874, rule 91, and the Chancery Funds Amended Orders, 1874, rule 14, to serve the petition on the official solicitor. This was accordingly done, and on the hearing of the petition the question arose by whom or out of what fund the costs thereby occasioned ought to be paid.

Joseph Kaye, for the official solicitor.—The costs of the official solicitor are not costs of taking the lands, and are not payable by the railway company, but by the petitioners. He referred to a case of In re Wainman's Settled Estates, in which Fry, J., had that morning refused to order the company to pay the costs of the official solicitor.

Popham, for the petitioners.—These costs are payable by the railway company. The only exception to the liability of the railway company to pay costs in cases like the present is where the costs are occasioned by adverse litigation—see section 80 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. But certainly no part of the costs ought to be thrown on the portion of the fund coming to the petitioners. The necessity for serving the official solicitor has arisen solely in consequence of the neglect of the tenant-for-life in not receiving the dividends, and his portion of the fund must therefore bear the costs, if not payable by the company.

Simmonds, for the railway company.—The company cannot be called upon to pay costs which have been occasioned by the neglect or default of the persons beneficially interested.

B. B. Rogers, for the trustee in bankruptcy of E. Parker.

KAY, J.—The railway company must pay all the costs of the payment out except those of the official solicitor. Those costs are in this case properly payable out of the portion of the fund which belongs to the estate of E. Parker, the tenant-for-life.

a sale by an ordinary vendor. Where, therefore, the solicitor of trustees for sale, who have a power of giving receipts, produces to the purchaser a deed duly executed by the trustees, having in the body thereof or endorsed thereon a receipt duly signed by the trustees, the purchaser ought to pay the purchase-money to such solicitor, unless he has reason to suspect an intended misapplication of the money.

Adjourned summons.

The Metropolitan Board of Works, on the 6th of May, 1881, entered into a contract for the purchase, from the Rev. T. Bellamy and Eleanor Tylden, of certain real estate for the sum of 500*l.*

The vendors were trustees for sale under a will, having power to give receipts.

The Metropolitan Board of Works delivered to the vendors a requisition that on the completion of the purchase the vendors should either attend personally to receive the purchase-money, or else give to the board a written direction, signed by the vendors, to pay the money into some bank to the joint account of the vendors.

The solicitor to the vendors, however, insisted that, by virtue of sections 8 and 56 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, it was sufficient that he should attend and produce the deed of conveyance duly executed by the vendors, and having in the body thereof or indorsed thereon a receipt duly signed by them, and that thereupon the purchase-money ought to be paid to him.

This was a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, asking for a declaration that the requisition so made by the Board of Works ought to be complied with.

Section 8 of the Act enacts as follows:—"On a sale, the purchaser shall not be entitled to require that the conveyance to him be executed in his presence or in that of his solicitor as such, but shall be entitled to have, at his own cost, the execution of the conveyance attested by some person appointed by him, who may, if he thinks fit, be his solicitor."

Section 56 is as follows:—"Where a solicitor produces a deed, having in the body thereof or indorsed thereon a receipt for consideration money or other consideration, the deed being executed, or the indorsed receipt being signed, by the person entitled to give a receipt for that consideration, the deed shall be sufficient authority to the person liable to pay or give the same for his paying or giving the same to the solicitor, without the solicitor producing any separate or other direction or authority in that behalf from the person who executed or signed the deed or receipt."

W. Pearson, Q.C., and Pownall, for the Metropolitan Board of Works, having opened the case, were stopped by the Court.

George Henderson, for the vendors.—The 56th section of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, applies to the case.

[KAY, J.—Does that section apply to the case of a sale by trustees? In Ghost v. Waller (1) it was held that an authority given by trustees for sale to their solicitor to receive the money was a breach of trust.]

The words of the Act are clear, and apply to every case where the receipt is signed "by the person entitled to give a receipt for the consideration." Elsewhere in the Act such words as "beneficial owner" are used where it is intended to exclude the case of a trustee. The decisions in Hope v. Liddell (2) and Robertson v. Armstrong (3) shew that the receipt of the money by the agent of the trustees binds the trustees and discharges the purchaser unless the purchaser has express notice of an intended misapplication of the money by the agent. And in Lewin on Trusts (4) the authority of those decisions is recognised, and it is stated that trustees, as between them and the purchaser, are not bound to receive the purchase-money personally, but may give an authority to an agent to receive it for them.

He referred also to Dart's Vendors and Purchasers (5).

W. Pearson, Q.C., in reply.—Ghost v. Waller (1) is a clear authority that it is a breach of trust for trustees for sale of accordingly, the receipt of that money by the agent binds the trustees, and discharges the person who pays it.

Reference was made to the text-books of Lord St. Leonards on Vendors and Purchasers, Mr. Lewin, Mr. Dart, and Mr. Davidson, all of whom, referring to these authorities, advise a purchaser, as matter of precaution, to pay his purchase-money either to the trustees themselves, or, as suggested by Lord St. Leonards, into a bank in their joint names.

So far as I can gather from the argument of counsel and from my own research, it does not appear ever to have been decided that a purchaser from trustees for sale who have power to give receipts, obtaining their receipt, and paying the money to their agent by their direction without any ground for anticipating any misapplication of such money, has been held liable in case the money was afterwards misapplied by the agent. Such authority as there is appears to be, as I have pointed out, against such liability.

On principle, the breach of duty by the trustees is the authorising an agent to receive the money, and certainly the purchaser takes no part in giving such authority. The trustees, of course, are liable to their cestui que trust in case the agent should misapply the money, but it would be going very far to make the purchaser liable as well as the agent and the trustees, and, in my opinion, it is expedient for the more convenient transaction of business, and to save a purchaser from considerable trouble, to hold that he is not liable.

In this particular case the solicitors of trustees for sale who have a power of giving receipts for the purchase-money propose to produce to the purchaser a deed duly executed by the trustees, having in the body thereof, or indorsed thereon, a receipt for the money duly signed by the trustees, and thereupon to require payment of the money to themselves. Assuming that the deed of conveyance is properly so executed, and the receipt duly signed, and that the purchaser is satisfied of this, and has no reason to suspect any intended misapplication of the money, I am bound by the statute, and the authorities I have referred to, to hold that he ought to pay the purchase-money to the solicitor, and may do so safely so far as he is concerned. I think there ought to be no costs of this application.

[No order was made on the summons.]

The guarantee above mentioned was given up in March, 1877, the overdraft having been by that time reduced to 4,000*l.*

In April, 1878, the society was in credit to the amount of 800*l.* In April, 1879, it was indebted to the amount of 6,457*l.*

During the year 1880, the receipts of the society amounted to 44,032*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.*, and the amount withdrawn during the same period from the society amounted to 37,857*l.* 11*s.* 5*d.*

On the 23rd of August, 1881, a petition was presented for winding up the society, and a winding up order was made on the 25th of October, 1881, and official liquidators were appointed.

In the beginning of 1881 the balance due to the bank amounted to a considerable sum, but that had been reduced at the date of the presentation of the petition to 2,734*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*, and this latter sum had been further reduced at the date of the institution of the present action to 1,302*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.*

This last reduction had been chiefly caused by repayment by borrowing members of the sums lent to them by the society upon the security of their deeds.

The official liquidators brought this action, claiming a declaration that the deeds deposited with the bankers were the property of the society, and were not subject to any lien in favour of the defendants, and asking for their delivery up to the plaintiffs; and, further, for repayment by the defendants of all moneys received by the defendants from borrowing members since the presentation of the petition.

The defendants, in their statement of defence, claimed a lien on the deeds to the extent of the balance due to them.

In the course of the proceedings before trial the solicitors of the respective parties signed the following admission:—

"We admit, from an examination of the pass-book containing the account of the plaintiff society with the defendants from January, 1881, to the present time, that the applications of the sums advanced by the defendants were in some instances made for the payment of members who had given notice of withdrawal, and the balance in payment of salaries of officers or legal expenses, or expenses in connection with the mortgaged colliery and other properties which the society had entered into possession of."

No other evidence was adduced at the trial before the Vice-Chancellor of the application of the money from time to time overdrawn of the bank.

The Vice-Chancellor, on the 24th of March, 1882, gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs as regards the lien, and ordered delivery up of the deeds; but declined to order the defendants to refund the money received by them since the petition from the borrowing members.

The defendants appealed.

By agreement the deeds were handed up, and the plaintiffs paid into Court the sum of 1,500*l.*, pending the appeal.

The plaintiffs presented a cross appeal against so much of the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor as refused to order repayment of the moneys received by the defendants since the petition.

Rigby, Q.C. (H. B. Buckley with him), for the appellants.—The question here is whether this transaction amounted to an actual case of loan and borrowing between the bankers and the society, or merely to an overdraft in the ordinary course of a banking business. We submit that the latter is the correct view of the transaction. There being no power of borrowing, either under the statute under which they were incorporated or under their rules, if the society had gone into the market and borrowed, such a proceeding would have been ultra vires; but the mere "overdrawing" of their banking account, for the purpose of carrying on the business of the society, although it may in one sense of the word be a "borrowing," is not prohibited either by statute or authority; and the society, although it cannot borrow, may incur debts and liabilities for any purpose in the ordinary purview of the business.

All payments of whatever kind are by the rule 47 to be made through the bankers, and a company which requires and is authorised by the bargain into which its members enter to have a banking account, has an implied authority to act in the ordinary way as between bankers and customers, and in that case the appellants would have a lien on their customers' securities quite independently of the memorandum of 1876.

The case of Laing v. Reed (1) is an authority that this Act does not make all borrowing illegal, but only such borrowing as would have the effect of altering the nature of the society; and the Lord Chancellor, in his judgment, puts the case of the society overdrawing its account at its banker's, and treats such a proceeding, if only the overdraft be within a limit laid down by the rules, as a regular one.

Stuart, V.C., in the case of In re The Cefn Cilcen Mining Company, Edgworth's Case (2), and in Waterlow v. Sharp (3), decided that an overdrawn banking account did not amount to a loan to be within a statutory prohibition against borrowing.

[JESSEL, M.R.—I should doubt if those cases were rightly decided.]

In Looker v. Wrigley; Leigh v. Wrigley (4) the society was formed under the statute of 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 72); and there is a statutory prohibition against borrowing beyond the limit specified by the Act; and the Special Case found as a fact that the transaction complained of was a loan.

But, at all events, upon the principle laid down in Ex parte Chippendale; in re The German Mining Company (5), and in The Cork and Youghal Railway Company (6), we are entitled to so much of any balance appearing due to us as can, upon an account being taken, be shewn to have been properly paid for the purposes of the society. This is really but the substitution of one creditor for another, and an enquiry should have been directed to shew what that amount was.

Ince, Q.C. (Snow with him), was called upon upon the latter point.—The plaintiffs distinctly raised on their pleadings the issue in the Mining Company's Case, stating that the company had not derived any benefit from the payments; while the defendants do not allege that any part of the moneys borrowed had been expended in necessary expenses. They ought, as in the case of wilful default, to have alleged and proved one item at least, and that would have been sufficient to ground an enquiry. The admissions relied on only amount to this—that from January, 1881, the moneys advanced by the defendants were in some instances made for payment of salaries of officers or legal expenses.

In 1881 the balance, as shewn on the pass-book, due to the bank was 10,000*l.* odd; that balance, at the time of the winding-up, was only 2,700*l.*; therefore, the amount got in by the society and paid into the bank between January, 1881, and July, 1881, was applied, to the extent of 7,000*l.*, in reducing the debt due to the bank.

It is clear that the society has more than paid any advances applied for proper purposes of the society.

Upon the cross appeal they argued that the payments made by the members into the bank between the dates of the presentation of the petition and the winding-up order could not be retained by the bank —The Companies Act, 1862, section 153.

[Rigby, Q.C., admitted that the right of the bank to retain these moneys must stand or fall with their right to the unpaid moneys claimed by them.]

LORD SELBORNE, L.C.—In this case the Court are of opinion that there ought to be a different order from that which has been made by the Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. They are not at all sure that they proceed upon any grounds of law from which the Vice-Chancellor would himself have dissented if he had thought that in the state of the evidence before him there was a case for an enquiry.

The general principles applicable to a case of this description are, we think, sufficiently well settled. There can be no doubt that where there is an express prohibition against borrowing it must be obeyed. There is also no doubt that where there is not an express prohibition against borrowing in the case of a company or society constituted for special purposes, no borrowing can be permitted without express authority except that which is properly incident to the course and conduct of the business, or for its proper purposes. Now in this case there is o borrowing power, nor can it be said that a borrowing power generally can be necessary for the purposes of the business of the society; therefore, it is not upon the footing of an incidental or express power to borrow that anything can be allowed in this case. When the documents are looked at in which the agreements between this society and their bankers, the appellants, are embodied, it is perfectly plain and apparent that a course of dealing was contemplated and agreed upon between the bankers and the society not authorised by the rules of the society, and consequently that any benefit of the securities which were in the hands of the bankers at the time of the winding-up, to which they may be legitimately entitled, is not founded upon those agreements or upon that course of dealing; that, so far as it depends upon the agreements, and the course of dealing which was regulated by the agreements, the bankers are wrong, and the burden of shewing that they are entitled to anything lies upon them and not upon the other side.

But there is an equitable principle, consistent with the law of which I have spoken, and sound in itself and sufficiently established by authority, which may entitle them, nevertheless, to some benefit from their securities; and if the facts of the case give them the benefit of that equitable principle, it is consistent with justice and with authority to say that irregularity, either of the form or of the substance of their course of dealing, shall not stand in the way of the justice due to them. That was established, to mention one authority only which came before this Court of Appeal, in the case of the Cork and Youghal Railway, where it was held, in respect to that class of securities which were called Lloyds' bonds, that although they could in themselves constitute no indebtedness as against the company issuing them, yet, nevertheless, they might be so far evidences of a contract between the company and the persons holding them of a legitimate kind as to entitle the holders to that security or right of repayment which the company might lawfully have given them under the actual circumstances of the case if that form had not been adopted; and I think the consistency of the equity allowed in the Cork and Youghal Case, with the general rule of law that persons who have no borrowing powers cannot by borrowing contract debts to the lenders, may be shewn in this way—The test is, Has the transaction, so treated as it was in the Cork and Youghal Case, added to the liabilities of the company? If the amount of the company's liabilities remains in substance unchanged, but there is merely for the convenience of payment a change of the creditor, there is no substantial borrowing in the result so far as relates to the position of the company; and therefore it may be regarded in this light as consistent with the general principles of equity that those who pay legitimate demands, which they must in some way or other have answered, and have had the benefit of other people's money, shall not retain that benefit so as in substance to make those other people pay their debts. I take it that that is a principle sufficiently sound in equity; and if the result is that by the transaction which assumes the shape of an advance or loan nothing is really added to the liabilities of the company, there has been no real transgression of the principle on which they are prohibited from borrowing. Well, applying that in the present case, we think that as far as it can be made out that the moneys which were advanced by the bankers simply went to pay the legitimate debts and liabilities of the society, the bankers ought to have the benefit of their security; but that the burden of proving that lies on them, and that in satisfying that burden they cannot have the benefit of the rule established in Clayton's Case, which is simply applicable where a person who has kept his books in a certain way had a right to appropriate moneys received as he pleased, and is shewn to have appropriated them in the manner appearing in the books. Nor can they have the benefit of the doctrine that a pass-book passing to and fro is evidence of a stated and settled account, because if the directors of this society could not borrow money they could not ratify an illegal borrowing simply by returning a pass-book.

The order which we think ought to be made I will presently state, but it would be right before concluding to observe upon the difference which does exist between us and the learned Judge in the Court below. The learned Judge thought (and in our opinion rightly) that in a case of this sort the burden of shewing that the benefit of the security could be claimed, not on the footing of the apparent course of dealing, but on the footing of the use that was made of the money, lay on the bankers. With that we agree; but the learned Judge thought it not satisfied, because there was no evidence before him as to the application of the money in detail or as to any particular items, except admissions actually agreed upon, in which it was said that of this money some part was applied in some way and some in another, without specifying any further particulars. Now, with great respect to the learned Judge, we think that that was rather too specific and narrow a view to take of the matter, when it is remembered that an enquiry would have followed if some items had been regularly proved, and that the account could not have been taken in that stage of the cause. That being so, what is the meaning of admissions of that kind? Why, surely, the natural interpretation of them is, that the parties intended, saving the expense of going into formal evidence, to lay the foundation for an enquiry or an account; and when the parties admit that the items, if they were looked into, would be found to range themselves into particular heads, and to divide themselves into particular classes, the Court thinks that is sufficient foundation for directing an account.

We propose to make this order:—"Reverse the order appealed from, and remit the case to the Duchy Court with the following declarations and directions:—

"Declare that, at the date of the petition to wind up the society, the appellants were entitled to hold the title-deeds and documents in the pleadings mentioned as a security for the repayment of so much, and so much only, of the moneys advanced by them from time to time to the society as were applied in payment of the debts or liabilities of the society properly payable, and had not been subsequently repaid to the appellants, if at the time aforesaid anything which had been so applied still remain due. Direct an enquiry whether, at the date of the petition to wind up, any and what sum was due from the society to the appellants in respect of moneys so advanced and so applied as aforesaid, and whether any and what moneys belonging to the society were afterwards received by the appellants, and whether any, and if any what, sum now remains due to the appellants in respect of money so advanced and so applied as aforesaid. And declare that, in making such enquiries and for the purpose thereof, the appellants are to be charged with all sums received by them on account of the society since the time when the society last ceased to have any balance standing to its credit in its account with the appellants, and that they are not to be allowed any sums advanced by them to the order or on the account of the society since the same time which were applied by the society in making payments to withdrawing members, or in any other manner, except in payment of such debts or liabilities of the society properly payable as aforesaid. If on the result of such enquiries it should appear that any sum is now due from the society to the appellants, direct payment to them thereof out of the fund now in Court. If it shall appear that nothing is now due, and that since the date of the petition to wind up the appellants have received moneys belonging to the society which at the time when they were so received were not properly applicable, according to the foregoing declarations, in payment of any amount then due from the society to the appellants, or which exceeded the amount (if any) so applicable, direct payment by appellants of the money so received by them, or of so much thereof as may not be applicable as aforesaid, to the respondent the official liquidator of the society. The appellants to have the costs of the suit and this appeal if it shall appear that anything is now due to them, having regard to the foregoing declarations and directions, and to pay all such costs of the respondent the official liquidator if it shall appear that nothing is so due."

BENNETT v. THE GASLIGHT AND COKE COMPANY.

Trustee and Cestui que trust—Conflicting Interests—Benefits acquired by Trustee transferred to Trust Estate.

A trustee will not be permitted to place himself in a position in which his personal interests will conflict with those of the trust; and if he does place himself in such a position, and acquires benefits from so doing, those benefits will be transferred to the trust estate.

On the insolvency of a person who had a lucrative agency agreement with a gas company for the sale by him, at a commission, of their sulphate of ammonia, the company renewed the agency agreement for a limited period to two of the trustees of the insolvent's estate appointed by a creditors' trust deed for the benefit of the estate. Before the expiration of that agreement and the winding up of the trust, one of those two trustees obtained for his firm from the company a fresh agency agreement, to commence from the expiration of that agreement, and to be on less lucrative, though still beneficial, terms:—

Held, that the trustee was not at liberty, by obtaining a fresh agreement for the benefit of his own firm, to render it contrary to his own interest to press for a renewal of the old agreement, or a grant of a new one, for the benefit of the trust estate, and that the interest of the trustee under the fresh agreement must be transferred to the trust estate.

Hamilton v. Wright (9 Cl. & F. 111) followed.

By an indenture of the 2nd of November, 1877, it was agreed that the Gaslight and Coke Company should, during the continuance of the agreement, supply to R. W. Wallace (a chemical manufacturer and commission agent), for the purpose of sale by him, as the agent of the company, all the sulphate of ammonia which should be produced at the company's works at Beckton, and should pay Wallace a commission of five per cent. on all sales. Wallace was to keep accounts, and pay over to the company the whole of the amounts payable in respect of sales. The agreement was to continue for three years from the date of the first delivery of sulphate of ammonia; but if Wallace should make default, power was reserved to the company of determining the agreement during the term by giving two months' notice.

The contract was a lucrative one; but Wallace, nevertheless, became insolvent in October, 1879, being at that time indebted to the company to the extent of 11,250*l.*; and on the 9th of October, 1879, the company gave notice to determine the agreement.

By an indenture of the 14th of November, 1879, between the company and W. G. Blagden and C. C. C. Wightman (two of Wallace's principal creditors and of the trustees of his estate under the next indenture), reciting that by the indenture of even date next to be stated it had been agreed to cancel the agreement of the 2nd of November, 1877, forthwith, and that the company should retain commissions on sales under the present agreement in reduction of the debt of 11,250*l.*, it was agreed that the company should, during the continuance of the agreement, supply to Blagden and Wightman, for the purpose of sale by them, as the agents of the company, all the sulphate of ammonia which should be produced at the company's works at Beckton, and should pay Blagden and Wightman a commission of five per cent. on all sales; Blagden and Wightman to keep accounts and pay over the amounts due. The agreement was to continue up to the 31st of December, 1880, power being reserved to the company to determine the agreement if Blagden and Wightman should make default.

By another indenture of even date, to which Wallace, the company, and (with a few unimportant exceptions) all the former's other creditors were parties, Wallace conveyed and assigned to Blagden, Wightman and two other of his principal creditors (W. C. Bacon and W. S. Northcott), the whole of his real and personal estate, upon trust to carry on the business and deal with the estate at their discretion; and it was agreed that the trustees should allow the company to retain all commissions on sales under the last agreement in reduction of the debt of 11,250*l.* The indenture also contained provisions for the payment of the debt by instalments, and for the sale of the business (after the debt was completely discharged) and the division of the proceeds among the creditors, any surplus to go to Wallace. The company and the creditors, parties to the deed, released Wallace from all claims, and it was agreed that Blagden and Wightman might deal in sulphate of ammonia, under the contemporaneous agreement, notwithstanding their trusteeship.

In the course of the year 1880 the debt to the company was paid off, but the remaining debts were not paid off, nor was the trust wound up.

By an indenture of the 3rd of December, 1880, reciting an agreement that after the expiration of the agency agreement of the 14th of November, 1879, the company should employ Blagden and one John Angus (being the members of the firm of Blagden & Angus) as their agents for the sale of sulphate of ammonia, it was agreed that the company should, during the continuance of the new agreement, employ Blagden & Angus to sell for them, as their agents, all the sulphate of ammonia which should be produced at the company's works at Beckton, and should pay them a commission of fifteen shillings per cent. on all sales, with an addition in the case of sales for delivery out of the United Kingdom. Blagden & Angus were to keep accounts, and pay over to the company the amounts due. The agreement was to commence from the expiration of the agreement of the 14th of November, 1879, and to continue to the 31st of December, 1883, power being reserved to either party to determine it sooner, on the 31st of December, 1881, or 1882, by three months' notice, and to the company to determine it at any time without notice in case of default by Blagden & Angus.

The circumstances under which this agreement was entered into are fully stated in the judgment.

The present action was commenced on the 29th of December, 1880, by Bennett & Sons, who were included among the creditors of Wallace, parties to the trust deed of the 14th of November, 1879, and whose debt of 740*l.* had not been paid, against the company, Wallace, and his four trustees. The statement of claim contained various allegations of fraud, misrepresentation and wrongful dealing on the part of the defendants, and sought to have the trust deed of the 14th of November, 1879, declared fraudulent, and set aside, with consequential relief; and, in the alternative, to have the trusts of the deed carried into execution, with consequential relief, including the taking of accounts against Wallace and the trustees.

This was the hearing of the action with witnesses.

In the course of the hearing the action was dismissed as against the company and Wallace.

PEARSON, J. (after stating the facts, and disposing of a part of the case, proceeded as follows:)—It now remains for me to deal with a question of very considerable importance, and which arises under very peculiar circumstances—namely, whether or not Mr. Blagden, having obtained for his firm of Blagden & Angus a contract from the gas company to act as their agents from the conclusion of the contract with Messrs. Blagden & Wightman as trustees, ought to be held to be a trustee of that contract for the benefit of the creditors' estate, either in whole or in part. That is a serious question. The arrangement with the gas company was a very valuable arrangement. The gas company, as far as I understand, in consequence of Mr. Wallace's ability and the patents taken out by him, had suddenly got a sale for a new product of the residuum from the manufacture of their gas, which was begun to be sold practically about the year 1879, or a little earlier—at all events the sale had not been established thoroughly in the year 1879; and the gas company gave a new contract to two of the principal creditors of Mr. Wallace—Messrs. Blagden & Wightman—under which they were constituted agents for the sale of sulphate of ammonia until the 31st of December, 1880, upon the terms that, out of the five per cent. commission which was paid to them, the debt due to the gas company was to be retained and paid to them, and only the surplus (if any) was to go to the creditors. That contract accordingly went on from the 14th of November, 1879, and during the year the result was an exceedingly beneficial one to Mr. Wallace's estate, the whole debt of the gas company being paid off, and a sum of 1,900*l.* left for the benefit of Mr. Wallace's creditors. Under these circumstances, both the trustees and those creditors who were aware of the facts must have known the beneficial nature of the agency for the gas company; and the trustees, at any rate, must have known perfectly well that it would be an exceedingly beneficial thing, if they possibly could, to get an extension of the contract for the benefit of the creditors of Mr. Wallace's estate; for, up to the present time, I am informed that (with the exception of certain creditors who did not come into the arrangement, and who were paid in order that the business might be carried on) no one of them has received a penny of dividends from Mr. Wallace's estate, nor is it likely that they will receive anything. Knowing, therefore, the benefits which would arise from getting a renewal of the contract with the gas company, who had not at that time given any hint whatever of an intention to renew it, but hoping against hope that they might do so, the creditors made endeavours to induce the company to accede to their application, and sent a deputation to endeavour to get a renewal of the contract in some form or other. The deputation, however, was met by a positive refusal, which was not surprising when it was found that the profit upon the commission at five per cent. amounted to something like 15,000*l.* a year. That was a commission utterly above the mark, and the gas company declined to continue it. At that time no person who was a trustee, other than Mr. Wightman, knew what had taken place in July and August, which was this—that Mr. Blagden had had a conversation with Mr. Phillips, the secretary of the company, when he asked him for a renewal of the contract for the benefit of the creditors, and Mr. Phillips told him it was quite hopeless. But, having got that answer, he did not communicate it to any of his co-trustees. He afterwards, however, had a discussion with Mr. Phillips as to his own firm being appointed agents, and it turns out that Mr. Blagden was the very person—was the trustee—who was constantly in communication with the company in regard to this agency contract. He was the very person who attended all the meetings of the committee upon the subject. He was the person through whom all the sales were made, and he was the medium of all business transactions between the company and himself and his co-trustees. No one can doubt, therefore, that Mr. Blagden had got a footing with the company through his employment as one of the parties to that agency contract of November, 1879, which put him in a position to obtain more favourable terms probably, but certainly the first opportunity of getting a contract for the benefit of himself and his partner Angus from the company. In July, therefore, he entered into negotiations with Mr. Phillips for a contract for this agency to be granted to himself and his partner, and that had gone so far that on the 11th of August there were two letters written which practically contain the whole of the contract which has since been entered into between the company and Messrs. Blagden & Angus, and under which they are appointed agents for the company for a term of about three years, no doubt with a power of putting an end to it; but, nevertheless, as Mr. Blagden very fairly said, although there is the power in the deed, the company have never exercised it; and I presume, as practical men, Messrs. Blagden & Angus do not expect that the company will exercise it.

Now the question which I have to determine is this:—Could Mr. Blagden properly take that contract without any communication whatever with his co-trustees, without giving them the opportunity, in the first instance, of themselves applying, not by a chance conversation between themselves and Mr. Phillips, but by a proper application to be made by the trustees to the gas company, to get a renewal of the contract for the benefit of creditors; and can Mr. Blagden, having got it, hold that contract for his own benefit? I am of opinion that he cannot. I am of opinion that, getting that contract in the way he did, he was disqualified at the time he obtained it from holding it for his own benefit, and that, according to the rules of this Court, he must be held to have obtained it for the benefit of those parties for whom he was trustee, who were his cestuis que trust, and for whose benefit he ought to have obtained it, if he got it at all.

I feel less difficulty in saying that, because I find the doctrine laid down in the House of Lords in the strongest possible way, not only that a trustee cannot interfere to prejudice his cestui que trust, but that he cannot put himself into a position in which he shall have interests conflicting with the interests of his cestui que trust; and that the question as to whether or not he is responsible for what he has done, or as to whether or not he can hold what he has got, does not depend upon the fact as to whether or not he has done any mischief to his cestui que trust, but that, simply on the ground of his being in the position of trustee, he is estopped by that position from doing anything that can by any possibility stand in the way of his properly discharging his duty to his cestui que trust. I will only read one passage—"There cannot be a greater mistake," says Lord Brougham, in Hamilton v. Wright (1), "than to suppose, as seems to have been done below, that a trustee is only prevented from doing things which bring an actual loss upon the estate under his administration. It is quite enough that the thing which he does has a tendency to injure the trust, a tendency to interfere with his duty."

Now I ask whether what Mr. Blagden did in this case had or had not a tendency to injure the trust, or a tendency to interfere with the discharge of his duty to his cestuis que trust? I can only answer that question in the affirmative. I say, in the first instance it put him in this position—that he was then necessarily acting in his own interest, he being opposed to the grant of any agency contract to the trustees for the benefit of Mr. Wallace's estate, because he was desirous to keep it for the benefit of his own firm. I say so still more, because I find that he began as early as the 28th of October to get contracts for the sale of the sulphate of ammonia, under the contract into which he was to enter on the 3rd of December, 1880. It is said that those contracts were for the sale of sulphate of ammonia which did not come within the agency contract of the 14th of November, 1879, because it was ammonia which was to be produced after the 31st of December, 1880. I will assume that that is so. Then I ask myself whether, if Messrs. Blagden & Angus had not got this contract for their own benefit, which was to be entered into and was entered into on the 3rd of December, 1880, that sale which they made on the 28th of October would not have been carried to the credit of Mr. Wallace's estate instead of to that of anyone else? I answer at once affirmatively that it would, and that Mr. Wallace's creditors would have had the benefit of it; and therefore I say, following Lord Brougham's observation, that that thing which Blagden did had a tendency to injure the trust, and had a tendency to interfere with his duty to his cestuis que trust.

Mr. Angus is not before the Court, and I can, therefore, make no decree which will affect his interests. I do not know what Mr. Blagden's interest in the partnership of Blagden & Angus is, and I can consequently only declare that among the assets which have to be distributed under the trust deed of the 14th of November, 1879, Mr. Blagden's interest in this contract of the 3rd of December, 1880, must be included.

[His Lordship then proceeded to direct that the action should be amended by making it on behalf of all the creditors, as well as of the plaintiffs, and directed an ordinary account under the trust deed. The costs of this part of the case were reserved until after the taking of the accounts, and the remaining costs given against the plaintiffs.]

GLEADOW v. LEETHAM.

Will—Construction—Annuity—Whether given free of Income-tax—"Deduction."

A testator directed his trustees to stand possessed of his residuary personal estate, upon trust, by and out of the income thereof, to pay to his widow "the clear yearly sum" of 1,000*l. for life; the said annuity "to be paid free from all deductions and abatements whatsoever":*—Held, that the words of the gift were not sufficient to entitle the widow to have the income-tax paid by the trustees out of the testator's residuary personal estate.

William Leetham, who died on the 14th of January, 1875, by his will, dated the 1st of September, 1864, after appointing two persons executors and trustees, declared that his trustees should stand possessed of his residuary personal estate, and of the funds in which it should be invested and the income thereof, upon trust, by and out of the said income, to pay to his wife "the clear yearly sum of 600*l.*" for life, if she should so long remain his widow, in half-yearly portions, but if she should marry again, then the trustees were to pay her during her life, for her sole and separate use, an annuity of 100*l.* in lieu of the annuity of 600*l.*, "the said annuities of 600*l.* and 100*l.*, as the case may be, to be paid free from all deductions and abatements whatsoever"; and subject thereto he gave and bequeathed his said residuary personal estate upon certain trusts in favour of his children.

By a codicil, dated the 3rd of April, 1869, the testator revoked the appointment of one of the executors and trustees appointed by the will, and gave and bequeathed to his wife an annuity of 1,000*l.* in lieu of the annuity of 600*l.* given to her by his will.

This was a suit by the sole executor and trustee of the will against the widow (the annuitant named in the will and codicil), and the eldest son of the testator, praying that the trusts of the will might be carried into execution, and the real and personal estate of the testator administered by the Court.

The suit now came on on further consideration, when the question was argued whether the widow was entitled to have the income-tax on her annuity of 1,000*l.* paid by the trustees out of the residuary estate of the testator, or ought to pay it herself.

W. W. Karslake, Q.C., and R. B. Davis, for the plaintiffs.

Gleadow v. Leetham.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Curtis Price, for the annuitant.—The annuity to the widow is free of income-tax. Lord Lovatt v. The Duchess of Leeds (1), In re Bannerman; Bannerman v. Young (2) and Peareth v. Marriott (3) are authorities in our favour.

They referred also to Abadam v. Abadam (4), Turner v. Mullineux (5) and Festing v. Taylor (6).

Northmore Lawrence, for the defendant, the son.—This annuity is subject to income-tax. In all the cases which can be cited against me the words "tax" or "taxes" occurred, and the word "deduction" was construed, by the association of "tax" or "taxes" with it, to extend to income-tax. In Lethbridge v. Thurlow (7) the Master of the Rolls said that income-tax was not properly a deduction, but a charge which the Legislature imposed on the person who received the money. See also Abadam v. Abadam (4) and Sadler v. Rickards (8).

[KAY, J., referred to Floyer v. Bankes (9).]

W. Pearson, Q.C., and Borthwick, and Davenport and Seaton, for other parties in the same interest.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., in reply.—In this case the testator directs his trustees to pay to his wife a "clear" yearly sum, and, as was said by Hall, V.C., in In re Bannerman; Bannerman v. Young (2), if the trustees deduct income-tax they do not in fact pay a clear sum. Moreover, as the annuitant was the wife of the testator, there was no other deduction except income-tax to which the annuity could be subject.

KAY, J.—There are two classes of cases in reference to this question:—one, where by a will a testator gives an annuity, and then directs that it shall be free from all deductions in respect of any taxes, &c., and of this class of cases the principal examples are Festing v. Taylor (6), a decision of the Exchequer Chamber, Lord Lovatt v. The Duchess of Leeds (1) and In re Bannerman; Bannerman v. Young (2). In all these cases the word "deduction" was construed by the word "taxes" which was associated with it, and it seems to have been held that the annuity was to be paid free of income-tax. The other class of cases is where the words are "to be paid without any deduction," or "free from legacy duty and other deductions," and in those cases the income-tax was held to be payable by the annuitants, because it seems to have been held over and over again that income-tax is not, properly speaking, a deduction, and there must be something else beside the word "deduction" to make the gift of an annuity free of income-tax, and it is only where the word "deduction" is coupled with the word "taxes," or there is some other indication that it was meant to include income-tax, that it is so construed. Of this second class of cases the principal examples are—Lethbridge v. Thurlow (7), Abadam v. Abadam (4), Turner v. Mullineux (5) and Sadler v. Rickards (8). I refer for a moment to Turner v. Mullineux (5), because there the gift was in this way:—a devise to trustees upon trust out of the rents and profits to pay to the testator's widow, during widowhood, an annuity of 350*l.* "free from income or property tax, or any other deductions," and, after a declaration that it was to be in full of all claims for dower, there was a further trust out of the rents and profits "to pay to each of the testator's daughters an annuity of 100*l.* apiece, to be paid free from all deductions." It was the last words which had to be construed, and the Vice-Chancellor Wood said this:—"This Court always holds that income-tax is not a deduction; but here the testator in the first instance speaks of 'income or property tax and all other deductions,' which explains that he understands the word deductions as extending to income-tax." The testator afterwards went on and gave other annuities and shortened the expression in the last gift to "free from deduction," and the Vice-Chancellor said: "the true way of construing the will is not to interpret the last gift and carry back that construction of the word 'deduction' to the earlier clauses, but to read the word throughout in the sense in which it is first used."

In other words, the testator had by the will put on the word "deduction" a construction which evidently shewed that he intended it to include income-tax, and accordingly it was held that income-tax was included in the subsequent words "free from all deductions" and "free from all deduction." There is one other case to which I will refer specially on this point, which is that of Sadler v. Rickards (8), where there was a gift by will upon trust to invest as therein mentioned, and the trustees were, out of the income arising from the investments, to pay the annual sum of 500*l.*, "free from legacy duty and other deductions," to the testator's wife during her life, and subject thereto to apply the income for the benefit of his children, and the Vice-Chancellor Wood, after referring to Wall v. Wall (10) and Lethbridge v. Thurlow (7), said, "without going into the question how I should have decided the point in the absence of those authorities, I must hold that this annuity is subject to income-tax under the recent Act" (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), "and the tax must be paid out of the annuity itself." Now in this case the words are not quite like those I have read from those two cases. The question is, within which of the two classes of cases the gift in this case comes. The gift is as follows: [His Lordship read the terms of the will as above set out and continued:] It is to be observed that there is no use of the word "tax" or anything of the kind. But it was contended that this case is distinguishable from the latter class of cases, for the reason that the annuity is given by the testator to his wife as a "clear yearly sum." However, if income-tax be not a deduction but a payment which the annuitant has to make herself, not out of the annuity, but because she receives the annuity, that is, not as a deduction, then I do not see that the word "clear" carries the matter any further. If income-tax is not a deduction, then the annuity is paid to her "clear" of any deduction. I do not think it is expedient for Judges to try to make fine distinctions in cases of this kind. It is much better and more beneficial to the world in general that the broad line of demarcation should be adhered to and not departed from. Therefore it seems to me that this case comes within the latter of the two classes of cases to which I have referred, it being a case in which there is no use of the word "tax," but merely a direction that the annuity shall be paid "free from all deductions and abatements," and to pay a "clear yearly sum." I confess that but for the authorities referred to I should have felt a little more difficulty than I do, because here, the annuity being given to the testator's wife, I do not see very well what the direction was aimed at, unless it was at the income-tax. The widow would not have to pay legacy duty, therefore the testator could not mean that. It is possible to give a meaning to the word "abatements," because it is possible, though not likely in this case, that the income-tax might not be enough to pay the annuity, and the word "abatements" might mean that in that case it should come out of capital. But it seems difficult to give a meaning to the word "deductions" when coupled with "abatements" in the case of an annuity to a wife. I cannot help thinking that it is very possible that this testator, if asked what he meant (supposing he meant anything), would have said that he intended it to refer to income-tax, and that it should be paid out of his estate; but, without speculating on what the testator may have meant, I must adhere to the rule of construction laid down by decided cases, according to which I am not at liberty to treat income-tax as being a deduction. I therefore hold that the annuity is liable to the income-tax—that it was not given free of it.

AYLWIN v. EVANS.

Sheriff—Fi. fa.—Wrongful Seizure—Action—Interpleader—Costs.

On the 20th of August the sheriff, under a fi. fa. against A, took possession of B's furniture in A's house. Both before and after seizure B gave formal notice to the sheriff that the furniture was his, and on the 23rd issued the writ in this action against the sheriff for an injunction and damages. On the 25th of August the sheriff issued an interpleader summons, under which an issue was directed and an order made for the sheriff withdrawing from possession on payment of 100l. into Court. The sheriff accordingly withdrew from possession on the 1st of September. B's title was afterwards admitted by the judgment creditor, and the 100l. paid out of Court to B. B now brought this action to trial against the sheriff for damages and costs:—Held, that the sheriff had not exceeded the scope of his duty in retaining possession till ordered to withdraw under the interpleader order, and that the action must be dismissed, but without costs, on the ground that the sheriff might have applied to the Judge, under the interpleader order, to dispose of the matters in question between him and the plaintiff.

This was an action by Herbert Aylwin against the sheriff of Hertfordshire, claiming damages for wrongful seizure and detention of the plaintiff's furniture, and an injunction to restrain the sheriff from selling the same.

The facts out of which the claim arose were as follows:—On the 9th of August, 1881, Maple & Co. signed judgment in the Queen's Bench Division for 162*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* against George Aylwin, and on the 15th of August issued a writ of fi. fa., under which, on the 20th of August, the sheriff took possession of certain furniture in Glady's Cottage, Paddock Road, Bushey, where George Aylwin and his wife lived.

The furniture in question was claimed by the plaintiff as trustee under the marriage settlement of George Aylwin and his wife, and, in anticipation of the intended execution, the solicitor of the plaintiff had given formal notice in writing to the sheriff that the furniture was the property of the plaintiff. Further notice to the same effect was given on the 22nd of August. As the sheriff's officer refused to withdraw, the plaintiff issued the writ in this action on the 23rd of August, and obtained an interim injunction from Mr. Justice Cave, as vacation Judge, restraining the sheriff from selling, and served notice of motion for a continuance of the injunction. On the 25th of August the sheriff issued an interpleader summons, in which the plaintiff in this action was claimant. On the 26th of August the motion for an injunction was ordered to stand over till the 31st. On the 29th of August the interpleader summons came on before Mr. Justice Cave, as vacation Judge, and an order was made that on payment of 100*l.* into Court by the plaintiff the sheriff should withdraw and an issue be tried in the usual way. The order continued, "And it is further ordered that the question of costs, and all further questions, be reserved until the trial of the said issue, and that no action shall be brought against the sheriff for the seizure of the said goods. No further action to be brought."

The 100*l.* was paid into Court on the 1st of September, and thereupon the sheriff withdrew from possession. The issue under the interpleader order was afterwards disposed of between the parties, Maple & Co. admitting the claim of the plaintiff and paying his taxed costs of the issue, and the 100*l.* was paid out of Court to the plaintiff. On the 21st of December the motion for an injunction, which had been ordered to stand over till after the issue was disposed of, was brought on, and was ordered to stand to the hearing of the action. On this occasion the plaintiff offered to take immediate judgment in the action for damages and costs. The defendant refused, and the action now came on for trial.

Marten, Q.C., and Oswald, for the plaintiff.—The sheriff is liable for wrongful seizure and detention. Under the circumstances, and having regard to the notice which was given, no seizure should have been made, or if a seizure was necessary as the foundation for interpleader, a formal seizure would have sufficed. There was no excuse for possession being retained for ten days. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to an enquiry as to damages and the costs of the action—Playfair v. Musgrove (1) and Ash v. Dawnay (2).

The action is properly brought against the sheriff, and not against the execution creditor—Smith v. Keal (3).

Horton Smith, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, for the defendant.—First, the Court has no jurisdiction to entertain this action. An execution is a proceeding in an action, and this action is therefore an attempt to interfere with proceedings in the Queen's Bench Division—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24. sub-s. 5; Wright v. Redgrave (4). Secondly, in any case, the action was unnecessary and premature, and no injunction would have been granted—Hilliard v. Hanson (5). The sheriff was bound to seize before he could interplead—Lea v. Ross (6). There is no evidence of damage, or that the sheriff acted otherwise than in the ordinary course of his duty, and the action ought to be dismissed with costs. They also cited Lewis v. Jones (7).

Marten, in reply.—This division has jurisdiction—Marsden v. Smith (8) and Hilliard v. Hanson (5). Wright v. Redgrave (4) is distinguishable, as there the interpleader summons was taken out before the writ in the Chancery Division was issued. On the other point Hilliard v. Hanson (5) is distinguishable, as there no written notice was given to the sheriff, and the writ was issued on the day of the seizure. In the present case the seizure was made on the 20th, and the writ issued only on the 23rd, and the interpleader summons was not taken out till the 25th. The plaintiff was a trustee, and was bound to protect the trust estate by issuing the writ. The interpleader order was not intended to interfere with the Chancery action which had been already commenced.

BACON, V.C.—The plaintiff says he has sustained damage, and asks for an injunction. The evidence satisfies me that he has sustained no damage whatever, and the injunction is beyond our reach, because that part of the case is otherwise disposed of. Now, bearing in mind the 24th section of the Judicature Act, 1873, and what the Master of the Rolls is reported to have said in the case which has been referred to—Wright v. Redgrave (4)—though I do not rest it on the 24th section, and do not forget that the plaintiff as owner of these goods had a right to bring an action, yet I do say that the plaintiff by his own action has shewn he has no right to sustain the injunction which he obtained ex parte, and that he has not sustained damage for which the sheriff is responsible. The Interpleader Act was passed for the protection of the sheriff, and affords him an ordinary means of protecting himself by throwing the battle on the contending parties. That is what the sheriff did here. It is said that between the 20th and 25th there was a delay, for which the sheriff is responsible. It can hardly be stated seriously. Notices came in on the sheriff, and he did what he was entitled to do. By an interpleader summons he brings it before the Judge, the very Judge who gave the ex parte injunction. Exercising the authority given to him, the Judge, having the whole case, the injunction, action and interpleader, before him, makes this order. [His Lordship read the material part of the order and continued:] I say that order settled the whole question between the parties. If the plaintiff had pursued the order he would have brought the consideration of his other claim before the Judge. Instead of which he takes the law into his own hands. Having only a shadowy claim against the sheriff he settled with Maple & Co., receiving from them the costs which had been incurred, and after that, because four days had elapsed, he says he has a right to sue the sheriff. I say—for what? The sheriff has only done what the Act authorised him to do. He has availed himself of the Interpleader Act; he has put the question in a train for quick settlement; and the parties do deal with it and do settle it. On what ground can I say that the sheriff has behaved wrongly? The parties interested settle on the interpleader case. The sheriff was one party to the litigation. The parties settled that by themselves, and I am asked to give damages because the sheriff did his duty. Whether, having regard to the Judicature Act, this action could be sustained, I do not decide, but what the Judge in effect said was this: "There is a serious question between you; that shall be put in course of trial between you, and I will settle all other questions between you." The matter is settled; the costs are paid; and yet this action is brought on, in which I am asked to give an injunction, which is an impossibility; and I am asked to direct an enquiry as to damages. I say that there is no ground whatever for suggesting that the plaintiff has sustained any damages. The only question is as to costs. The plaintiff is entitled to no costs. In my opinion he has pressed on the matter merely to get costs. On the other hand, I can give the sheriff no costs, because, with the protection of the interpleader order, the sheriff might have brought this matter before the Judge who made the interpleader order, and have got the matter disposed of. The action will, therefore, be dismissed without costs.

CABLE v. MARKS.

Copyright—Cardboard cut to imitate Picture—"Book"—Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 145), s. 2.

The plaintiff claimed copyright in a certain book with a picture or design registered as "The Christograph: The Christian's Puzzle. Suitable for all sects and denominations." The so-called book consisted of an envelope, on the outside of which the title was printed, and inside which was enclosed—first, a piece of cardboard, so cut that when held up to the light it cast a shadow resembling the well-known picture "Ecce Homo"; and, secondly, a slip of paper, on which were printed some lines from Longfellow, which served as a key to the use of the piece of cardboard:—Held, that there was nothing in the so-called book which could be the subject of copyright.

This was an action to restrain the infringement of the plaintiff's copyright. The plaintiff by her statement of claim claimed to be the proprietor of a subsisting copyright in a certain book with a picture or design registered as "The Christograph: The Christian's Puzzle. Suitable for all sects and denominations." The so-called book consisted of an envelope, with the following words printed on the outside: "Entered at Stationers' Hall. Key enclosed. The Christograph: The Christian's Puzzle. Suitable for all sects and denominations. Every family should have it. Price, with key, sixpence." This envelope contained—first, a piece of cardboard, so cut that when held up to the light it cast a shadow resembling the well-known picture "Ecce Homo"; and, secondly, a slip of paper, on which were printed the following lines:

"Where'er the shade of this shall fall,
On princely dome or cottage wall;
It will a soft resemblance give
Of Him who died that all might live."

The plaintiff alleged that the defendants had printed and sold "divers copies or imitations, colourable and otherwise, of the said book and picture or design, or a material part thereof, under the name of the 'Biblioscope or Shadowgraph' and otherwise," and claimed an injunction, an account of profits, and damages.

The defendants by their defence denied that the plaintiff was the proprietor of "any subsisting copyright in any such book, or that there was any subsisting copyright of any such book, or that there was any such book." The defendants explained the use to be made of their card, by the same four verses, which they stated to be by the poet Longfellow.

Cable v. Marks.

Hemming, Q.C., and Oswald, for the plaintiff.—The envelope with its enclosures is a "book" within the Copyright Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. s. 2. It is immaterial that it is not stitched like a book—Clementi v. Goulding (1); or that the letterpress is not original, or of no literary value, if the picture or design with which it is associated be original—Grace v. Newman (2), Maple v. The Junior Army and Navy Stores (3), overruling Cobbett v. Woodward (4). There is novelty in the plaintiff's design of representing the picture, though the picture itself be well known—Dicks v. Brooks (5) and Bradbury v. Hotten (6).

Farwell, for the defendants, was not called on.

BACON, V.C.—In my opinion there is no ground on which this suit can be maintained. The right of the plaintiff is founded on the statute which has been referred to, which begins with the recital, "Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to copyright, and to afford greater encouragement to the production of literary works of lasting benefit to the world"; so that the object of the Act was to protect a literary work, though a single sheet may come within the protection of the Act, and not the less because it is a single sheet. In the present case I am asked to hold that the subject of this action is a literary production, that it is protected under the statute. The only thing that is registered as a book under the statute is this: "The Christograph: The Christian's Puzzle. Suitable for all sects and denominations." And that is all that is registered; that, therefore, is the only thing registered as a book. Nothing is said about the contents. The contents consist of a card representing a picture which is perfectly notorious, and some verses which, but for a great name to which they are attributed, I should say were of a very doggerel character, explaining the use to be made of the card. The plaintiff comes and says, "I am the author of a literary work"; and I say that this is not a literary work: she is the inventor of a child's trick, and she puts it into an envelope, and registers the title, and nothing else. The cases which have been cited do not apply to this case. In Grace v. Newman (2) the stonemason who published a book of designs published a literary work; other stonemasons could go to the book and learn how they could employ their skill; so the illustrated catalogue was a literary production. But the thing before me has no pretence to be a literary work, or to novelty. All the world may copy this card, and write on the outside how it may be operated on. Neither on the authority of any of the cases, nor under the words of the statute, nor looking to the nature of the thing itself, can it be said that the defendant was not at liberty to cut out a similar card and sell it. The only thing he could not do was to pretend that it was the card of the plaintiff, and it is not suggested that he has done so. The action must be dismissed with costs.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE ACTON LOCAL BOARD.

Public Corporation — Local Board— Easement—Sewage — Injunction — Public Health Acts, 1848, 1875—Local Government Act, 1868—Metropolitan Government Act, 1855.

A local board was restrained, at the instance of the Metropolitan Board of Works, from "directing or authorising" the discharge of sewage from new houses in their district into a natural watercourse the lower portion of which was a sewer vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works.

Quære, whether a local board can compel the disconnection with a sewer of drains once authorised.

In this action the Attorney-General sued at the relation of the Metropolitan Board of Works to restrain the Acton Local Board from causing or permitting or authorising sewage to flow into an old watercourse called the Stamford Brook West Branch, so as to cause a nuisance. The action was dismissed on the evidence so far as it related to nuisance. The Metropolitan Board of Works also sued as co-plaintiffs, on the ground of private damage, to restrain the Acton Local Board from "permitting or causing or authorising" any sewage to be discharged through the Stamford Brook West Branch into the Metropolitan Main Drainage System, and for damages. At the bar relief in respect of "permitting" others to discharge sewage was given up, and an injunction asked to restrain the defendants from directing or authorising the discharge of sewage. The damage alleged was in increased pumping and over-taxing of pumps. But it was admitted by the plaintiffs' witnesses that the additional expense in pumping by the presence of the Acton sewage was not large, and that any overtaxing of pumps was due to storm water.

Stamford Brook West Branch is an old watercourse, the upper portion of which lies in the parish of Acton. The rest of its course is in Hammersmith parish, where it joins Stamford Brook East Branch; from the point of junction the united stream formerly carried the drainage of their district to the Thames at Hammersmith Creek.

The Metropolitan Board of Works were incorporated in the year 1855 by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. By that Act, the parish of Acton was excluded from, and the parish of Hammersmith was included in, their jurisdiction by the Act; and among other sewers formerly vested in the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers so much of Stamford Brook West Branch as lies in the parish of Hammersmith was vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works.

At a point below the junction of the two branches of Stamford Brook, the Metropolitan Board, as part of the work of their drainage scheme which was commenced in 1855, constructed an intercepting sewer by which (except in time of excessive rain) the whole of the sewage and water from Stamford Brook West Branch is taken into the Metropolitan Main Drainage System, a portion of the sewage passing down the Eastern Branch having been intercepted at a higher point.

The defendant board were constituted in the year 1868 under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1848, and the Local Government Act, 1858.

It was in evidence that the number of houses in Acton parish had continuously increased from 1855 downwards to a large extent, and a large number of the new houses had a drain communicating with the Stamford Brook West Branch.

In November, 1876, the Metropolitan Board gave the Acton Board written notice that unless they were prepared to discontinue the passage of sewage from its district into the Main Drainage of the Metropolitan Board the latter Board would forthwith take the necessary proceedings to enforce such a discontinuance. In July, 1877, the writ in this action was issued. Issue was joined in January, 1879. Proceedings were allowed to stand over, pending the trial and appeal in the action of The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The London and North Western Railway Company (1).

Cookson, Q.C., and Pownall, for the Metropolitan Board of Works.—We cannot, after the cases of Glossop v. The Heston Local Board (2) and The Attorney-General v. The Dorking Guardians (3), ask for an injunction restraining the defendants from permitting the individual from using the drain already connected. But they will be restrained from taking an active step to increase the burden of sewage the Metropolitan Works have to deal with—

The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The London and North Western Railway Company (1). They have no statutory power either to commit a nuisance or interfere with the rights of others outside their district, and are in the same position as a private individual. We are entitled to an injunction from the date of notice, or at any rate from the date of the writ, and damages from that date—Smith v. Day (4).

The Court will not consider in granting the injunction the inconvenience of the defendants and their constituents, who are participes criminis; it is for the wrongdoer to find a remedy—The Attorney-General v. The Birmingham Corporation (5) and The Attorney-General v. The Colney Hatch Asylum (6). The fact that the increase of sewage is gradual is no reason for not granting an injunction.

The defence of laches cannot be raised against such a body as the plaintiffs—The Staffordshire and Worcestershire Canal Company v. The Birmingham Canal Navigation Company (7).

E. K. Karslake, Q.C., W. W. Karslake, Q.C., and Pollard, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs, by intercepting the course of the stream, the natural drainage of the district, have taken on themselves the burden of dealing with it. The inhabitants have a prescriptive right to drain into the brook. The Act of 1855 casts on the Metropolitan Board the burden of disposing of the sewage in Stamford Brook. The defendants are a public body who have by the Public Health and Local Government Acts the duty cast on them of getting rid of the sewage of their district, and cannot be restrained from putting it into the natural watercourse—The Newington Local Board v. The Cottingham Local Board (8). Therefore the case of The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The London and North Western Railway Company (1) does not apply. No injunction will be granted in respect of a matter causing such trifling damage as is proved.

If an injunction can be granted in respect of the future no injunction will be granted in respect of the houses actually connected against the defendants, because the defendants have no power to stop the connection of houses with the sewer which they have once authorised—The Attorney-General v. The Dorking Guardians (3); because the plaintiffs have been negligent in not coming sooner, and because of the public inconvenience and danger that would be occasioned by disconnecting the drains of the houses now occupied.

Cookson, Q.C., in reply, gave up the claim for an injunction relating to acts done before the trial.

FRY, J. (after holding that no increment of nuisance had been shewn between 1866 and the issue of the writ), said—The result, therefore, is that the plaintiffs fail both with regard to the permission and with regard to the creation of a nuisance, and the action must be dismissed, so far as it seeks the relief mentioned in the first paragraph of the statement of claim, with costs to be paid by the relators.

The next question arises with regard to the sewers or drains which have been made by the defendant board since they have come into existence. There are admissions contained in the answer and in the evidence which was given before me which satisfy me of that which has not been denied—namely, that they, in pursuance of their duty, as they considered, caused or directed or authorised the construction of drains from houses which have been newly erected into this brook.

Further than that they claim the right to continue to cause drains to be made to the West Branch. They allege, and Mr. W. Karslake has argued, that the inhabitants of Acton have a right by prescription to drain into this sewer. It appears to me that such a suggestion would clearly be bad. It appears to me that there is no evidence tendered on which I could come to the conclusion that there is any such prescription. It appears to me that there is no evidence by which I can conclude that there is any legal custom authorising such a drainage. Those persons who have drains made and who have used them for the period of prescription cannot be interfered with. Other individuals living in Acton who have no prescriptive right have done so, according to the evidence before me, not under any prescriptive right or any custom. The local board, therefore, unless restrained, will continue to increase the sewage flowing into the West Branch sewer.

Then arises the enquiry whether the sewage which they have so caused to flow into it, and which they threaten and intend to cause in future to flow into it, is sewage which they are entitled to require the plaintiff board to dispose of. Now it has been argued that, under the Act of 1855, the board were bound to dispose of this sewage—I say nothing with regard to sewage existing in the year 1855—I say nothing with regard to sewage flowing from houses as to which there is any question of prescriptive right; but I am unable to find anything in the statute which casts upon the plaintiffs the burden of disposing of such sewage as the inhabitants of Acton may think fit to create by building houses after the Act of 1855. It is all the more important, because the Legislature has thrown upon the plaintiffs the burden of disposing of all the sewage within their district, and of preventing its flowing into the Thames. If, therefore, up to 1855 they had no right to throw their drainage into this sewer, and have the right to do so by force of the Act, the result is that they are at liberty and have the right to put their sewage in the position which casts the burden on the plaintiffs of preventing its going into the Thames.

Now what the plaintiffs have done is this—they have, in pursuance of their duty, intercepted the brook in question at two points. It is needless to go into the details and character of the works, but the effect of those interceptions has been to carry as far as they can the whole of the sewage to the East and West Branch parallel to the Thames, and to carry all the storm water which they can in the same direction, leaving only the surplus storm water to flow into the Thames. There is plainly, therefore, an increased burden thrown upon the plaintiffs by every increase of sewage passing into this brook. I have already said it appears to me that there is nothing in the statute which throws on the plaintiffs any such increased burden.

It has been said that if the Act of 1855 did not authorise this, the Act of 1848, or the Act of 1858, or the Act of 1875, under which the defendants have been constituted to act, authorises them to do so. In my judgment there is no justification for such a contention. I consider it well established that boards of health are bound to perform their statutory duties without injury to their neighbours. They cannot create a nuisance affecting a neighbour; they cannot, in my judgment, cast upon a neighbour a greater burden than he is bound to bear. I am, therefore, driven to this enquiry: Irrespective of statute, can the owner of land on the higher part of a stream cast upon the owner of land in the lower part of a stream the burden of disposing of a greater amount of sewage than by prescription has flowed into it? That point appears to me to have been decided by the Lords Justices in the case of The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The London and North Western Railway Company (1). Lord Justice James said: "On the facts it is quite clear there were no such prescriptive rights as were alleged. If a man has an artificial drain or sewer by which he drains anything, either water or sewage, into his neighbour's lands, he cannot use that drain so as to drain another close or another house. It seems to me impossible to suppose that there is anything in the English law to say that a man has the right to pour in as much sewage water as can come from anywhere, limited only by the size of the particular drain." Lord Justice Cotton expressed the same view. He said: "There is no authority given by the Act to do it"—that is, to increase the sewage—"and according to the general law they have no right to throw any burden on their neighbours unless by contract, which in this case does not exist, or by long user—that is to say, by prescription—which does not exist here. In my opinion the plaintiffs are right, and the appeal must be dismissed." Lord Justice Lush entirely agreed with that decision.

The plaintiffs, therefore, are right, in my judgment, in saying that they are not liable to any greater burden of sewage than that of those persons who have a prescriptive right to throw it into the brook. But then arises this point: The plaintiffs have not shewn to me any substantial damage resulting from an increase of the sewage thrown into the West Brook or the East Brook. According to the evidence of Sir Joseph Bazalgette, the real annoyance and burden of which the plaintiffs complain is, that by reason of the foul state of the brook they have been bound to cover it over, and that by reason of the storm water collected in Acton flowing along the intercepted sewer, the plaintiffs pumping operations are burdened, and at certain times overtaxed. I have, therefore, to enquire whether in this case there has been such substantial damage proved where the right is involved that I ought to grant an injunction. In many cases I probably should think myself not bound to grant an injunction; but in the present case I confess myself bound to do so, and for this reason, that not only do the defendants insist on their right to maintain the sewer that they have already caused to be constructed, but they insist upon a right in future to construct other drains, which they say they are authorised to do by the prescriptive title of the inhabitants of the district over which they preside. It appears to me, therefore, that they insist not only on maintaining the wrong which they have committed, but they insist on a right to do increased wrong in future. That is, in my judgment, a circumstance which I must have regard to, and I think that compels me to grant an injunction. I therefore must pronounce an injunction restraining "the defendants, their servants and agents, from causing or authorising any sewage or drainage, or other foul or excrementitious matter, to flow or pass, or be poured or discharged by or through Stamford Brook West Branch or otherwise, either directly or indirectly, into the Metropolitan Main Drainage System or any sewer vested in the plaintiffs." In other words, I grant an injunction according to the second claim, omitting the words "permitting or."

The plaintiffs ask for a further injunction. They have asked me to restrain the defendants from permitting sewage to pass into the West Branch through any sewers or drains constructed or authorised by the defendants after the notice in 1876. In my opinion I ought not to grant any such injunction. It appears to me that the plaintiffs have not been over diligent or over active in the assertion of their rights. They must have known, I think, some time before 1876, that the local board was carrying on operations. They followed up their notice by an action begun some eight months afterwards, and their action having begun in 1877, has not since been brought on for trial until a few days ago. The reason given is that the plaintiffs preferred to wait the decision of the case pending between themselves and the London and North-Western Railway Company. It is quite true that the defendants might have driven the plaintiffs on. In a general way the Court looks at things as they stood at the date of the writ; but, in the present case, to grant the injunction asked for would be attended with most serious consequences, because it would require the defendants to stop up all the drains or sewers which have been made from houses in Acton ever since November, 1876. Those houses, according to the evidence before me, are very numerous. It appears to me, on the balance of convenience and inconvenience, and bearing in mind that there is no substantial damage shewn to have accrued to the plaintiffs, that I should be doing wrong in granting such an injunction. Further than that, I am by no means clear that the defendants have the power to stop up a drain which they have once authorised and directed. I observe that the Master of the Rolls expressed that view in the case of The Attorney-General v. The Guardians of Dorking (3). Therefore on that ground also I should hesitate very long before I granted the injunction which is sought on that part of the case. [His Lordship then dealt with the alleged acquiescence on the part of the plaintiffs, holding that the objection failed, and continued:] There remains one question with regard to the costs, so far as I have not already disposed of them. It appears to me that I must give those to the plaintiffs, with a certain exception. I think the costs have been considerably increased by the contention originally raised by the pleadings that the defendants ought to be restrained from "permitting." Therefore what I propose to do is to give the costs of the action other than those I have already dealt with to the plaintiffs, deducting 50*l.* to save a painful division of the costs in taxation.

Ex parte BOLLAND; in re ROPER.

Bill of Sale—Statement of Consideration—Affidavit filed on Registration—"Attestation"—Explanation by Solicitor—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 8 and 10.

The consideration for a bill of sale was stated to be "2,000l. to the mortgagor paid by the mortgagee immediately before the execution of these presents." The grantor owed the grantee 2,000*l., the balance of* 2,500*l. purchase-money for a leasehold brewery. He had paid him* 500*l. in cash, and had given him the bill of sale for the balance, and this was accepted by the grantee in payment:*—Held, that the consideration was truly stated in the deed.

The affidavit filed on the registration of a bill of sale need not state that before the execution of the deed its effect was explained to the grantor by the attesting solicitor.

In October, 1879, A. W. C. Roper contracted to purchase a brewery for 2,750*l.* from G. Booth. Of this purchase-money Roper was able to pay only 750*l.* in cash. On completion of the purchase, 500*l.* was paid to Booth and 250*l.* to one Pearson who had been instrumental in bringing about the sale, and a mortgage over the brewery and stock-in-trade and after-acquired property was given by Roper to Booth for the balance of the purchase-money, 2,000*l.* The mortgage, which was dated the 22nd of October, 1879, contained a recital that the mortgagee "had agreed to lend" the mortgagor 2,000*l.*, and was expressed to be made "in consideration of the sum of 2,000*l.* to the mortgagor, paid by the mortgagee immediately before the execution of these presents." The receipt clause, signed by the mortgagor, also purported to be for 2,000*l.*, "paid to me on the execution thereof."

This mortgage was duly executed as a bill of sale, the attestation clause stating that before the execution the effect had been explained to the grantor by C. E. Lake, the attesting solicitor. The affidavit filed on registration was made by C. E. Lake, who deposed to the correctness of the copy mortgage, and of every attestation and execution thereof, and that it was given on the day it bore date; that he was present and saw Roper sign and execute the deed; and that "the name C. E. Lake, set and subscribed as the witness attesting the due execution of the said mortgage," was in the deponent's hand-writing, and that he resided at Stockport, and was a solicitor of the Supreme Court; but did not otherwise state that before the execution of the deed the effect had been explained by the deponent to Roper.

On the 7th of August, 1880, Roper filed a petition for liquidation in the Liverpool County Court.

The trustee contended that the bill of sale was void as against him—first, because the consideration was not truly stated; secondly, because there was no verification on oath of the fact that the effect of the bill of sale had been explained to the grantor previously to its execution. The County Court Judge held the second objection fatal.

The bill of sale holder appealed.

Winslow, Q.C., and S. Taylor, for the appellant.—The consideration is truly stated, just as it would have been done on any ordinary mortgage, and that is enough—Ex parte The National Mercantile Bank; in re Haynes (1). The fact that no money actually passed between the parties at the time is immaterial—The Credit Company v. Pott (2).

The requirements of the Bills of Sale Act, 1877, section 10, have been complied with. Mr. Lake was present, and the deed was duly "attested"—Hill v. Kirkwood (3), Ex parte The National Mercantile Bank (1), Seal v. Claridge (4), Ford v. Kettle (5) and Sharp v. Birch (6).

Horton Smith, Q.C., and Walton, for the respondent.—No part of the 2,000*l.* passed between these parties when this mortgage was given; therefore the consideration money is not truly stated. Ex parte The National Mercantile Bank (1) has been commented on, and qualified by Ex parte Firth (7), Ex parte Rolph (8) and Hamilton v. Chaine (9).

The affidavit of the attesting solicitor does not state the fact that the bill of sale was explained to the grantor previously to its execution. They referred to Conelly v. Steer (10) and Sharp v. Birch (6).

BACON, C.J. (on June 26, 1882).—Two points have been argued. The first is the consideration, which is of vital importance in all bills of sale cases, the object of the Legislature being to protect the creditors against any sham transactions, or any contrivance between debtors and creditors by which the consideration may seem to have passed, but which has not in fact passed, and therefore there is no consideration. The policy of the law requires that the consideration shall be stated. Well, has that requisition been complied with in this case? The debtor and Booth, by the intervention of a third person (Mr. Pearson) agree on the purchase of certain land and chattels; the debtor agrees to the price, and the price is fixed. It is a purchase of the land and movable property by Roper from Booth, and he was to pay 2,500*l.* to Booth for it (250*l.* bonus, which was to be received by Mr. Pearson, has nothing whatever to do with it). The conveyance is prepared and executed by the vendor, and the money is due to him. When it is said that this case is distinguished from that of Ex parte The National Mercantile Bank (1), because there was a pre-existing debt in that case, I do not agree. Roper had not paid a shilling of the 2,000*l.*; he had not the means of doing so, but procured the means of paying the 2,500*l.* by executing a mortgage for 2,000*l.*, and the consideration was fairly stated.

As I understand the case there was 2,500*l.* due from Roper (to Booth)—500*l.* was paid, and 2,000*l.* remained, for which 2,000*l.* Booth had a lien on the whole property; and although he executed a deed of conveyance, he could not be deprived of it. Roper desired to possess the property, and he possesses it by means of executing a mortgage for 2,000*l.* There is a plain clear consideration clearly stated, just in itself—no sham—no such circumstances as remained on my mind in the case of Ex parte The National Mercantile Bank (1), where I was overruled by the Court of Appeal. I considered that to be a sham. I think I talked of it as a comedy, and I should not like to withdraw that expression of opinion, notwithstanding the handling that the case received in another Court. It has, however, no sort of resemblance to this case. The estate to be sold remains Booth's until he gets the mortgage, and the mortgage was the consideration for parting with the estate. In my opinion, therefore, there is a perfectly clear consideration, a true, a just and a lawful consideration, clearly and properly expressed in the deed of mortgage.

The other point is on the statute, as to the attestation clause. On that, speaking with great deference of all the decisions referred to, I have no true guide except the words of the Act of Parliament, which for public

They also referred to Sharp v. Birch (6) and Ex parte Carter (12).

Winslow, Q.C., and S. Taylor, for the respondent, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R.—I think that both the points taken are untenable, and that they are covered by previous decisions.

As to the first point, the question is, what is the meaning of the "consideration" for a deed? All that the Act says is that the bill of sale shall "set forth the consideration" for which it was given. The consideration stated in the present case is "2,000*l.* to the mortgagor paid by the mortgagee immediately before the execution of these presents." The question is, what do these words mean, having regard to the facts? The grantor owed the grantee 2000*l.*, the balance of 2,500*l.* purchase-money for a leasehold brewery. He had paid him 500*l.* in cash, and had given him a bill of sale for the balance, and this was accepted by the grantee in payment. Was this in law a payment of the 2,000*l.* to the grantor? I have no doubt that it was, or that it would support a plea of payment in an action. It was quite unnecessary that any one should attend with the 2,000*l.* in notes or gold, and that they should then be handed over to the grantee and handed back by him to the grantor. When a transaction like this is a bona fide one it has always been held to amount to payment. Ex parte Challinor (11) is an express decision on the point, and it has ever since been recognised as such. It is an express decision that such a mode of payment of a sum stated as the consideration for a bill of sale is a legal payment, and is properly so described in the deed.

As to the other point, the Act requires, by section 10, that "the execution of every bill of sale shall be attested by a solicitor of the Supreme Court, and the attestation shall state that before the execution of the bill of sale the effect thereof has been explained to the grantor by the attesting solicitor." The word "attestation" is there used for "attestation clause"; the same clause which states the fact of attestation is also to state that the explanation was given. But the explanation is not part of the attestation, it is something prior to the attestation. Then section 10 goes on to say that an affidavit of the "due execution and attestation" of the bill of sale is to be filed with the Registrar. What is required is an affidavit of the fact of attestation—that is, that the deed was signed, sealed and delivered by the grantor in the presence of the attesting witness. Therefore, the words of the Act are satisfied by the affidavit which has been made in the present case. It is, however, suggested that the affidavit ought to go on to state that before the execution of the deed its effect was explained by the solicitor to the grantor. The statement of the explanation is, no doubt, to be part of the attestation clause, but the explanation is not part of the attestation. There is no provision in the Act that the affidavit shall state that the explanation was given, and it would be a wholly unnecessary provision, for section 10 requires that a copy of the attestation clause shall be filed with the Registrar, and every creditor of the grantor can see it. But this very point has been already decided, for in Ex parte The National Mercantile Bank (1) it was held that it is unnecessary that the effect of the deed should be actually explained by the attesting solicitor to the grantor, the Act only requiring that the attestation clause should state that the explanation was given. The reason for this was given by Lord Justice James, when he said (p. 65): "The Legislature thought that they were giving the grantor protection by requiring the solicitor to pledge his word that he had given the explanation. That protection may not be always sufficient, but that is all which the Legislature saw its way to give." There is nothing in the Act which requires that the explanation should be actually given, but there would be if the solicitor was required to swear that he had given it. The present argument is totally inconsistent with the decision in Ex parte The National Mercantile Bank (1).

BRETT, L.J.—That which took place in the present case would be said by any man of business, and would be held in any Court of law, to be a payment of the 2,000*l.* to the grantor, so that if it was necessary to plead payment of the 2,000*l.* in an action, in Bankruptcy. The debtors, a firm of army clothiers and contractors, trading under the name of Tait & Co., in December, 1869, decided to wind up their business. They accordingly executed a deed, by which inspectors were appointed, and which was declared to be and to operate as a deed of inspectorship for the benefit of all their creditors within the meaning of section 192 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. One of the debtors, named Cannock, was a shareholder in the Glamorgan Iron and Coal Company, which at this time was in liquidation. He held seventy shares of the value of 20*l.* each which were only partly paid up; but he was also a creditor of the company to a large amount in respect of debentures issued to him by the company. The inspectors wrote to the liquidator of the company to inform him that Cannock had a claim against the company, and requesting him to send formal notice of any claim the company had against Cannock. The liquidator sent particulars of the company's claim, but did not send any formal proof. On the 21st of March, 1872, the inspectors declared a first and final dividend of 20*s.* in the pound on Cannock's separate estate, but no dividend was paid to the liquidator.

After further correspondence the inspectors, on the 8th of May, 1879, gave the liquidator notice that, unless within twenty-eight days he proved his claim against the separate estate of Cannock, the remainder of the assets would be divided amongst the creditors of the joint estate of the debtors. On the 14th of May, 1879, the liquidator formally proved his claim, and ultimately, on the 14th of May, 1882, the inspectors gave the liquidator notice that they rejected his claim against Cannock's separate estate, on the ground that the amount due to Cannock from the company at the date of the deed of inspectorship exceeded the amount of the liquidator's claim. On the application of the liquidator to the Court, Mr. Registrar Pepys made an order that the proof of the liquidator should be admitted, on the ground that the delay of the inspectors had precluded them from rejecting it; and he refused an application made on behalf of the inspectors, that if the proof must be taken to have been admitted it might be expunged.

The inspectors appealed.

Robinson, Q.C., and F. Thompson, for the appellants.—The winding-up of the company commenced before the date of the deed of inspectorship; the inspectors, therefore, have a right to set off the amount due to Cannock in respect of debentures against the claim of the company in respect of calls. The proof, therefore, ought to be rejected—In re Duckworth (1). The proof has never been formally admitted, and though there has been delay the inspectors have not bound themselves to admit it. At all events, if the proof must be taken to have been admitted, the inspectors were entitled to apply to expunge it.

[They were stopped.]

J. E. Linklater, for the liquidator.—By receiving the proof and not rejecting it forthwith the inspectors must be treated as having admitted it—Ex parte Kemp (2) and Ex parte Good (3).

[Jessel, M.R.—In Ex parte Kemp (2) leave was given under rule 73 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1870, to expunge the proof.]

That rule was intended to apply to cases where the trustee has by a slip omitted to send the creditor formal notice of rejection of his proof. There was no slip here.

[Jessel, M.R.—There was scarcely any limit to the time allowed for expunging a proof under the old practice. In Ex parte Wilson (4) it was allowed after five years; in Ex parte Soper (5) after seven years.]

The Registrar had decided against the inspectors on the question of admission before they applied to expunge.

Jessel, M.R.—It is not necessary that we should decide whether what has taken place amounts to an admission of the proof by the inspectors. The rules of 1870 have no direct bearing on the present case, because the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, did not come into operation until after the execution of the deed. But rule 72 requires that the trustee, when he rejects any proof or claim by a creditor, should do so in writing; and I should desire further time to consider whether we could dispense with the writing or assume that there had been a rejection in writing. But, even if the trustee has admitted a proof, he is entitled to apply to the Court to expunge it. He may do this "at any time after the admission" of the debt. These are the very words of rule 73; and though that rule does not strictly apply to the present case, it only embodies the old rule of practice in bankruptcy. There was no limit to the time within which a proof might be expunged. In the cases which I have already mentioned the proof was expunged on the ground that its original admission had been wrong. The new rule is in accordance with the old practice; and no injustice can be done, because any dividends which have already been paid are allowed to be retained by the creditor, and the expunging affects only the right to receive future dividends. There is a clear right of set-off in the present case, and the appeal must be allowed.

BRETT, L.J.—It is conceded that if the right steps had been taken the proof ought not to have been admitted. But it is said that by reason of certain slips by the inspectors the respondent is entitled to retain his proof. I think it is unnecessary on the present occasion to consider what was the real extent of the decision of Lord Justice Mellish in Ex parte Kemp (2), or the principle on which he acted. I think it may be assumed in the present case that by reason of some omission on the part of the inspectors the proof was originally wrongly admitted. But why should any delay on the part of a trustee in bankruptcy estop him from applying to expunge a proof that ought never to have been admitted? I can see no reason why it should. Why should delay work an estoppel? The cases before the Act of 1869 shew that there was no limit to the time for expunging a proof, and under that Act a rule has been made which adopts the old practice in the largest possible terms. It says that the trustee may apply to expunge "at any time" after the admission of the proof. So that if the trustee had admitted a proof in the most formal way in writing, still he could "at any time" afterwards apply to the Court to expunge it, if he had reason to believe that it had been improperly admitted. If this be so, why can he not apply at any time when there has been no formal admission of the proof? It seems to me that under the old practice and under the new rule a proof of debt may be expunged at any time, however long, after its admission, if it was originally improperly admitted.

COTTON, L.J.—It is admitted that there is a right of set-off, and that if there was nothing else in the case the liquidator would have no right to prove. In my opinion it is unnecessary to decide how we should deal with the case on the question of the admission of the proof by the inspectors, because if it has been admitted, still there is nothing to prevent its being expunged. It cannot be considered that there was any admission of the proof until May, 1879, and proofs were expunged after quite as long an interval of time in the cases which have been referred to. This is enough to decide the present appeal. But it must not be supposed that we hold that there has been any admission of the proof in the present case. I think that in Ex parte Kemp (2) Lord Justice Mellish must be taken to have decided only that delay amounts prima facie to admission of a proof. In my opinion there is no ground for not expunging the present respondent's proof.

Bankruptcy — Practice — Examination of Creditor as a Witness under Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 96—Right to Copy of Depositions — Bankruptcy Rules, 1870, rules 9 and 12.

Where a creditor was examined as a witness under section 96 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869,—Held, that he was entitled, subject to the discretion of the Court to refuse it, to a copy of the shorthand notes of his deposition.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar Brougham sitting as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

On the 16th of June, 1882, the trustee in the bankruptcy of John Hayman gave notice to one of the creditors of an application to the Court that the creditor might be ordered to give up or pay the value of certain goods which it was alleged had been delivered to him by the bankrupt by way of fraudulent preference.

The creditor had been previously examined, at the instance of the trustee, under section 96 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and had made certain admissions on which the trustee had founded his application. The trustee did not give notice that he intended to use the depositions of the creditor in support of his application.

On the 20th of June the creditor's solicitor applied at the proper office for a copy of the shorthand notes of the evidence given by him at his examination, a transcript of which was on the file of the proceedings. On the 22nd of June the officer of the Court informed the creditor's solicitor that a notice had been lodged by the trustee objecting to his being supplied with a copy of the depositions.

The creditor made an application to the Court, and Mr. Registrar Brougham ordered that he should be furnished with a copy at his own cost.

The trustee appealed.

Sidney Woolf, for the appellant.—A witness has no absolute right to a copy of his depositions. The trustee has given no notice that he intends to use them. Rule 9 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1870, only gives the right of inspection at reasonable times.

[Cooper Willis, Q.C., for the respondent, referred to rule 12.]

[JESSEL, M.R.—The respondent claims the copy as a creditor, not as a witness, and the Registrar has allowed it.]

The Registrar held that, as a witness examined under section 96, he had an absolute right to the copy, and that every bankrupt and every witness is entitled to a copy of his own depositions. That is not the practice. It would be injurious to the creditors if the respondent is allowed to have a copy of his depositions before he has put in his answer to the application of the trustee.

Cooper Willis, Q.C. and English Harrison, for the respondent.—The respondent applied as a creditor, and is entitled to what he asks for under rule 9.

[JESSEL, M.R., referred to Ex parte Rimell (1), where it was held that a creditor's right to inspection depended upon his request being "reasonable."]

The words "reasonable request" used in the Bankruptcy Act, 1849, s. 232, are omitted from rule 9. The trustee wishes to make the respondent perjure himself if he can. No injury can result to the creditors from allowing the respondent to have a copy of his own depositions.

[They were stopped by the Court.]

JESSEL, M.R.—The Registrar could not have meant to say that the witness was entitled to the copy as a matter of strict right; he must have meant that this was a proper case for allowing him to have a copy of what he had sworn.

BRETT, L.J., and COTTON, L.J., concurred.

Solicitors—H. Montagu, for trustee; E. Chalk, for respondent.

Bankruptcy — Mortgage to Building Society—Bankruptcy of Mortgagor—Attornment Clause—Validity—Advance repayable in Monthly Instalments—Monthly Tenancy—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2. c. 3), s. 1.

A building society advanced 7,500*l. to one of its members, to be repaid with interest in monthly instalments of* 71*l. each. If the instalments were not paid as they became due, the member was liable to pay a fine at the rate of five per cent. per month on the total amount in arrear. As security he gave to the society a mortgage of real estate, whereby it was provided that in the event of his payments being in default, or of his becoming bankrupt, the society might enter into possession of the mortgaged property; and it was also agreed that if the society should at any time become entitled to enter into possession, and the mortgagor should then be in occupation of the property, the mortgagor should be tenant to the society from month to month at a monthly rent equal in amount to the moneys which ought to be paid monthly by the mortgagor. The deed was not executed by the mortgagees, nor registered as a bill of sale. The mortgagor having committed default in his payments and become bankrupt, the society put in several distresses for rent which had accrued due both before and after the bankruptcy:*—Held, affirming the decision of BACON, C.J., that, notwithstanding the monthly rent was variable in amount, the attornment clause and the distresses were valid as against the trustee in bankruptcy.

Ex parte Williams (47 Law J. Rep. Bankr. 26; Law Rep. 7 Ch. D. 138), In re Stockton Iron Furnace Company (48 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 417; Law Rep. 10 Ch. D. 335) and Ex parte Jackson (Law Rep. 14 Ch. D. 725) considered.

The bankrupt, John Knight, a manure manufacturer, near Widnes, in Lancashire, was a member of the West Derby and Everton Perpetual Benefit Building Society, in which he held 750 shares. In August, 1875, he borrowed from the society 7,500*l.*, which according to the rules of the society was to be repaid in a series of monthly payments, which, including interest at seven per cent., amounted to 71*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* These instalments were payable at the monthly meetings of the society, and, in the event of their not being paid when due, a borrowing member became liable to a fine at the rate of five per cent. per month on the total amount in arrear and unpaid at each meeting. To secure this loan, Knight, on the 3rd of August, 1875, executed to the trustees of the society a mortgage of his manufactory, real estate, with steam-engines, machinery, and other things in the nature of real estate erected thereon, and also of the engines, apparatus, stock-in-trade and effects in the nature of personal estate in or about the premises. By this deed it was provided that if the mortgagor should at any time thereafter fail for three monthly meetings to pay his subscriptions, interest, fines or other moneys, or to observe the regulations of the society, or become bankrupt, the mortgagees might enter into possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the mortgaged property; and, "for the better securing the payments which by the rules of the society ought to be made by the mortgagor," it was thereby agreed that if the mortgagees should at any time become entitled to enter into possession or receipt of the rents, and the mortgagor should then or afterwards be in the occupation of the whole or part of the property, he should during such occupation be tenant thereof from month to month to the mortgagees at a monthly rent equal in amount to the moneys which ought to be paid monthly by the mortgagor from time to time for subscriptions, interest, fines and other moneys under the rules, and that the tenancy should commence on the day up to which he should have fully paid all and every part of such subscriptions, interest, fines and other moneys, and the rent for the period intervening between the commencement of the tenancy and the day on which the trustees should be entitled to enter into possession or receipt of the rents of the mortgaged premises should be payable and paid on such last mentioned day, and the monthly rent due upon and subsequently to that day should become due monthly in advance and be payable at the monthly meetings, the first payment of rent becoming due on the day on which the mortgagees should first become entitled to enter into possession; but all moneys received by them for rent should be accepted in satisfaction of the subscriptions, interest, fines and other moneys then in arrear or payable under the rules and the mortgage deed respectively, so far as the moneys so received should extend. The deed also gave power to the mortgagees, on giving fourteen days' notice, to take possession of the mortgaged premises and determine the tenancy created as aforesaid.

The deed was not executed by the mortgagees, nor was it registered under the Bills of Sale Act. On the 2nd of December, 1881, Knight having been in default for three monthly meetings, the trustees of the society levied a distress on the mortgaged premises for the whole amount then due from him to the society. On the 5th of December, 1881, Knight was adjudicated bankrupt on an act of bankruptcy committed on the 26th of November, 1881. On the 21st of December two trustees of his estate were appointed. On the 11th of January, 1882, the trustees of the building society put in a second distress for the amount then due by Knight to the society, and in February following they put in a third distress.

On the 10th of March, 1882, the trustees in bankruptcy applied to the County Court Judge at Liverpool for an order declaring the attornment clause and the distresses levied under it void as against them, and on the 21st of March the Judge made an order to that effect and restrained the mortgagees from further proceedings to distrain. From this order the mortgagees appealed.

There was evidence that before the execution of the mortgage in 1875 the premises had been valued by three different valuers on behalf of the society at over 12,000*l.*, and that another valuation on behalf of the bankrupt put the premises as worth over 11,000*l.* One witness put the fair rental at 840*l.* per annum, and another at 940*l.* On behalf of the trustees in the bankruptcy there was evidence that 500*l.* per annum would be a very fair rental, and that 9,000*l.* was the outside value of the property. The premises were assessed for poor-rate at 288*l.* gross and 216*l.* per annum rateable value. It was admitted that property in that neighbourhood had very much deteriorated in value since 1875.

Horton Smith, Q.C., and J. E. Linklater, for the appellants.—The rent reserved by the attornment clause is a fair rent considering the value of the property at the time of the mortgage—In re Stockton Iron Furnace Company (1)—and therefore we are not within Ex parte Williams (2). They also referred to Ex parte Auckland Building Society (3), Ex parte Jackson; in re Bowes (4) and Ex parte Punnett (5).

The attornment clause created a tenancy from year to year—In re Threlfall; ex parte Queen's Benefit Building Society (6) —and our distresses were good. The proceeds of the distress are applicable to paying off principal and interest—Ex parte Harrison (7). The fines here secured are principal—The Provident Permanent Benefit Building Society v. Greenhill (8)—and a provision that interest in arrear may be capitalised is not unlawful—Clarkson v. Henderson (9).

Winslow, Q.C., and Mulholland, for the respondents.—No tenant would ever have taken this property at the rent made payable by this attornment clause; therefore its rent is fictitious, and we are within Ex parte Williams (2). This attornment was merely a device to enable the mortgagees to distrain for arrears of subscription, fines and compound interest. At best there was only a tenancy at will, ending on bankruptcy. Further, we say there was no attornment, because the deed was not executed by the mortgagees, and no tenancy arose before the 13th of August, 1878. They referred to Morton v. Woods (10).

BACON, C.J.—The question I have to decide is, whether what has been called a rent is—as in Ex parte Williams (2) it was held to be—a contrivance to defeat the law in bankruptcy. If it is not that, there cannot be one word said against this plain mortgage deed. To make that principle applicable, it has been argued that the rent is plainly excessive. In my judgment there is no measurement whereby the rent can be called excessive.

What is the contract between the parties? A borrower, a shareholder in a building society, gets an advance of 7,500*l.* He gets an advance made upon the security of his freehold property. What is his contract? That he will pay that back by instalments. It has nothing to do with rent. You cannot measure it by any proportion that the rent might bear to the value of the property; but he promises to pay in the shape of subscriptions as long as they shall become due—that is to say, up to the time when the debt so contracted shall be satisfied by instalments in the shape of subscriptions. He contracts also (which he was competent to do) that he will pay fines if he incurs fines; and in the attornment clause in the deed, which is to take effect only upon his default, he attorns at a rent which would be equal to the payment of the capital and interest which he was to pay monthly in the shape of subscriptions, and also to pay the fines. What is there wrong in that? What does it signify whether the rent is excessive or not? It is a covenant to pay back the mortgage money by certain instalments; and, although it takes the shape of a rent, it does not alter the nature of the transaction.

The matter has been so ransacked of late in several cases that one might reasonably suppose it was conclusively settled. Ex parte Williams (2) is a most distinct and emphatic decision that, with whatever words it may be accompanied, however the real transaction may be concealed or contrived, if the Court before whom its validity is questioned is satisfied that it was a contrivance to defeat the bankruptcy laws, it will not prevail. But that is all it does. In the Stockton Case (1), where the matter was gone into at very great length, and where the principles of such like transactions were considered, the learned Judges pointed out that there might be a security upon the chattels that would require a bill of sale. That might be onerous perhaps upon the borrower, perhaps inconvenient even to the lender; and the distinctions are pointed out very plainly.

Instead of taking a bill of sale of the chattels included in the mortgage, the building society contract that, if the borrower shall make default, they shall have a right to enter (one of the defaults being his becoming bankrupt), and whenever they have a right to enter and take that which is left in his possession and control, he shall pay to them a rent, not upon the value of the property, but he shall pay instalments in the shape of subscriptions, fines, and so on, until he is discharged pro tanto of the mortgage debt he has contracted. If I were to follow the conclusion of the learned County Court Judge it would seem to be this: 15,000*l.* being the aggregate amount of three valuers (the poor law valuer being one of them), the learned Judge divided the 15,000*l.* by three, and said 5,000*l.* was the value of the property.

I have nothing to do with what was the value of the property. I have to carry into effect this contract—which was a valid contract, reasonable and proper, not here made for the first time, but, as I believe, in frequent practice—the substance of which is, that if default is made in payment, then the relation of landlord and tenant shall subsist, and a rent equivalent to one month's subscription shall be paid in advance. Then it is said that the addition of the fines to the sum to be paid monthly is invalid. Why is it invalid? Why is a man not to pay fines if he has covenanted to do so, and why should they not be added to the other sum, together with interest, if such be the covenant between the parties? The case is perfectly clear.

It is only necessary to notice one other observation which fell from the counsel for the respondents—namely, that this is a tenancy at will, to be determined by bankruptcy. No such principle exists in law as that it is in the power of assignees who step into the shoes of a bankrupt to say that the tenancy at will has been put an end to. In my opinion that is as baseless as the other arguments I have listened to. I am of opinion that the judgment of the County Court Judge is wrong, that the distresses were valid, and that the building society were, and are, entitled to the benefit of them, and to have paid to them the amount which was put into the bankrupt's hands or in medio till the present matter was determined.

The injunction will be dissolved, and the appellants will have their costs here and in the Court below.

The trustees in bankruptcy appealed.

Winslow, Q.C., Cookson, Q.C., and Mulholland, for the appellants.—This case is within the rule laid down in Ex parte Williams (2), and is not governed by the case of In re The Stockton Iron Furnace Company (1)

[JESSEL, M.R., referred to Ex parte Jackson (4)].

Here, as in that case, the rent is not a real one, and the whole transaction is a sham. There was no intention to create the relation of landlord and tenant, but only to give the building society an advantage in case of the bankruptcy of the mortgagor. The rent, moreover, was uncertain, for the tenancy was not to commence until the instalments had been three months in arrear, and after that the rent would be fluctuating. Would any sane man have accepted a tenancy on such terms?

[JESSEL, M.R.—That is not the test, but whether the rent is one which an ordinary tenant would have paid.]

Again, there was no letting. In order to create a tenancy there must be an agreement between lessor and lessee. That is an interest in land, and, under the Statute of Frauds, the deed must be executed by the lessor, which in this case it was not; therefore there was only a tenancy at will—Morton v. Woods (10).

[JESSEL, M.R.—The attornment is evidence of an agreement. If the tenant is in possession this doctrine does not apply.]

Only a tenancy at will was created.

[JESSEL, M.R.—Morton v. Woods (10) was elaborately discussed in In re Threlfall (6). The contract is for a monthly tenancy; that is not within the Statute of Frauds.]

Morton v. Woods (10) was not explained away.

[JESSEL, M.R.—It was also discussed in Ex parte Punnett (5). I never heard of an attornment clause being executed by the landlord. There is an estoppel which would prevent the tenant from denying the tenancy.]

The tenancy was only a tenancy at will, and was determined by the bankruptcy. At any rate it is void for uncertainty under the Statute of Frauds.

[BRETT, L.J.—I doubt whether the words "uncertain interest in lands" in section 1 of the Statute of Frauds apply to tenancies at all. Tenancies are known interests.]

Horton Smith, Q.C., and J. E. Linklater, for the respondents, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Chief Judge that certain distresses issued by the respondents were valid.

Various points were taken in the argument before us. The chief one was that, by reason of the terms of the mortgage deed, having regard to the annual value of the mortgaged property, there was no bona fide contract for the relation of landlord and tenant between the mortgagees and mortgagor, but that it was a mere device and contrivance for giving a preference to the mortgagees in case of the bankruptcy or insolvency of the mortgagor, and that, therefore, the distresses were invalid under the doctrine laid down in Ex parte Williams (2) and subsequent cases. Of course that raises a question of fact. If it never was intended by the parties to create the relation of landlord and tenant, though they used words having that effect, it may be that the relation was not created in law. The evidence upon which the Court came to that conclusion in Ex parte Williams (2) and Ex parte Jackson (4) was the absurdity of the amount of the rent reserved, having regard to the real annual value of the mortgaged property. In Ex parte Williams (2) a rent of 20,000*l.* a year was reserved for a property which was not worth more than 3,000*l.* a year, and the Court came to the conclusion that that was not a genuine rent, or a rent which either party ever intended should be paid, and that it was not the intention of either party that the mortgagor should be held to that rent, but that what they did intend was that, in case of the bankruptcy of the mortgagor, the mortgagee should be enabled to distrain, so as to get a preference over the other creditors. In Ex parte Jackson (4) the rent was not seven times the annual value of the property, as in Ex parte Williams (2), but fifty-seven times as much; and the Court came to the same conclusion. They did not believe that either party ever intended that a rent of fifty-seven times the value of the property should be paid. The only other case on the subject is The Stockton Case (1), in which the contrary was held, though it was by no means clear there that the annual value of the property was equal to the amount of the rent reserved.

In the present case we have to consider, not merely the annual value of the property, but the peculiarity of the security. It is a mortgage to a building society. The monthly payment (leaving out the shillings) was 71*l.* Of course, if default were made, the amount of the monthly payments would be increased by the fines, which would be the penalty for the default, and the monthly payment might, therefore, be very considerably above 71*l.*, but in the ordinary course it would be 71*l.* The property was one of those to which it is very difficult to give any definite value; it was used as a manure manufactory. But we have this evidence (which, to my mind, is the important evidence as to value) that, before the society lent their money, they had three valuations made of the property, and all of them made it worth more than 12,000*l.* What was the rental value of such a property must, of course, be a mere matter of opinion. It is not an ordinary dwelling-house or a shop, the value of which depends on the trade carried on there; but some of the valuers say the rent should be such a sum as will pay 7 per cent., and others say 10 per cent., on the value. At 7 per cent. on the amount of the valuations the rent would be about 900*l.* a year; at 10 per cent. it would be about 1,200*l.* or 1,300*l.* a year; but, taking it at 7 per cent., one may put the rental value at about 900*l.* On the other hand, the appellants have brought evidence to shew that it is not worth more than 480*l.* a year. However, if you want to try the bona fides of the parties, in entering into the contract you must have regard to the valuations which they obtained at the time when they entered into it. It appears to me, therefore, that the rent in this case ought to be taken to be 900*l.* a year. If that is so it is rather more than twelve times 71*l.* If nothing more than 71*l.* a month had been reserved it would have amounted to less than that rental, but the fines, no doubt, might increase it very much indeed. But we must consider how the rent is reserved. It was only to commence to be paid when the mortgagor had been in default three months, and it does not at all follow that he would be in default for the whole amount payable—he might have been in default for part only. It would be impossible to say beforehand what the exact figure might be, but I think it would not be fair to test it by the event which actually happened, because the man might go on for five years and then for the first time make default. But what the parties contemplated was, no doubt, this: that after the three months' default the security should be made available. In this case, although there may be some considerable fines to be paid in respect of the first month, the total annual sum would not be very much increased; and it does not appear to me that for this purpose it is worth considering whether the total rent for the first year would be 100*l.* or 200*l.* above the fair estimated rental. Substantially it was a rent which a tenant might honestly agree to pay, and which a mortgagee might honestly expect to receive. That being so, and it not being suggested for a moment that the transaction was otherwise than a bona fide one (indeed, there is no evidence whatever that the parties intended that the contract should be different from that which was professed by the deed), it appears to me that there was no ground whatever for saying that it was a mere device to enable the society to get a preference in case of the bankruptcy of the mortgagor. On the contrary, I am clearly of opinion that the parties meant that which they have written, namely, that in case of default by the mortgagor the society should have the power of distraining for this sum as rent.

Of course I am quite aware that the stipulation which gave the mortgagees authority to enter, and so entitled them to the benefit of the attornment clause, includes not only the default in payment by the mortgagor, but also his bankruptcy or liquidation. But the attornment clause is expressed only by reference to the clause which gives the right to enter; and it appears to me that the fair meaning of it is that which I have stated, namely, to enable the mortgagees to obtain a good security against the tenant by distraining for the monthly payments if the default should happen, and that it was a genuine agreement to secure that in the shape of rent, and was not intended in any way as a device to escape the operation of the bankrupt law. This was the point mainly argued. I have not forgotten that the monthly rent would be variable, but I can see no objection to it on that ground. We are all of us familiar with variable rents; I have seen a vast number of them. They are quite common in this country in agricultural districts. There are what are called penal rents, for ploughing up pasture. They arise on the ploughing up, and not at any definite time. In those cases the rent is variable, and depends upon the number of acres ploughed up in the year. Again, we are familiar in London and many other large towns with variable rents, especially in building and improving leases, where there are rents varying from year to year, and in gaps and intervals depending upon the performance of various duties, sometimes by the tenant, sometimes by the landlord. The kind of improvement most familiar to us in regard to agricultural leases is drainage. It very often happens that, when the landlord does the drainage, he puts in a stipulation that he shall receive a certain percentage on what he lays out, and he may be entitled to drain even without the consent of the tenant, and to cause the tenant to pay an increased rent. I do not see the difficulty in law, and therefore I cannot say that because the rent may vary, not by reason of any duties, but by reason of some default by the mortgagor, there is any objection to it in point of law. It seems to me, so far, good in law.

But some other points have been taken. It was said that there was no tenancy at all, because you cannot make a tenancy except by agreement, and that, as the mortgage deed was not executed by the mortgagees, there is no agreement. The fallacy of that argument seems to me to be in confounding agreement with evidence of agreement. Certainly there must be an agreement, or else you cannot have a tenancy; but an attornment may be evidence that the landlord has entered into an agreement for a tenancy. In this case we have an attornment to the legal owner by deed executed by the tenant in possession and delivered to the legal owner—very good evidence of a tenancy—evidence, therefore, of an agreement for a tenancy, and, as was said in Ex parte Punnett (5), that is an estoppel in pais which would prevent the tenant from denying the tenancy. Therefore, there is in this case a well-created tenancy.

Another objection taken was, that there is some provision in the Statute of Frauds which affects the case. I am not aware of any. It does not appear to me that this is within the statute at all. Indeed, it is not even a lease for years, because we do not know how long it may last; because it may not last for three years or for one year, and it does not appear to me to be obnoxious to the Statute of Frauds.

The last point was this. It was said that upon the terms of the deed it was a mere tenancy at will, and that as regards the subsequent distresses (and there were several), inasmuch as they were levied after the commencement of the bankruptcy, they were void. But the answer to that is this. You must construe a deed according to the words used in it. You can only gather the intention of the parties from the words they use, and here they have not made it a tenancy at will. It is a tenancy from month to month—a monthly tenancy. It may be put an end to, no doubt, by the mortgagees if they think fit, but it is not a tenancy at will. It is a monthly tenancy, and, of course, if the trustee in bankruptcy does not choose to disclaim it, he is liable, so long as he remains in possession, to have distresses levied on the property. In my opinion the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

BRETT, L.J.—The real interest in this case is that it gives the opportunity of considering what was the principle of law laid down in Ex parte Williams (2), as compared with In re The Stockton Iron Furnace Company (1).

Now the stipulation which is called an attornment, if it be a bona fide and an honest transaction, is a contract in writing between the two parties to it. It is signed by only one of them, if you please, but it is delivered by that person to the other and kept by him, and the intention of it is that it shall form a contract, and, if that be so, it is a contract. If it is a contract, it is a contract in writing, and, if it be a bona fida contract and is in writing, the effect of it depends entirely upon the construction of the writing. Now upon that construction it was argued that, if any tenancy is created, it is only a tenancy at will, and that that tenancy at will was put an end to by the bankruptcy, and, consequently, that some of these distresses were invalid. It was argued, as I understand it, that it must be considered as a tenancy at will, because it seemed to be a tenancy for more than three years, and was therefore void by the Statute of Frauds, because there is no agreement in writing signed by the landlord, and that then the result is that, if a tenancy for more than three years is attempted to be made, it becomes by the Statute of Frauds a tenancy at will. It is a sufficient answer to say that this is not a case of tenancy within the Statute of Frauds at all. The first section of the Statute of Frauds applies only where the tenancy, if good, must of necessity last for more than three years. But if, at the time of the arrangement, the tenancy may last for less than three years, although it may last for more, it is not within that section of the statute at all. And it is obvious that the tenancy in this case, although it may last for more than three years, may last for less.

It was urged that it was not a good tenancy, because there was no certain rent agreed upon, and it was said that there was no certain rent because the amount of the rent was fluctuating and variable. Now it is true that, if that which is agreed upon as the payment is uncertain, it is not rent. It must be certain. But the rent is certain if by calculation and upon the happening of certain events, it becomes certain, and, as my Lord has already said, the mere fact of rent being fluctuating does not make it uncertain. If a lease be made for ten or twenty years, at a rent increasing every two or every three years, there the rent fluctuates no doubt, but it is not uncertain. It becomes certain as each year advances. And so in other cases. If the rent of a farm for one year, if you please in advance, is to be so much if a certain number of acres are ploughed up, then in the next year a different rent if so many acres are left in pasture or crops—then the rent is fluctuating, but it becomes certain the moment the condition is fulfilled, and therefore although a fluctuating, it is a certain rent. If in the present case the agreement had been this, that in case of the non-payment of the instalments by the mortgagor, the rent should be the damage which the other party might suffer, so that it would have to be ascertained at large or by a tribunal, that would be a stipulation for an uncertain payment which could not be rent, and then there would be no lease. But here it seems to me that upon the happening of the condition named, the rent fixes itself, and is therefore a certain rent.

It was also said that upon the terms of the attornment clause itself, without reference to the Statute of Frauds, this tenancy would be a tenancy at will, but I agree with my Lord that that is not so. It is in terms a tenancy from month to month. Therefore, the objection to the fluctuating nature of the rent not being a valid one, the tenancy not being in its terms a tenancy at will, and not being made a tenancy at will by reason of non-compliance with the Statute of Frauds, it was in the hands of the mortgagor a tenancy from month to month. That tenancy passed to the trustees in the bankruptcy, because they did not disclaim it, and therefore all the distresses are good if the transaction be a bona fide one.

That raises the question whether the contract was a bona fide one. Now, in what sense can it be said that it is not bona fide? Whatever may be its terms, and however excessive the rent, it is not a fraud as between the parties, because nothing was concealed by the one from the other, and both agreed to the terms. Therefore it could not be a fraud as between the parties. It was not intended to defraud any known individual. It cannot, therefore, in the ordinary sense of the term, be a fraud at all. The only way in which it can cease to be a bona fide contract is if it was not intended to be acted upon between the parties at all, and was only a device to evade the bankruptcy laws. That would not be what is ordinarily called a fraud, but it would be what is called a fraud upon the bankruptcy laws—that is, an attempt to evade the bankruptcy laws in case of a bankruptcy. Now that attempted evasion, that want of bona fides with regard to the bankruptcy laws, must exist, if at all, at the moment when the contract is made. Therefore, what we have to consider is this, and this is the real meaning of Ex parte Williams (2)—at the time when the contract was made was it made for the purpose of its being acted upon between the parties, whether there should be a bankruptcy or not, or, although in terms it appears to be made between the parties with the intention that it should be acted upon whether there is a bankruptcy or not, were their minds really then fixed upon this, that it was to be acted upon only if there should be a bankruptcy? In other words, they must have had bankruptcy in their contemplation at the time of making the contract; they must have contemplated evading or attempting to evade the fair distribution of the mortgagor's property in case of his bankruptcy. That seems to me to be the true proposition, and the true principle of law which is laid down in Ex parte Williams (2). Then, when you have got the true principle of law, you have to consider whether the case before you is within that principle in point of fact. Now Ex parte Williams (2) and other cases on the subject afford some guidance as to what state of facts will bring a case within the principle, but they do not exclude other states of facts. Other facts may arise which would have the same effect, although they may not be the same as the facts of Ex parte Williams (2). But Ex parte Williams (2) and Ex parte Jackson (4) shew that, where the rent reserved, or that which is called rent, is so abnormal that you can gather from it alone that the parties must have known and intended that it should not be paid as a rent; that it never could be paid as a rent, or distrained for as a rent (for there never could in ordinary contemplation be anything for which such an absurd amount could be realised); when you find such a state of facts you infer from it (there being nothing to countervail it) that the parties never intended that the stipulation should be acted upon as fixing a rent to be paid by the one or distrained for by the other, that it was not a stipulation as to rent at all, but was merely a fiction, and that what was intended was only that in case of the bankruptcy of the mortgagor the mortgagee should have the right to seize upon the goods which were then on the premises, not to seize on them if there were no bankruptcy, but only to seize upon them in case of bankruptcy. It seems to me that that is the true meaning of Ex parte Williams (2), because in the Stockton Case (1) Lord Justice James, who had been a party to deciding Ex parte Williams (2), seeing that words had then been used which might not properly and truly express the principle that a "fair rent" had been spoken of, changes his proposition, and says that the inference is to be drawn, not from what you might call a fair or an unfair rent, but from the rent being of such an absurd amount as to shew that an evasion of the bankruptcy laws was intended. It is true that Lord Justice Baggallay, in the subsequent case of Ex parte Jackson (4), did use some expressions which would seem to take the proposition back to the terms used in Ex parte Williams (2); but I do not think that he intended to alter the proposition as it was laid down in The Stockton Case (1), and certainly the other Judges who sat with him used words which shew that they intended to lay down the proposition, not exactly in terms used in Ex parte Williams (2), but rather in those which Lord Justice James used in The Stockton Case (1), and which have been adopted by the Master of the Rolls and the other Judges who have sat in this Court.

I have already said that Ex parte Williams (2) and the other cases, though decided on the ground that the amount of the rent reserved was absurd, do not exclude other means of shewing a want of bona fides. For instance, suppose that the amount named as the rent was extremely moderate, but it was proved that there was a secret arrangement that no demand should be made for the rent and no distress levied for it, except in the case of the bankruptcy of the mortgagor, that arrangement would equally shew that the supposed tenancy was only a device to avoid the fair distribution of the property of the mortgagor on his bankruptcy. I take it that the question is whether there was a real honest stipulation between the parties intended to be acted upon whether there should be a bankruptcy or not, or whether it was a stipulation which they intended to be acted upon only for the purpose of defeating the bankruptcy law. Now, in the present case, considering who were the parties to the transaction (a matter which we ought to consider), that one of them was a building society, and knowing that building societies are apt to impose harsh terms, and that they mean to act upon them, and do act upon them, and considering that the amount of the rent reserved, although, if you please, it is large, is certainly not absurdly large, I can see nothing which ought to lead the Court to infer (there is certainly nothing which does in fact lead my mind to infer) that the parties did not mean that the stipulation should be acted upon, whether there was a bankruptcy or not, or that they intended it to be all a sham, and to be acted upon only in case of bankruptcy. It seems to me, therefore, that the judgment of the Chief Judge ought to be affirmed.

COTTON, L.J.—The appellants, who are trustees in bankruptcy, seek to question certain distresses which were put in by the respondents. I will deal first with the general objection to all of them, which is this, that, having regard to the principles which were acted upon in Ex parte Williams (2) and other similar cases, these distresses are bad altogether. We must consider what the principle of these cases really is, and, as I understand it, it is this:—It is undoubted that a mortgagee may enter into a contract with his mortgagor that the mortgagor shall be tenant to the mortgagee, and it is equally undoubted that the law gives certain rights and priorities to a landlord; but the question is, whether the contract between the parties is one under which (whatever were the words they used) they really intended to create the relation of landlord and tenant, or whether, under the mask of certain words, they intended, without any real tenancy, to endeavour to give to the mortgagee all those rights which he could only have if he was landlord and the mortgagor was his tenant. This may be put in other words. It may be said the question is whether there was between the parties any real creation of the relation of landlord and tenant, or whether, whatever were the words used, it was all a sham. In considering that question we must look at both the amount of the rent, or what is called the rent, and the other circumstances; and if we find that the so-called rent is excessive, that it never could have been meant to be paid by the occupier to the owner of the land for its use and occupation, that is very strong evidence indeed that there was no real intention to create a tenancy; and if you find that the amount of the so-called rent is so large that the very moment one payment was made the relation of landlord and tenant, if it ever existed, must determine, that is almost conclusive against there being any real intention to create the relation of landlord and tenant. That was the case in Ex parte Jackson (4), where, the utmost amount to be secured by the mortgage being 8,000*l.*, the supposed rent was 8,000*l.* The very moment that was distrained for of course the tenancy would be at an end, because it was only to last while the mortgage debt existed. In that case there could be no doubt that there was a mere nominal creation of the relation of landlord and tenant, or that in reality the intention was to try and get the benefit which a landlord only can have over any other creditor, by using the words "landlord and tenant" without any intention of creating any such relation. But in the present case can we come to that conclusion? In my opinion we cannot. First, take the amount of the rent; I will deal presently with the fines. The rent, or the so-called rent, is about 800*l.* a year. It is said that is in excess of what, having regard to the poor-rate valuation and the other evidence offered by the appellants, would have been the rent which any tenant or any mortgagor would have paid. But, in considering what the real intention of the parties was, we must look at what, in their minds, was the value of the property; and we do find that the valuation of the property, made by one valuer who was employed on their entering into the transaction, was about 12,000*l.* And that being so, the mere fact that the so-called rent was 800*l.* is no argument to shew that there was not a real contract between the parties that, upon the condition of the mortgagees not insisting upon their right to turn out the mortgagor, the mortgagor should pay by way of rent for the use of the land the sum of 800*l.* But we must also consider this:—The mortgage provided that the amount was to be paid off by certain monthly payments extending over a period of fourteen years. Of course they would not necessarily last that time; they might only last for a short time, though they might last for all that time; and the amount of rent stipulated for was not a sum which would enable the mortgagees to obtain at once, without any continuing tenancy, payment of the whole mortgage debt, so that if the power were once put in force it would put an end to the payment of rent by the so-called tenant in possession. That, in my opinion, is an important distinction between the present case and the cases which have been cited, and it leads strongly to the conclusion that bankruptcy was not the only thing which was contemplated, there being other cases in which the relation of landlord and tenant would commence and would continue. What the parties contemplated was not a mere sham or nominal relation of landlord and tenant, in order to obtain payment of the amount due by the mortgagor in the event of his bankruptcy, but the continuance of the relation of landlord and tenant, the tenant paying the monthly rent so long as the mortgage should last, in accordance with the stipulations in the deed as to the payment of the mortgage debt by instalments. In my opinion, we could not under these circumstances properly come to the conclusion that it was an attempt to obtain, without any tenancy, a priority in the event of bankruptcy, which could only legally be obtained if there was a tenancy. Of course the question is, was the transaction a sham or a reality? and I think we ought in the present case to take it to be a reality and not a sham. And if we come to this conclusion, there being nothing to prevent a mortgagee and a mortgagor from agreeing together that the relation of landlord and tenant shall exist between them, we cannot deprive the mortgagee of the consequences resulting from that legal relation which has been honestly and really constituted by the contract between the parties.

But then another objection raised was this—that the tenancy created was only a tenancy at will, and that therefore the distresses put in after the bankruptcy are void. It is said that the Statute of Frauds provides that leases which are not in writing signed by the parties making the same shall operate only as tenancies at will. That, it is true, is the effect of the first section of the Statute of Frauds, but the second section excepts from the operation of the first leases not exceeding the term of three years. That is to say, tenancies which of necessity exceed three years are within the 1st section, but those which do not of necessity exceed it are not within it. Here the tenancy was to arise only in certain events, which might happen a very short time before the end of the period of fourteen years, when of necessity the mortgage must come to an end—I mean of necessity according to the contract between the parties. It is not, therefore, in my opinion, liable to any objection under the Statute of Frauds; and there being, putting aside the Statute of Frauds, a binding contract between the parties, not for a tenancy at will but for a monthly tenancy, in my opinion that term vested in the trustees in the bankruptcy, they not having disclaimed it; and the distresses levied after the bankruptcy were good.

There is one other point which I ought to have mentioned before. It was argued that the default mentioned in the deed might be a default for any period of time in paying up the fines, and that the result might be to run up the rent to a large and very excessive amount. No doubt that is a question to be considered. But, in my opinion, when we are considering a contract of this nature we ought not to suppose that the parties contemplated abusing it by allowing the instalments to fall into arrear for a considerable time so as to create a very large rent, and thus to subject the mortgagor to a very large increase of payment. But we ought to consider, in the absence of any evidence of such an intention, that the parties intended to act in a reasonable and fair manner in the execution of their contract. That being so, although the first payment of rent for the first three months would be large, yet that would really be only a payment off of arrears; and, in my opinion, the parties intended to act reasonably in carrying out the contract by securing the payment of the mortgage money by the rent which I have mentioned, 800*l.*; and this is not a sum so shocking as to lead to the conclusion that a sham and not a real tenancy was created. In my opinion, the judgment of the Chief Judge was correct, and the appeal must be dismissed.

JESSEL, M.R.—I wish to add that I entirely agree in the observations of Lord Justice Brett as to the principles of law which are to be extracted from Ex parte Williams (2) and the two subsequent cases.

Ex parte PRICE; in re ROBERTS.

Bankruptcy—Jurisdiction—Discretion as to Exercise—Fraudulent Deed—13 Eliz. c. 5—Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), s. 72.

A bankrupt had, about eighteen months before his bankruptcy, conveyed to his father, in consideration of 100*l.*, property worth about 500*l. The trustee applied to the County Court to have the deed set aside on the ground that it was executed with intent to defeat and delay creditors. The father objected to have the question tried in the County Court, but wished to have it tried in the High Court:*—Held, that as serious questions of character were involved, and the amount at stake was large, the case was not one in which the Court of Bankruptcy ought to exercise its discretionary jurisdiction under section 72 of the Bankruptcy Act, but the matter ought to be left to the ordinary tribunals.

By an indenture, dated the 8th of September, 1880, Thomas Roberts, a grocer at Birkenhead, in consideration of 100*l.*, conveyed to his father, Hugh Roberts, in fee, the equity of redemption of a farm in Anglesey.

On the 10th of February, 1882, Thomas Roberts filed a liquidation petition in the Birkenhead County Court. The trustee subsequently applied to the County Court for an order declaring that the deed of the Ex parte Price; in re Roberts (App.), Bankr.

8th of September, 1880, was executed by the debtor with intent to delay his creditors, was fraudulent and void as against the trustee, and ought to be delivered up to be cancelled.

The property was said to be worth 1,450*l.*, and was subject to a mortgage for 1,000*l.*

The trustee alleged that the sale was a sham, and that after the sale the son continued to deal with the property as his own.

At the hearing it was objected, on behalf of the purchaser, the father, that there was no jurisdiction to decide the question without the consent of the father, who was no party to the liquidation, and that therefore the trustee ought to proceed by action in the ordinary way. The County Court Judge overruled this objection, tried the case, and directed the deed to be delivered up to be cancelled.

The father appealed.

Yate Lee, for the appellant.—This is not a case in which the Court of Bankruptcy ought to exercise its extraordinary jurisdiction under section 72 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869—Ex parte Pennell; in re England (1) and In re Harrison; ex parte Harrison (2).

The action affects the rights of parties outside the bankruptcy, involving questions of character and value of property.

He also cited Ellis v. Silber (3).

Kennedy, for the respondent, the trustee.—The trustee claims by a higher title than the debtor; therefore the Court of Bankruptcy ought to decide this question, and not leave it to the ordinary tribunals—Ex parte Brown; in re Yates (4).

[Bacon, C.J., considered that as the questions were not questions arising in the liquidation, the trustee had no right to compel the appellant to have them tried by the Court of Bankruptcy. He therefore allowed the appeal, but without costs.]

From this decision the trustee appealed.

Winslow, Q.C., and F. Thompson, for the appellant.—The validity of the deed is impeached under section 91 of the Bankruptcy Act as well as under the statute of Elizabeth. The case is therefore a proper one for the Court of Bankruptcy to exercise its discretion under section 72 of the Bankruptcy Act.

[Jessel, M.R.—The question is dealt with in Ex parte Dickin (5) and Ex parte Armitage (6).]

They also referred to Ex parte Butters; in re Harrison (7) and Ex parte Brown; in re Yates (4).

[Jessel, M.R.—The principle is laid down by James, L.J., in Ex parte Dickin (5).]

The County Court Judge had a discretion in the matter, and he rightly exercised it.

Yate Lee, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Jessel, M.R.—I think that after the decision in Ex parte Armitage (6) the law on this point must be taken to be settled. Section 72 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, enables the Court of Bankruptcy to decide "all questions whatsoever, whether of law or fact, arising in any case of bankruptcy" coming within its cognisance, if it is desirable that it should do so. But a discretion is given to the Court, whether it will or will not try the case; and the mode in which that discretion ought to be exercised is very fairly pointed out in Ex parte Armitage (6). In that case it was held that a question of character was not proper to be tried in a County Court. In the present case an allegation of gross fraud is made against a father and his son. It is said that they conspired together to make a sham sale to the father of the equity of redemption of property of the son, in order to defraud the creditors of the son. It does not matter under what statute it is sought to set aside the transaction. The allegation is that the property was worth 1,450*l.*, subject to a mortgage for 1,000*l.*, and that the father bought it for 100*l.*

Property worth nearly 500*l.* is at stake, and questions seriously affecting character are involved. The father is not a bankrupt, and he is not directly amenable to the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy. He desires that the case should not be tried in the County Court, and says that he should like to have it tried by the ordinary tribunal. He gives various reasons for this:—If it is tried in the High Court it will be tried by a Judge of high rank; there will be a jury of twelve men instead of five, and he will be able to have the assistance of a higher class of counsel. Is this an unreasonable objection? Ought we to compel him to submit to the jurisdiction of the County Court in a case in which the amount at stake is so much beyond the ordinary jurisdiction of that Court, except in bankruptcy, and in which such serious questions of character arise? The County Court Judge seems to have thought that he had not any discretion in the matter, much less to have exercised any discretion. The objection that the Chief Judge ought not to have interfered with the exercise of discretion by the County Court Judge does not therefore arise. I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed, and that the costs should follow the event. The costs in the County Court and before the Chief Judge will be reserved.

BRETT, L.J.—Assuming the objection to the deed to be one which would arise only under the statute of Elizabeth, the Court of Bankruptcy would have jurisdiction to try the question. Therefore the only ground on which the order of the County Court Judge can be interfered with is that he had a discretion which he did not exercise. I mean to say that, in my view, if the sum in dispute had been small—say under 50*l.*—I should have thought we ought not to interfere with the exercise of discretion by the County Court Judge if he had said that he would try the case himself. In the same way, if a very large sum were at stake in a case arising in a bankruptcy within the district of the London Bankruptcy Court, and the Chief Judge had said that he would try the case himself with a jury, I should not have been inclined to interfere. I do not wish to put the case on any different footing from that on which it would have stood if the allegation had been that the deed was void, not under the statute of Elizabeth, but as a fraudulent preference. I think the fact that the question arises under the statute of Elizabeth has some bearing on the exercise of the jurisdiction. But I do not wish to preclude myself from saying that, if the case were one of fraudulent preference, it ought not to be tried in the County Court if the third party objected. But in the present case it cannot be doubted that the charge made is one of personal fraud, and, indeed, the County Court Judge himself has said so. The father objected, and I think quite reasonably, to have the question of his character and his right to property worth 500*l.* decided in the County Court, not because of any personal objection to the Judge, but because he wished to have his rights decided by a jury of twelve of his countrymen under the superintendence of a Judge of the High Court. And there was something more than this. All the witnesses live in Anglesea, and he is an Anglesea man, and if the case is tried at the Assizes there it will be tried by neighbours of his own who know his character. This is of immense importance to him if he is an honest man, and it would be a very strong thing to deprive him of this right. It seems to me that Ex parte Armitage (6) is an authority for saying that when character is impeached and the amount at stake is large the County Court Judge ought to exercise his discretion under section 72 by allowing the case to be tried in the ordinary way. If the County Court Judge had exercised any discretion in the present case, I should have said that he had clearly exercised it wrongly; but I think he did not exercise his discretion at all.

COTTON, L.J.—Section 72 gives the Court of Bankruptcy jurisdiction to decide all questions which are necessary for the purpose of ascertaining what is the estate of the bankrupt, and how it ought to be distributed. I think there was jurisdiction to try the present case. But when an objection to the exercise of jurisdiction is made by a third person who is brought into the Court of Bankruptcy, the Court ought to consider whether, under the circumstances, it is reasonable that the case should be tried by the ordinary tribunals or in the Court of Bankruptcy. It is objected here that the County Court Judge has exercised his discretion; but I think he has not done so. The objection seems to have been put to him as a question of jurisdiction, not of discretion. The discretion was not exercised until the matter came before the Chief Judge, and in my opinion he exercised his discretion rightly in considering the nature of the question and the amount at stake. I by no means say that if the amount at stake was very small the trustee ought to be put to the expense of an action. But here a substantial amount is at stake, and there is a distinct charge of fraud. Under such circumstances, I think the County Court Judge ought, in the exercise of his discretion, to have entertained the objection, and to have left the trustee to have recourse to the ordinary tribunals. The costs in the County Court and before the Chief Judge will be reserved to be dealt with by the County Court Judge. The respondent must not deal with the property for three months.

Dec. 14.

KITCAT v. SHARP.

Contempt of Court—Jurisdiction—Injunction.

An injunction was granted on motion in an action, to restrain a party to the action from a threatened publication of circulars abusive of a party to, and tending to prejudice the fair trial of, the action.

The plaintiff in this action was a clergyman, who had bought ten shares in the Union Trust Company of the defendant Henry Gould Sharp, a stock and share broker, not a member of the Stock Exchange. The statement of claim alleged that the plaintiff had been induced to take the shares by false representations contained in letters and circulars sent to him by the defendant. He claimed a declaration that he had been induced to take the shares by such fraudulent misrepresentations, and consequential relief by rescission, or, in the alternative, damages. A number of similar actions had been brought by other persons against the same defendant.

The defendant wrote to the plaintiff a letter, which he sent together with a copy of the statement of claim, having marginal comments of a strong character on the allegations in the statement of claim. The following is an extract from that letter:—

"Such a statement of claim is enough to rouse any man's feelings. I shall have them reprinted, and send them round to the other misguided plaintiffs, asking if it is their intention to send in a fac simile tissue of falsehoods; in fact, I should not hesitate a moment in having a few thousands struck off with my remarks (facts, not lies), bringing in the loss I saved you on the sixty shares, and sending them round with copies of my letters to you to the clergy, addressed from the Clergy List. You deserve such treatment. Some years since I was done out of 1,100*l.* by a nobleman. I printed all his letters and my replies, and sent 4,000 copies (an immense sheet) to the nobility to show the man up. He deserved such treatment. I got 6*d.* in the pound out of the baron. When I begin I go on."

This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiff to restrain the defendant from the threatened publication of the statement of claim and comments.

Harry Greenwood, for the plaintiff.—The threatened publication would be a contempt of Court, as being a libel on the plaintiff, and also as tending to interfere with the fair trial of the action, and would therefore be restrained on motion in the action—Coleman v. The West Hartlepool Railway Company (1). The

(1) 8 W. R. 734.

Court will restrain the publication of a libel—The Quartz Mining Company v. Beall (2) and Hill v. Hart-Davis (3).

Joseph Beaumont, for the defendant.—A libel can only be restrained as such in an action brought for that purpose. The proper remedy for contempt of Court is by motion to commit, and the Court has no jurisdiction to restrain such contempt—Smith v. The Justices of Sierra Leone (4) and McDermott v. The Justices of British Guiana (5). This is not like a case where the Court interferes in exercise of the jurisdiction of the Chancellor as parens patriæ to protect a ward or prevent a contempt of Court.

FRY, J.—It appears to me that if the threat contained in the letter were carried into effect, it would be calculated to interfere with the fair trial of the action; it would be calculated to prejudice the plaintiff, and render it difficult for him to obtain justice if justice were on his side. That such a course of action is a contempt of Court I cannot entertain the slightest doubt. So long ago as 1742 it was laid down by Lord Hardwicke, in a motion against the printers of The Champion and St. James's Evening Post (6), "that nothing is more incumbent on Courts of justice than to preserve their proceedings from being misrepresented, nor is there anything of more pernicious consequence than to prejudice the minds of the public against persons, parties in causes, before the cause is finally heard." Further down in the same case he said, "There are three different sorts of contempt. One is scandalising the Court itself. There may be likewise contempt of Court in abusing parties who are concerned in causes here. There may be also a contempt of this Court in prejudicing mankind against persons before the cause is heard."

It appears to me that the threatened act of the defendant would tend in this case to the two latter species of contempt. It is both abusing a party concerned and prejudicing mankind before the cause is heard. It appears to me, therefore, clearly that there would be contempt of Court.

If so, there arises the question whether I ought to stop that course of action, or whether the only proper course would be, as is contended by his counsel, to imprison him for contempt when committed. It appears to me I have plainly jurisdiction to prevent the threatened conduct. Only observe what would be the effect if I had not the jurisdiction. It would be that the Court, seeing that a fair trial is likely to be interfered with by a contempt of Court, would be powerless to prevent such contempt, and powerless to prevent the fair trial from being interfered with. It might be so because there might be a decision to that effect binding on me; but there is nothing of the sort; and in the next place nothing is more familiar than cases where the Court does interfere to prevent a threatened contempt of Court. The case to which Mr. Beaumont has referred, with respect to wards of Court, is an exercise of that jurisdiction against persons not even parties to the action or cause. Lastly, if authority were wanted for the exercise of the jurisdiction in this very way, there is the case that has been cited of Coleman v. The West Hartlepool Railway Company (1), in which the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Page Wood restrained publication.

Against that no single case has been brought, though Mr. Beaumont has argued the case with his usual ability and industry. I hold, therefore, that I have the jurisdiction and the obligation in the present case to restrain the publication.

BREWER v. BROADWOOD.

Vendor and Purchaser—Specific Performance—Defeasible Title.

The Court will not enforce a contract for sale at the instance of the vendor when it is in the power of a third person to destroy the title.

An action by the vendor for the specific performance of a contract to purchase a building agreement for a lease was dismissed where the conditions of the agreement on the part of the builder had not been complied with.

On the 17th of August, 1878, a building agreement was entered into between the Earl of Ilchester as landowner and George Stevenson as builder, in respect of a plot of land at Melbury Road, Kensington, by which it was stipulated that two houses should be built on the land, which should be completed by the 17th of August, 1880, and that Lord Ilchester would grant leases for the term of ninety years from the 24th of June, 1880, at an annual rent of 250*l.* for the two houses.

One house, called No. 1 Melbury Road, was erected, and a lease granted at an apportioned rent of 150*l.*

In July, 1880, the agent of Lord Ilchester wrote to George Stevenson consenting to enlarge the time for completion of the second house, on condition that excavation should be commenced at once, that reasonable progress should be made with the building within the next three months, that the house should be covered in by the 17th of May, 1881, and finished in due course.

In January, 1881, the interest of Stevenson under the agreement subsequently became vested in W. H. Brewer, the plaintiff, as purchaser from the trustee in liquidation of the estate of George Stevenson.

On the 1st of April, 1881, the plaintiff, acting by George Stevenson as agent, and the defendant Broadwood, acting by the defendant E. Plater, entered into an agreement by which the defendant Broadwood agreed to purchase the agreement to lease the plot of land next to No. 1 Melbury Road from Lord Ilchester, at the annual ground rent of 100*l.*, for the sum of 800*l.*

On the 6th of April, 1881, the defendant Broadwood repudiated the contract. The house was not roofed in by the 17th of May, 1881, the time stipulated by the agreement of Lord Ilchester; and no reasonable progress, it was admitted, had been made by April the 6th; but on that day Lord Ilchester's solicitors agreed on his behalf with the plaintiff for a further extension of the time for covering in the house until the 31st of October, 1881, on condition of the rent up to the 25th of March, 1881, being paid within a week. The plaintiff sued for damages for breach of the agreement.

Cozens Hardy, Q.C., and Seward-Brice, for the plaintiff.—The contract entered into by the defendant was to take over the agreement as it stood for what it was worth, and could not be repudiated even if it turned out worthless. In the second place, the agreement was a valid and subsisting one; it had not been avoided; the plaintiff was in possession under it. They distinguished the case from Noble v. Edwards (1) on the ground that time was not here of the essence of the contract.

Davey, and Giffard, Q.C., for the defendant.—The plaintiff had failed to complete his contract to assign an agreement for a lease capable of being enforced against the ground landlord; the defendant was therefore in a position to repudiate the agreement when he did—Forrer v. Nash (2), Penniall v. Harborne (3), Wilson v. Wilson (4) and Weston v. Savage (5).

Cozens Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—The plaintiff, by the arrangement of the 6th, was placed in a position to make a good title; that was all that was required to support his right of action — Sidebotham v. Barrington (6).

the obligation of a person who agrees to sell an agreement to lease? It may be shewn either from the surrounding circumstances, or by direct evidence that the intention of the agreement is to sell only such interest, if any, as the vendor may have; and in such a case as that the purchaser has no right to require the title to be shewn by the vendor; but, in the absence of such express evidence, the view which I take of such an agreement is that it requires the vendor to shew that he has a title to a valid agreement. The law of England, in the case of a sale of freehold land in fee-simple, requires the vendor to shew that he has a fee-simple title to the land. If it is the sale of a lease, it requires the vendor to shew that he has a valid title to the term granted by the lease; and likewise, in the case of an agreement for a lease, I hold that the vendor is bound to shew that there is a subsisting valid agreement for a lease.

[His Lordship stated the facts, observing that it was conceded that the second condition imposed by the agent of Lord Ilchester, in the letter of July, 1880, had not been complied with, and proceeded:]

On the 1st of April, 1881, therefore, there was a subsisting agreement to lease, but not a valid agreement in the sense that it was voidable. It was subsisting, but voidable. It was subsisting because Lord Ilchester could enforce it, and it was subsisting because Mr. Stevenson, or the plaintiff claiming under him, was in possession of the land under the agreement; but voidable because the condition of the original agreement and the condition of the extended agreement were both in default. Therefore, it appears to me that, according to the true construction of the agreement on the 1st of April, the plaintiff was never in a position to make out a valid title to the agreement. But the enquiry then arises, Was he before the 6th of April in a position to make out a good title?—because that is the date at which the defendant wrote a letter repudiating the agreement. That turns upon the enquiry, What happened on the 6th of April between Messrs. Fladgate, who were the agents for the earl, and the agents for the plaintiff? Now on that day they wrote a letter in which they proposed (that is what it comes to) an extension of the time to the 31st of October, subject to certain conditions. Now one of those conditions was that the three quarters of a year's ground rent, payable on the 25th of March then last past, should be paid on the 12th of April. It was not, therefore, an unconditional or an unqualified enlargement of the time. The agreement for a lease, therefore, could only be rendered valid on the performance of the condition which was not then performed, and as to which, of course, it was doubtful whether it would ever be performed, and which in point of fact never was performed. That is immaterial, as it seems to me. The material fact appears to me to be this—that on the 6th of April there was only a conditional and contingent waiver of the right to avoid the term. Now I have to ask myself whether the plaintiff, under that state of circumstances, was in a position to shew that he had a valid agreement. The answer appears to me to be that he was not. He had nothing but a contingent agreement; he had nothing to sell; and the question is, Was the defendant then at liberty to repudiate the contract? In my judgment he was. In the first place, I think that this is a contract in which time was of the essence; because, in any event, the property to be acquired by Mr. Broadwood was only for a term of years, and, in any event, he was only to have a limited period within which to complete his building. Every day, therefore, was of great importance to Mr. Broadwood, and it would be a great hardship that he should be postponed, even to the 12th of April, to know whether there was or was not a valid agreement. But, in the next place, I think there is great good sense in the view which the Master of the Rolls expressed in the case of Forrer v. Nash (2), that where a person sells property that he is neither able to convey himself nor has the power to compel the conveyance from any other person, the purchaser, as soon as he finds that to be the case, may say, "I will have nothing to do with it." That is the case here, and on that principle the defendant was justified in repudiating the contract. That principle has nothing whatever to do with cases in which there are outstanding interests which the vendor has the power of getting in, because in those cases he is liable and under an obligation to get them in; and therefore it has nothing to do with the case in which the owner of land subject to an incumbrance sells that land, because he has the power and is under an obligation to pay off the incumbrance and get it in. But it has something to do with a case where the only title of the vendor is contingent upon the will and volition of a third person. That is the present case, and therefore I hold that the defendant was justified in the repudiation, and I dismiss this action with costs; and I direct the repayment of the deposit, with interest at four per cent. from the date of the 6th of April.

BANKRUPTCY.

Ex parte AMOR; in re AMOR.

Bankruptcy — Liquidation Petition — Debtor in Partnership — Statement of Affairs — Sufficiency — Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), ss. 125 and 126.

A debtor who carried on two businesses, one by himself and the other in partnership, filed a liquidation petition, his partner being solvent. His statement of affairs, besides shewing his assets and liabilities on his separate estate, gave the names of the partnership creditors with the amount of the debt due to each, and stated that upon balancing the books of the firm there appeared to be a certain surplus due to him:—Held, that the names of the debtors to the firm should have been stated and the amount due from each, together with an account between the debtor and his partner shewing clearly the balance due to him; and this not having been done that the statement was insufficient.

If for any reason a debtor is unable to make a proper statement of his affairs, he must submit to be made bankrupt and lose the benefit of the Act as to liquidation or composition.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar Murray sitting as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

The bankrupt, J. B. Amor, carried on business alone as the proprietor of a club; he also carried on the business of a cigar importer in partnership with one Leigh.

On the 2nd of June, 1882, Amor filed a liquidation petition, and, at the first meeting of his creditors, which took place on the 29th of June, he produced a statement of his affairs, shewing liabilities amounting to 36,850*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.*, and assets 5,655*l.* 14*s.* This statement set out lists of the secured and unsecured creditors against his separate estate, and a list of the partnership creditors, giving their names and the amount due to each, the total being 3,543*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*; and it also stated as follows:—

"I am a partner in the firm of Leigh & Amor, and it appears upon balancing the accounts that there is a surplus, after paying the trade creditors, of 1,936*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*, which sum stands to the credit of my capital account in that business; but I am informed that Mr. Leigh claims the entire amount, under a penal clause in the partnership agreement, should the business be wound up through any act of mine."

The first meeting was adjourned in order that an accountant might investigate the debtor's affairs and report to the adjourned meeting. The accountant's report confirmed the statement of the debtor as to his share in the partnership business, but added that the whole of the amount was claimed by Mr. Leigh under the terms of his agreement with the debtor, and that there was no partnership deed.

This report was not signed nor in any way adopted by the debtor.

Resolutions were then passed for a composition of 1*s.* 6*d.* in the pound, and at the second meeting, held on the 25th of July, these resolutions were confirmed.

The registration of the resolutions was objected to by a dissentient creditor on the ground that the statement of affairs was insufficient.

The Registrar having refused to register the resolutions, the debtor appealed.

It appeared that the debtor had been adjudicated a bankrupt on the 4th of July, 1882, upon a petition presented by the dissentient creditor on the 2nd of June, but that the advertisement of the adjudication was stayed pending the result of the liquidation proceedings.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Herbert Reed, for the appellant.—The debtor's statement of affairs is quite sufficient.

[JESSEL, M.R., referred to Ex parte Solomon (1).]

The accountant fully investigated the debtor's statement, and his report supplies any deficiency.

[JESSEL, M.R.—The debtor did not pledge himself to the accountant's statement in any way.]

The accountant's report was read to the meeting as supplementing the debtor's statement, and was adopted by him. The answers given by a debtor to questions put to him at meetings of his creditors are to be taken as supplementing his statement of affairs—Ex parte Aaronson (2).

[JESSEL, M.R.—Only if the answers are taken down in writing—Ex parte Solomon (1). In Ex parte Aaronson (2) the object of the examination was not to supplement the statement, but to impeach the truth of it altogether.]

The debtor has set out the balance due to him from the partnership as an asset, and that is sufficient.

Winslow, Q.C., and Sidney Woolf, for the respondent, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R.—The point which we have to consider is a very simple one. The debtor carried on a business alone and also another business in partnership with a Mr. Leigh. The debtor having filed a liquidation petition, the Act requires him to make a statement of his affairs. This statement must be in writing, and it must pledge the debtor to the amount of his assets and liabilities. How has this debtor made out the statement of his own assets and liabilities? [His Lordship referred to the statement.] The creditors have thus before them the materials for ascertaining what are his means of meeting his liabilities. If he is also a partner in a firm, he ought to make a similar statement of the assets and liabilities of the firm, and then the creditors will be able to see what his position is. But that is not enough. He must also make a statement of the account between himself and his partner, and then the creditors will be able to see exactly what the amount of the surplus coming to him will be. That, in my view, is the proper mode of making the statement, and I can see no difficulty in making it as a general rule. Of course there may be exceptional cases in which this cannot be done—if, for instance, the partner should refuse to allow the debtor access to the books of the firm. If, however, for any reason he cannot make a proper statement of his affairs, he cannot have the benefit of the provisions of the Act as to liquidation or composition, but he must submit to be made bankrupt. In the present case the debtor has a partner, and he has partly complied with the Act by giving a list of the partnership creditors. But as to the assets of the partnership what he says is this: "It appears upon balancing the accounts that there is a surplus, after paying the trade creditors, of 1,936*l.*, which sum stands to the credit of my capital account." That tells nothing to the creditors. They are entitled to know whether the balance is correct, and how it was arrived at. His statement comes only to this, that in an account which has been drawn up by somebody this balance has been arrived at. That tells the creditors nothing. Then he says: "I am informed that Mr. Leigh claims the entire amount, under a penal clause in the partnership agreement, should the business be wound up through any act of mine." He is bound to set out fully what the claim of Mr. Leigh is, and what the penal clause is, so that the creditors may judge for themselves. My impression is that this claim is all moonshine, the very thing which the bankrupt law was intended to prevent. You cannot tell from his statement what it is. His statement comes to this: "I may be entitled to 1,936*l.*, according as Mr. Leigh is or is not entitled to larger damages against me." It is impossible to tell whether the debtor is entitled to receive anything from the partnership. In my opinion the statement is manifestly insufficient, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BRETT, L.J.—I think that the rule which we are laying down will be a hardship on the solvent partner, because the state of his business will be disclosed; but still I think the rule must be so laid down. Mr. Willis's argument, as I understand it, comes to this—that whenever a person who is desirous of liquidating his affairs by arrangement or composition with his creditors has a business of his own, and also another business in which he has a partner, and the partnership business is solvent, he may, for the purpose of guiding his own creditors, put down in a lump sum the share which he says is coming to him from the assets of the partnership. It is admitted that if the business were his own this would not be sufficient. The fact that some one else is interested in it cannot make any difference. Why should he be excused from making a full statement with regard to the partnership business—which is his, though it is also somebody else's—because he has a partner in it? I can see no rule which absolves him from making a full statement because he has a solvent partner. If, then, the debtor ought to make a full statement of the affairs of the partnership business, has he done so here? He has not pledged himself to anything. He only says, "It appears upon balancing the accounts that there is a surplus of 1,936*l.*" That is fatal. But suppose he had said "That is the balance due to me," and had produced the statement of an accountant who had prepared the accounts of the partnership, I am not prepared to say that if that statement had contained all the necessary information, and the debtor under his own hand had referred to it in such a way as to incorporate it into his own statement of affairs, that would not have been sufficient. But nothing of the kind has been done here, and I think it cannot be doubted that the statement is quite insufficient for the purpose of guiding the creditors.

COTTON, L.J.—By holding that this statement of affairs is insufficient, we may be putting some difficulty in the way of persons who desire to avail themselves of these clauses of the Act. But we have only to consider what is required by the Act in order to bind the dissentient creditors. Section 126 requires that the debtor "shall produce to the meeting a statement shewing the whole of his assets and debts, and the names and addresses of the creditors to whom such debts respectively are due." It does not say a statement of the aggregate of his assets or debts. One object is that the creditors may be able to form an opinion what dividend his estate will be able to pay. Another object is that there shall be a statement by the debtor by himself. He ought, in my opinion, to give a full statement, and he should give it as his own statement in writing; and though an accountant's report, if it is properly adopted by the debtor, may be sufficient, still he ought to give all the information which he himself possesses, and it is not sufficient for him to say that by means of subsequent investigation it may perhaps be found out. It is not enough for him to supplement his own insufficient statement by something said by another person; he must himself make the statement, and he must pledge himself to its accuracy. Here the debtor has really pledged himself to nothing; he has given no information which can enable the creditors to judge whether they should accept the composition which he offers.

E. C. Willis, Q.C., asked that a fresh first meeting might be summoned, and referred to Ex parte Solomon (1).

Winslow, Q.C.—The Registrar thought that the resolution was not passed in the interest of the creditors. The statement of affairs as it stood shewed a dividend of 3*s.* 6*d.* in the pound. Besides, the advertisement of our adjudication was only stayed pending the result of these proceedings under the liquidation petition.

JESSEL, M.R.—The granting of a fresh meeting is purely discretionary, and I think under the circumstances we ought to refuse it.

BRETT, L.J., and COTTON, L.J., concurred.

WILDER v. PIGOTT.

Married Woman—Election to confirm Settlement—Infant—Jurisdiction of Court to elect for Person of Unsound Mind.

By the settlement made on the marriage of H. S., an infant, and executed by her, she purported to assign to trustees all property derived by her under her father's marriage settlement, and the husband covenanted for himself and his wife to bring into settlement all after-acquired property. The marriage took place; and H.S. afterwards attained twenty-one, and thereupon executed an acknowledged deed indorsed upon the settlement, by which she purported to assign all the personal property expressed to be assigned by the settlement which had not become vested in possession to the trustees upon the trusts thereof. At the date of the settlement she was entitled to a contingent reversionary interest under her father's marriage settlement, which did not come within Malins's Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57), and was therefore not assignable by her. On the reversionary interest subsequently becoming vested in possession, a portion of it was, by the written direction of the husband and wife, invested in the names of the trustees of their settlement. The husband afterwards died, and H. S. had since become of unsound mind, but had not been so found by inquisition:—Held, that H. S. was competent to elect, and had, in fact, elected, so as to make the settlement as binding and operative in equity as it would have been if she had been of full age at the time when she executed it. Held, further, that if this had not been so, the Court would have had jurisdiction to elect for her, she being of unsound mind.

By an ante-nuptial settlement, dated the 27th of January, 1874, and made between George Wilder, the intended husband, of the first part, Honora Smith, the intended wife (then an infant), of the second part, and trustees of the third part, certain personal property of the intended wife, derived under her father's marriage settlement, was assigned by the husband and wife to the trustees upon the usual trusts; and the deed contained a covenant by the husband that he and his wife, as soon as she should attain twenty-one, would convey and assign certain freehold and leasehold property of the wife to the trustees, and also certain personal property to which she was entitled under the will of her father; and it was provided that, if the wife refused or neglected so to convey and assign, the income payable to her under the settlement might be accumulated to form a fund to make good any loss thereby sustained by other persons interested under the settlement; and it was thereby agreed and declared that "if the said Honora Smith now is, or if during the said intended coverture, she or the said George Wilder in her right shall become possessed of or entitled to any personal property of the value of 300*l.* or upwards for any estate or interest whatsoever, in possession, reversion, remainder or expectancy," except jewels, &c., they would assign and assure the same to the trustees as therein mentioned. The settlement also included certain property brought into settlement by the husband, in which the wife under the trusts took a life interest.

This deed was executed by the intended wife, notwithstanding that she was an infant, and the marriage was duly solemnized. Mrs. Wilder attained twenty-one on the 6th of April, 1874, and on the 13th of that month she executed an acknowledged deed indorsed upon the settlement, by which she, with the concurrence of her husband, purported to assign all the personal property expressed to be assigned by the settlement which had not become vested in possession, and also to convey the real property purported to be conveyed by the settlement to the trustees upon the trusts thereof.

At the date of the settlement Mrs. Wilder was contingently entitled to a reversionary interest in certain personal property under her father's settlement, which it was admitted would have been bound by the assignment, or by the covenant in her own settlement, if that assignment or covenant could be treated as obligatory upon her.

This interest was not actually assigned by the deed of confirmation, because it did not come within Vice-Chancellor Malins's Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57), the date of Mrs. Wilder's father's settlement being before that statute.

Afterwards, in 1875, the reversionary interest became vested in possession, and 400*l.*, part of the fund, was by the written direction of Mrs. Wilder and her husband invested in the names of the trustees of her marriage settlement.

On the 2nd of November, 1876, the husband died, leaving certain infant children issue of the marriage. Subsequently to her husband's decease Mrs. Wilder became of unsound mind, but had not been so found by inquisition, and she was represented by a guardian ad litem in this action, which was an action to carry into execution the trusts of the settlement of 1874.

The present summons was taken out by or on behalf of the infant children of the marriage, and asked in effect that the portion of the funds to which Mrs. Wilder was entitled under her father's marriage settlement, and which was not reduced into possession during the coverture, might now be paid to the trustees of her marriage settlement.

S. Dickinson, in support of the summons.—Mrs. Wilder, notwithstanding her coverture, was competent after she attained twenty-one to elect to confirm the settlement—Barrow v. Barrow (1) and Smith v. Lucas (2). She did in fact so elect by the deed of confirmation. The covenant to settle after-acquired property became binding on her, and being the covenant of an infant, was not void but voidable only, and affects the funds now in question. But even if this be not so, still the Court has jurisdiction to elect in her behalf—see Brooke v. Mostyn (3) and Codrington v. Codrington (4).

[KAY, J., referred to Robinson v. Wheelwright (5).]

Coltman, for the guardian ad litem of Mrs. Wilder.—Mrs. Wilder, during her coverture, could not elect so as to bind her contingent reversionary chose in action. She could not dispose of it at all unless under the provisions of Malins's Act, which have no application. Mrs. Wilder, after the coverture, and before she became of unsound mind, never did elect, and the only question, therefore, is whether the Court can elect for her. It is submitted that the Court has no jurisdiction to elect for a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition.

S. Dickinson, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

KAY, J. (on Dec. 12), after stating the facts of the case as above set forth, continued:—The first question is, whether Mrs. Wilder could elect during her coverture to confirm the settlement. It seems clear from many cases, of which Barrow v. Barrow (1) and Smith v. Lucas (2) are examples, that she could so elect. Then has she in fact elected? I cannot doubt that the acts which I have referred to, which manifested a deliberate intention on her part to recognise the settlement, amounted to an election to confirm it. The effect of such a confirmation must be to make the settlement as binding and as operative in equity as it would have been if she had been of full age at the time when she executed it. In that case it is not disputed that this contingent reversionary property would have been bound in equity by the settlement. It was more than a mere expectancy: it was property to which she was, at the date of the settlement, contingently entitled in reversion, and seems to come within the very words of the first assignment as well as the covenant. The covenant, as was remarked in Smith v. Lucas (2), is not void, but only voidable, and when ratified must be as binding as if it had been originally made by a person who was sui juris. In that view, of course, no case of election arises. If the lady was not to be treated as personally bound by the assignment or covenant, it would be necessary to consider whether the Court ought not now to elect on her behalf, as she is of unsound mind, though not so found by inquisition. Supposing she were to take this fund against the settlement, her life interest in the other settled property would have to be impounded to compensate the loss so occasioned. It seems to me that it would be more for her benefit to elect to take under the settlement, and if she had not already elected that would be the election which should now be made on her behalf.

A doubt was suggested as to the jurisdiction of the Court so to bind the equitable interest of the person of unsound mind. In Jones v. Lloyd (6), the Court adopted this statement of Lord Justice James, "The Court of Chancery is not the curator either of the person or the estate of a person non compos mentis whom it does not and cannot make its ward: it is not by reason of the incompetency, but notwithstanding the incompetency, that the Court of Chancery entertains the proceedings. The Court can only exercise such equitable jurisdiction as it could under the same circumstances have exercised at the suit of the person himself if of sound mind. If there be a trust property in which the person is beneficially interested, the Court may, no doubt, deal with it in such a manner as it may deem just, and it will, if necessary, ascertain the nature and extent of his interest, and will authorise, and in a proper case compel, the trustee to deal with the lunatic's interest in the trust property for his benefit. That arises from its inherent absolute jurisdiction over trusts and trust funds. So in cases of partnership it may make the necessary orders with respect to the partnership and its assets, notwithstanding the incompetency of a partner; but that again is a consequence of this ordinary jurisdiction in partnership matters which is not ousted or paralysed by such incompetency." In that case a bill was filed by a next friend on behalf of a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition against the partner in business of the plaintiff, alleging that the plaintiff had for some time past been suffering from softening of the brain, and was of unsound mind, and that it would be for his benefit that the partnership should be dissolved; and praying that the partnership might be dissolved and accounts taken, and the share of the plaintiff in the assets secured for his benefit, and for a receiver; and it was held on demurrer that the suit could be maintained; and the Master of the Rolls said—"The lunatic must have an undoubted right to say, 'This is a case in which it will be for my benefit that the partnership should be dissolved, and therefore I am entitled to some protection for the assets even before the decree for final dissolution,' and he is entitled to submit that case to the judgment of the Court, and for that purpose, at all events, to make the necessary application." I believe that the Court has been in the habit of binding the equitable interests of lunatics not so found when it appears to be for their benefit, and I am of opinion that it has jurisdiction to do so.

WOOD v. WHEATER.

Practice—Mortgagor and Mortgagee—Judgment for Foreclosure Absolute—Writ of Possession—Recovery of Land—Recovery of Possession of Land—Rules of Court, 1875, Order XVII. rule 2; Order XLII. rule 3—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24, sub-s. 3.

A judgment for foreclosure absolute is not a judgment for the recovery of the possession of land within the meaning of Order XLII. rule 3 of Rules of Court, 1875.

The plaintiff, Ann Wood, was the mortgagee of freehold premises, Dock Street, Leeds, in the occupation of the defendant, John Wheater, the mortgagor.

On the 19th of November, 1881, the plaintiff obtained in an ordinary foreclosure action the usual judgment against the mortgagor, whereby, after ordering an account of what was due for principal, interest and costs, in default of payment within six months from the date of the chief clerk's certificate, it was ordered that the defendant should, from thenceforth, stand absolutely debarred and foreclosed of and from all equity of redemption of, in and to the mortgaged hereditaments.

By the chief clerk's certificate, dated the 25th of May, 1882, the sum of 622*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.* was certified to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff.

On the 20th of September, 1882, the defendant, having failed to pay the sum found due, was ordered to thenceforth stand absolutely debarred and foreclosed of and from all equity of redemption of, in and to the said mortgaged hereditaments.

The defendant refused to give up possession of the mortgaged hereditaments, and on the 17th of November, 1882, the plaintiff served him with notice of motion, under Order XLII. rule 3, for a writ of possession, to be directed to the sheriff of Yorkshire, to deliver possession to the plaintiff.

The question arose whether an ordinary foreclosure judgment, although admittedly a judgment for recovery of land, was a judgment for the possession of land, and, as such, enforceable under Order XLII. rule 3, which says that "a judgment for the recovery or for the delivery of the possession of land may be enforced by writ of possession."

Wiglesworth, for the plaintiff.—It is true that, before the Judicature Acts, to enforce a foreclosure decree against a defendant refusing to deliver up possession an action of ejectment must have been brought; but the foreclosure decree, even at that time, was a decree which affected the possession of the land—Heath v. Pugh (1) and Harlock v. Ashberry (2).

In Harlock v. Ashberry (2) Jessel, M.R., observes that the Court was bound, by the decision of Heath v. Pugh (1), to hold that a foreclosure action was an action for the recovery of land, and so holds in his judgment. It is submitted that since the Judicature Acts a second action, in the nature of a common law action, is no longer necessary to enforce the judgment of the Court, and also that Order XLII. rule 3, was framed to meet this particular case.

I, moreover, submit that the Court has power, under the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24, sub-s. 3, to give ancillary relief and make this order.

The defendant did not appear.

CHITTY, J., said that a foreclosure action, although held to be an action for the recovery of land, was not an action for the recovery of the possession of land within the meaning of the rule in question. Had there been a judgment in so many terms for the recovery of possession of the mortgaged property, the plaintiff would have been within the words of the rule, and would, no doubt, have been entitled to enforce judgment by the means appointed by the rule. The effect, however, of a simple foreclosure judgment was merely to bar the equity of redemption. To accede to the present application would be to make an ancillary judgment on motion.

Wood v. Wheater.

Possibly, in future, it might be an advantageous course in every foreclosure action to add a claim for possession; but whether this was so or not, or, if this was the proper course, whether such a claim could be joined without leave of the Court, under Order XVII. rule 2, he was not prepared then to decide. The motion would be dismissed.

No order as to costs.

This was an appeal from a decision of Fry, J. By an agreement dated the 30th of August, 1879, W. P. V. Wallis contracted to sell to J. M. Smith an estate of about ninety-five acres, at Norwood, for the price of 70,000*l.*; which sum J. M. Smith was to expend in laying out and making the necessary roads and drains for the estate; in manufacturing bricks, tiles and terra-cotta out of the clay on the estate, not only for the houses to be erected on the estate, but for sale; and in erecting houses on the estate, subject to the terms and conditions therein contained. The following were the material clauses of the agreement:—

1. That the agreement should form the basis of two contracts to be prepared between the parties, if found necessary, one for the sale of the land by Wallis, and the other for the construction of the works by Smith.

5. A deposit of 5,000*l.* was to be paid by Smith as follows: 500*l.* on the execution of the contract, and 4,500*l.* on or before the 31st of March, 1880—such sums to be paid to a deposit account with the London and County Bank, in the joint names of Wallis and Smith, such amount being a deposit on the 70,000*l.*, the purchase-money of the estate.

6. On the execution of the agreement, and upon payment of the said sum of 500*l.*, part of the said deposit of 5,000*l.*, Wallis was to give Smith possession of such portions of the estate as might be necessary for carrying out the contract, and Smith was to obtain plans and commence the works, which were to be completed in ten years. . . .

7. So soon as Smith had spent a sum equal to 5,000*l.* on the works, he was to receive back the deposit lodged by him in the bank. The 70,000*l.* was to be expended by Smith in carrying on the works until the whole were completed.

8. After the deposit of 500*l.* had been paid the title of Wallis was to be investigated, and, if he was unable to make a good title, Smith was to receive back his deposit of 500*l.*, and in addition Wallis was to pay him 5,000*l.* as liquidated damages.

25. If Smith should commit a substantial breach of the contract, either in not proceeding with due diligence to carry out and complete the works, or in failing to perform any of the provisions therein contained, then, and in either of the said events, the deposit money of 5,000*l.*, whether expended on the estate or not, was to be forfeited; and if the balance of such deposit had not then been paid, then Smith should forfeit and pay a sum of money equal to such balance: the intention being that if default was made by Smith as aforesaid, he should forfeit and pay to Wallis by way of liquidated damages the sum of 5,000*l.*, and the agreement should be void and of no effect; but in estimating such 5,000*l.*, credit was to be given for all moneys expended by Smith upon the works other than the plant, and Wallis should not be called upon to pay or give any compensation or satisfaction for any moneys expended by Smith on the said estate in pursuance of the contract: the object and intention being that Wallis, upon such event happening, should have, and if necessary retake, possession of the estate with all buildings and works erected thereon discharged from the contract without any interference on the part of Smith; but such breach was not to be the consequence of a misconstruction of the language or meaning of any of the provisions of the contract.

26. If Wallis should fail to fulfil any of the conditions or stipulations of the contract, or should hinder Smith in the performance of any of the stipulations of the contract, or do any act prejudicial to the carrying out of the contract, Smith should be entitled to take possession of the whole of the estate without any further payment of purchase-money.

On the execution of this agreement Smith not only did not pay the 500*l.*, part of the 5,000*l.* deposit, but took no steps whatever to carry into effect any of the stipulations of the contract. Thereupon Wallis brought this action, claiming the payment of 5,000*l.* as liquidated damages, or, in the event of the Court deciding that that sum was a penalty, such damages as he might be found entitled to.

Smith, by his statement of defence, alleged that he had been induced to enter into the agreement by the misrepresentations of Wallis; and, by his counterclaim, asked that the agreement might be set aside and cancelled.

At the trial of the action, Fry, J., held that there had been no misrepresentation; that upon the true construction of the agreement the 5,000*l.* to be paid under clause 25 was liquidated damages, not a penalty; and accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

JESSEL, M.R.—This appeal raises a question of very considerable difficulty, and one as to which it is not impossible that learned Judges may in future differ, as Judges have differed in times past. The case was opened, if I may say so, with the greatest fairness. The appellant's counsel, Mr. Macnaghten, said that if there were no authorities to be cited the meaning of the agreement is plain, and I agree with him. The only question we have to decide is, whether the authorities compel us to construe this agreement in an extraordinary or non-natural sense contrary to the plain meaning of the words. Of course, if cases have laid down a rule that in certain events words are to have a particular meaning, it may be assumed that persons in framing their agreements have had regard to the settled law, and have purposely used words which, though on the face of them may have a different meaning, they know by reason of the decided cases must bear a particular or special meaning; and therefore we have really to consider whether there are cases which lay down any such rule making a settled law in the sense of being binding on this Court. The agreement in question is an agreement of a peculiar kind. It is a sort of partnership between the plaintiff Mr. Wallis, and the defendant, Mr. Smith. It is dated in August, 1879, and contains some very special provisions, of which the 5th, the 6th and the 25th clauses are the most important. [His Lordship read them and continued:] The 25th clause is the one upon which the question turns; and the first question of construction is—Does or does not that clause apply to the non-payment of the 500*l.* deposit, which is of some importance in considering the effect of the decided cases? It appears to me it does not. I never give a very confident opinion on questions of construction of ambiguous instruments; but I think the fair meaning of the clause is this—that the deposit of 500*l.* is contemplated to be paid on the execution of the contract, and the idea did not seem to occur to the parties that it would not be paid. It was not, in fact, paid. Therefore we find that what is to be forfeited is the deposit money: that is what it means; and if the balance of the deposit has not been paid—that means the balance of the 5,000*l.* after providing the 500*l.*—then a sum equal to that balance. It contemplates it being paid in any event. It appears to me, therefore, that the parties did not contemplate the non-payment of the 500*l.* There is another observation to be made about the 500*l.*, assuming that construction is not right. It has been observed that the non-payment of the 500*l.* on account of the deposit prevents the 6th clause coming into operation, so that Smith cannot take possession and proceed with the works. How can you ascertain the damage? It is not merely the non-payment of the 500*l.* on the deposit account, but the prevention of the works being proceeded with. It does not appear to me to be very easy to ascertain the damages. In the next place, is it a proper deposit? That, again, is a question which has arisen in many of the cases. It appears to me it is. It is a deposit in part payment of the nominal purchase-money. It is a deposit in joint names—which, no doubt, in one sense, is not putting it out of the power of Smith; but in another sense it is. The moment you put it in joint names it is out of his power, though the other party cannot deal with it without his consent. It is a security for the performance of the agreement. Then, again, is it true that the 25th clause lasts for the ten years so as to forfeit the deposit. It appears to me it does not. The balance of the deposit was contemplated to be paid on the 31st of March then next, the agreement being in August, and it is then to be laid out on the works. It is clear there is no forfeiture after that, because in estimating the 5,000*l.* credit is to be given for all moneys expended. The moment the 5,000*l.* is expended there is no deposit to forfeit. It is quite true the agreement has been put an end to, and that that destroys the right of Smith to get back his money; but it is no longer a forfeiture in any other sense of the word. Then, again, there is this to be said—the non-payment of the 500*l.* also avoids the agreement. If it is included in the forfeiture clause, that is not a single event of the non-payment of money, but it is a double event of non-payment of the money and the avoidance of the agreement. It appears to me, therefore, that we have in this case two elements: the one is, that there is no single event as to which the damages can be certainly ascertained; the other is, that the agreement has no relation to a real payment within the terms of the various decisions. Now I have to consider (and I am afraid at some length) what the decisions are. I think they may be classed in this way. There is a series of decisions beginning—I do not say actually beginning, but beginning for this purpose—with Astley v. Weldon (4), which purports to be founded on older authority, and ending with the case in the Appeal Court of In re Newman (8), in which this has been determined—that where a sum of money is stated to be payable either by way of liquidated damages or by way of penalty for breach of stipulations, all or some of which are, or one of which is, for the non-payment of a sum of money of less amount, that is really as penalty, and you can only recover the actual damage, and the Court will not sever the stipulations. If any one of the stipulations is for the non-payment of the sum of money of less amount, then the proviso is bad. The ground of that doctrine I do not know. The ground stated by the Judges in two or three of the cases is this: They say it was an extension to the common law of well-known doctrine of equity. I do know a little of equity, but I am sorry to say I cannot assent to the correctness or accuracy of the statement that it is an extension of the common law well-known doctrine. However, that is the ground put by the Judges. Another ground may be put—I do not find it put anywhere, but it may be put; and there are some expressions which, though I do not say they amount to what I am about to say, tend that way—and that is the well-known doctrine that in the construction of written instruments you may depart from the literal meaning of the words if reading the words literally leads you to an absurdity. Now it may well be that the Courts thought that it was absurd to make a man pay a larger sum by reason of the non-payment of a smaller. It has always appeared to me that the doctrine of the English law as to the non-payment of money—the general rule being that you cannot recover damages if it is not paid by a certain day—is not quite consistent with reason. A man may be utterly ruined by the non-payment of a sum of money on a given day; the damages may be enormous, and the other party may be wealthy. However, that is our law. If, however, that were not our law, the absurdity would be apparent. I see no reason, apart from our law, why a man may not stipulate, "you shall pay me 500*l.* on a given day." It may be of almost vital importance to him. He may have to deposit it as security for the granting of concessions of enormous value, and the other party may know it. He may have to make a second or a third payment for a stamp on a most valuable patent, and the other party may know he relies upon it. It is not unreasonable, as it appears to me, in those cases to say, "If you do not pay the 500*l.*, or 50*l.* even, on that date, you shall pay 5,000*l.* for the damage I shall sustain." There may be such cases, and many more cases besides those I have given as illustrations. However, the authorities do go to that length. Many of them are old decisions, and one of them is at least the decision of the Court of Appeal. I think we are bound by them, and to that extent, therefore, they govern any case of the same kind.

The next class of cases is this: It is a class of cases in which the amount of damages is not ascertainable per se, but in which the amount of damages for a breach of one or more of the stipulations either must be small, or will, in all human probability, be small. That is where the damages will not of necessity be small, but it is so near a "must," having regard to the probabilities of the case, that the Court will presume it to be so. Then the question in that class of cases is, does the same rule apply? Now upon this there is no decision. There are a great many dicta upon the question on each side. I do not think it is necessary to express a final opinion in this case, but I do say this—that the Court is not bound by the dicta on either side, and the point is open to discussion. It is within the principle, if principle it be, of a larger sum being penalty for non-payment of a smaller sum; but, at the same time, it is also within another class of cases to which I am now going to call attention, and that is the class in which the damages for the breach of each stipulation are unascertainable, or not readily ascertainable, but the stipulations may be of greater or less importance, or they may be of equal importance. There are dicta which seem to say that if they vary much in importance the same principle applies; but there is no decision. All the reported cases are decisions the other way—that is, in all the cases, though the stipulations have varied in importance, the sum has been always treated as liquidated damages.

I now come to the last class of cases. There is a class of cases relating to deposits. Where a deposit is to be forfeited for the breach of a number of stipulations, some of which may be trifling, some of which may be the non-payment of money on a given day—in all these cases the Judges have held that this rule does not apply, and that the bargain of the parties is to be carried out. I think that exhausts the substance of the cases. If, therefore, we apply these rules to the present case, the result will be this—that, according to my construction of the contract, there is no ascertainable definite sum of a less amount than the sum named payable within it, as a single condition—and consequently the decisions on that point do not apply; nor is it (because the words are "substantial breach") a case in which one or more of the stipulations can be treated as trifling, or of trifling importance—therefore those dicta do not apply. But it is a case in which the stipulations vary in importance,—and as the breach must be substantial, and as the amount of damages would be substantial also, I think that the decisions do apply which say that in those cases the sum stipulated is liquidated damages. Lastly, as I said before, those rules do not apply to deposits.

I will now go very shortly through the cases to shew that they do really amount to what I say. The first case is Astley v. Weldon (4). I need not state the facts of the case. There a larger sum was mentioned as penalty or damages for the non-payment of the smaller, one of the sums being a payment of 1*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* a week, and the sum of damages 200*l.* The decision was that that sum could not be treated as liquidated damages, but as penalty. The ground of the decision is put by Lord Eldon, who was then Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, in these words: "What was urged in the course of the argument has ever appeared to me to be the clearest principle—namely, that where a doubt is stated whether the sum inserted be intended as a penalty or not, if a certain damage less than that sum is made payable upon the face of the same instrument in case the act intended to be prohibited be done, that sum shall be construed to be a penalty." Now, "certain damage" is used there by Lord Eldon in this sense, that by English law the sum not paid at a given day, as a general rule, was merely the amount to be paid. There were certain cases under commercial law where it also included interest, but that was all. Therefore it is certain damage, because that is the English law; and the principle is, if a certain damage occurs that sum is made payable on the face of it. That he states to be the principle. It is a very limited principle. Then he goes on to another principle which, as he was familiar with equity law, he does not state as equity. He says (p. 353), "a principle has been said to have been stated in several cases, the adoption of which one cannot but lament—namely, that if the sum would be very enormous and excessive considered as liquidated damages, it shall be taken to be a penalty, though agreed to be paid in the form of contract." Then he goes on to say, "With respect to the case of Hardy v. Martin (21), I do not understand why one brandy merchant, who purchases the lease and goodwill of a shop from another, may not make it a matter of agreement that if the vendor trade in brandy within a certain distance he shall pay 600*l.*; and why the party violating such agreement should not be bound to pay the sum agreed for—though if such agreement be entered into in the form of a bond with a penalty, it may perhaps make a difference." He does not forget the statute of Will. 3. Then he goes into the case itself, and shews that the breach might be 1*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* a week, but of course would make the defendant liable for 200*l.* That is the whole substance of the judgment of Lord Eldon. He perfectly well knew that whatever had been the doctrine of equity at one time, it was not then the doctrine of equity to give relief because agreements were oppressive where the parties were of full age and at arms' length. It is very likely, and I believe it is true historically, that the doctrine of equity did arise from a general notion that these acts were oppressive; but, long before his time, it had been well settled in equity that equity did relieve from forfeiture for non-payment of money, and I think I may say, in modern times, from nothing else. There were old cases to relieve from all sorts of things. Relief against a penalty might be for the non-payment of 1*l.* on a given day, or it might be a forfeiture for a condition broken in the case of a mortgage, or it might be the non-payment of money in the case of purchase, or it might be the non-payment of money in the case of rent with a proviso of re-entry. Now we come to the next judgment in the same case, which is the first instance of a dictum of a different character. Mr. Justice Heath says this: "It is very difficult to lay down any general principle in cases of this kind, but I think there is one which may be safely stated. Where articles contain covenants for the performance of several things, and then one large sum is stated at the end to be paid upon breach of performance, that must be considered as a penalty." That cannot be right, because it would include covenants for the performance of several things of equal value. I am not at all certain that Mr. Justice Heath intended to lay down any such general proposition. Then he goes to the rule—"It is a well-known rule in equity that if a mortgage covenant be to pay 5*l.* per cent., and if the interest be paid on certain days then to be reduced to 4*l.* per cent., the Court of Chancery will not relieve if the early day be suffered to pass without payment; but if the covenant be to pay 4*l.* per cent., and if the party do not pay at a certain time it shall be raised to 5*l.* per cent., then the Court of Chancery will relieve." It was settled so early as that. I am sorry it was so settled, because anything more irrational than that doctrine I think can hardly be stated. It chiefly depended on form and not on substance. Then Mr. Justice Rooke says, "The determination of the Court in construing this instrument must be guided by the intention of the parties. Now it appears very clearly from the stipulation that small sums of money should be paid in certain cases, that the parties considered the larger sum as a penalty." He confines his judgment, therefore, to the same point as Lord Eldon; and so does Mr. Justice Chambre, who says, "There is one case in which the sum agreed for must always be considered as a penalty, and that is where the payment of a smaller sum is secured by a larger." Then he goes on to say you cannot sever the covenants, and so forth. I have gone into that case rather minutely, because it is, I may say, the foundation of the subsequent cases on the subject. The next case, which is one of the greatest importance, is Kemble v. Farren (18), which has always been treated as a leading authority on the subject. I will not give a very positive opinion as to what the whole of that judgment means. I say so because very eminent Judges have taken very different views of the judgment, and therefore I suppose it is more ambiguous than it appears to me to be. But one thing is clear, that Chief Justice Tindal, in giving the opinion of the full Court, put an end, seems to be that if you find a covenant the breach of which will occasion a damage, not uncertain, but such as is capable of being ascertained, as where there is a particular sum to be paid which is much less than the sum named as payable on the breach, there it is held that the last-named sum is specified by way of penalty, because a Court of equity would limit the amount to be actually paid. Then comes the case where there are several provisions, the breach of some of which will produce an ascertainable damage, but the breach of others an uncertain damage. In that case (though we do not require to determine it now), inasmuch as there is one provision in respect of which the sum named cannot be taken as liquidated damages, it cannot be so taken for any provision, for if it could, the contract would mean liquidated damages in one case and not in another. If you look in the judgment of Chief Justice Tindal and Mr. Baron Parke, they seem rather to contemplate the case where all the provisions are of one kind. Mr. Baron Parke says, 'If there be a contract consisting of one or more stipulations the breach of which'—meaning, I think, of each of which—'cannot be measured, then the parties must be taken to have meant that the sum agreed on was to be liquidated damages, not a penalty. On this principle, if there were no more in the covenant than what I have read, this would be clearly a case of liquidated damages.'" There is a dictum of Lord Chief Justice Coleridge in Magee v. Lavell (13). He says, "The general principle of law appears to me to be, that where a contract contains a variety of stipulations of different degrees of importance, and one large sum is stated at the end to be paid on breach of performance of any of them, that must be considered as a penalty." That is a dictum which is not supported by any decision, and it appears to me to be quite irreconcilable with principle. It is exactly opposed to what Lord Chief Justice Tindal says in Kemble v. Farren (18). The mere fact of the stipulations varying in importance cannot shew that the parties did not fix a sum where the damage is not ascertainable; but I am bound to say that though that is my opinion, and that I should have thought it was quite clear, I find that in the case of In re Newman (8), a decision of the Court of Appeal, that dictum is approved of. In the first place, Lord Justice James says, "The authority of Kemble v. Farren (18) cannot be considered as having been in any degree nibbled away by those cases before Lord Wensleydale which have been referred to, and which, it is said, shew that the principle of Kemble v. Farren (18) is to be confined to a case in which, amongst other stipulations, there was one stipulation for the payment of a sum of money. That was not the ratio decidendi of Kemble v. Farren (18), in which it was laid down in broad terms that wherever there is a sum mentioned at the end of a contract as damages for the non-performance of any of a great number of stipulations, there it must be treated as a penalty." With the greatest possible deference to Lord Justice James, the very contrary was laid down in express terms. There is some mistake about it, that is all I can say. Then he refers to the decision of Mr. Justice Heath in Astley v. Weldon (4), which was overruled, and which was obviously, in my opinion, wrong. With regard to what Lord Chief Justice Coleridge says in Magee v. Lavell (13), I have this observation to make—it was only a dictum, and a dictum during the argument. I distrust dicta in all cases, and especially dicta during argument. I must say, however, that in In re Newman (8) Lord Justice Bramwell intimated his agreement with it, although, as I have already said, there is not only no decision to be found laying down such a doctrine, but it is really opposed to several judgments, including the two I have cited. Then Lord Justice Bramwell refers to two cases, one of which is Galsworthy v. Strutt (15), which is a decision in favour of liquidated damages where there was more than one stipulation. The other case is Atkyns v. Kinnier (16), which is a decision in favour of the same view; so that we have not only dicta opposed to dicta, but we have decisions opposed to decisions. As I said before—although I wish to leave the question open where there are several stipulations, and one or more is or are of such a character that the damages must be small—I do not wish for a moment to abstain from stating my opinion that there is no such doctrine where there are several stipulations, though they may not be of equal importance, or where there are several stipulations irrespective of importance, which is the doctrine laid down by Mr. Justice Heath, and apparently approved of by Lord Justice James. There is neither authority nor principle for any such doctrine, and I cannot see that it is established by any case which is binding on this Court. I am not one of those who think that a long course of judicial decision can be set aside by any other Court. As regards the doctrine of Astley v. Weldon (4), I think it is technically binding. There is not only the decision of the Court of Appeal, but there is also the decision of the Court of Exchequer. But independently of that, if I find a long course of decisions by inferior Courts acquiesced in, which have all become part of the settled law and have got into the text-books, I do not think it is the province of the Appeal Court, after a long course of time, to interfere, because most contracts have been regulated by those decisions; but where that is not the case, where the dicta are, as they are in this case, not only contradictory, but those dicta which are in favour of the appellant are modern as compared with the older dicta, then I think it is not right to say that the law is settled by the Superior Courts. There is another consideration which always has weight with me—when the law is settled, it gets into the text-books, which are a very considerable guide to practitioners.

In the last edition of Mr. Mayne's valuable book on Damages, at page 128, he cites the dicta of Mr. Justice Heath, and he says, "This, however, must be limited to cases where it is apparent that the parties could not have intended the entire sum to be the ascertained damages or any breach." So that he treats the law as settled just the other way. I do not cite that as an authority; I only cite it to shew that the law is not treated in the text-books as being settled, notwithstanding the dicta either of Mr. Justice Heath or of Mr. Justice Chambre as approved by Lord Justice James.

I think it necessary to say so much, because I have always thought, and still think, that it is of the utmost importance, as regards contracts between adults—persons not under disability and at arms' length—that the Courts of law should maintain the performance of the contracts according to the intention of the parties; that they should not overrule any clearly expressed intention, on the ground that Judges know the business of the people better than the people knew it themselves. I am perfectly well aware there are exceptions, but they are exceptions of a legislative character. One notable exception was the usury law, now repealed, to prevent people bargaining as to the rate of interest they would pay for the loan of money. There have been many other laws in modern times, such as the Factory Acts and the Mines Regulations Acts, but they are all statutes. Judges have no right to say that people shall not perform their contracts which they have entered into deliberately, and put a different meaning on the contracts from that which the parties intend. In this case we have a very striking illustration. The contract in question was most carefully prepared. The plaintiff is or was a solicitor, the defendant had the assistance of a solicitor and, I am told, also of counsel; but whether counsel presided at the final framing of the document I am by no means certain, there being contradictory statements on that point. But it was a most deliberate and carefully drawn instrument, and one which I think ought to be construed according to the plain meaning of its words. I am glad to find that I do not feel myself compelled to decide contrary to what is the plain meaning of the terms by any of the decisions. In my opinion, the decision of Mr. Justice Fry is right, and ought to affirmed.

COTTON, L.J.—In this case, what we have to decide is, whether the Judge of the Court below was right in giving the plaintiff the sum of 5,000*l.*, without reference to the damage he had in fact sustained. That depends on the question, what, having regard to the cases, is the effect of the contract between the parties. The 25th clause, which is the important clause, in its terms, expressly says that the 5,000*l.* shall be paid by way of liquidated damages on any breach of the covenants contained in the contract, and in terms of course that means that it shall be taken as the sum which the parties have by the contract assessed as the damages to be paid, whatever may be the actual damages. But we are not at liberty to construe this without reference to the decided cases: and the question which we have to consider is, whether, having regard to the decided cases, we ought to disregard the terms of this contract and to say that, although in terms it says the sum of 5,000*l.* shall be liquidated damages, it is to be looked upon as an agreement between the parties that that should be a penalty, and that the real damage sustained is all that is to be recovered by the plaintiff.

Now, I think it is not for us now to enquire into or question whether the Courts were right originally in the decisions which have been so much commented upon. There they are; and, in my opinion, it would be wrong for us to question those decisions or to act (whatever one's own views might be) contrary to that course of decision, even if they were not (as they are in some of the cases) decisions by a Court of Appeal and of equal authority to ours; but I must say that I quite agree with the Master of the Rolls that the sounder view to take is this—to leave persons who are competent and under no disability to make their own contracts, and then to act on those contracts, whatever the true interpretation might be, without assuming on behalf of the Court, either at law or equity, to say: "This is unreasonable, and we will make another and different contract between the parties — they did not mean what they have said in their contracts." But, with regard to the present case, there are decisions which lay down what the cases have frequently said are rules for ascertaining what is the construction of the instrument, and in applying those one must look (and I think that is not immaterial in the present case) to the whole contract. Now, I need not enter into the question of those cases where a sum has been mentioned as liquidated damages for the breach of one covenant. Here there are a number of covenants to which clause 25 applies, and in respect of the breach of which it is said that the 5,000*l.* shall be liquidated damages. Now, in what cases have the Courts said that in those circumstances you shall construe the words "liquidated damages" not what they mean—as a sum assessed between the parties—but only as a penal sum, leaving the real damages to be ascertained. Undoubtedly the cases do say this, that when a stipulation applies to a breach of a number of covenants, and one of these is a covenant for the payment of a sum of money, where the damages for the breach of it is according to English law capable of being actually defined, then where a sum is said to be liquidated damages the stipulation applies, not distributively to the different covenants, but equally to all, and you must hold that that sum cannot be damages assessed by the parties, as in the case of a particular covenant to which the stipulation refers and in respect of which the damages are incapable of being ascertained and are by law fixed in a different way; but you must look upon it as a mere penalty, and ascertain when the breach occurs what is the damage sustained in respect of the particular breach. But, in my opinion, that does not apply to the present case; the only case to which it could possibly apply would be the non-payment of the sum of 500*l.* But is that an act to which the 25th clause refers? In my opinion it is not. The 500*l.* was, according to the contract, to be paid on the exchange of the contract; and therefore, in construing this clause, one must consider what would be the course which the parties expected would take place before the contract became operative by being executed and exchanged between the parties; and when one finds that that 500*l.* was to be paid down on the execution of the contract, I think on the fair interpretation of this instrument we should say that the exchange of the contract without that being done, and the non-payment of it at that time, is not a breach contemplated and coming within the fair construction of clause 25. But then it is said on behalf of the appellant that although that is not so, the law authorises us in saying that where the condition applies to the breach of a number of covenants contained in the instrument, that will justify the Court in construing the instrument contrary to the words contained in it, or rather in giving to those words a meaning contrary to their primary and ordinary signification. Now there is no case where it has been held that the mere fact that there are a number of covenants to which the stipulation applies is sufficient to justify such a construction; and I do not see on what possible ground it should be said that if there are a number of important covenants contained in the contract, and none of those is of such a nature that the damages arising from a breach can be accurately ascertained, the parties may not reasonably fix beforehand an ascertained sum for the purpose of saying what shall be the damages. It is said, indeed (and no doubt there is a dictum to support it), that the Court will apply to the words "liquidated damages" a meaning other than their primary meaning where the covenants to which the clause applies are of a varied nature—that is to say, where some of them are presumably of greater importance and some of less. No doubt there is a dictum of Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, which has been referred to, which favours that view; but, in my opinion, there is certainly no case so decided; and, in my opinion, it would be contrary to the principle of the decided cases. It is not sufficient, in my opinion, to say that the covenants, to the breach of which this clause applies, are of varying importance. That may be so, but yet the parties may very reasonably come to a conclusion that they will agree between themselves that the sum mentioned shall be assessed between them as the damage in consequence of the breaches of those various covenants. Probably there may be an exception, that where some of the covenants are of such a character that obviously the damage which can possibly arise from any breach of them would be insignificant compared with the sum which has been fixed by the parties, that there the Court will give the non-natural construction to the terms used by the parties. In my opinion that comes within the same principle as where the Courts have interfered where one of the covenants has been for payment of a sum of money where the damage is capable of being assessed accurately, and may be very much below the sum mentioned. The Court is not called upon to decide it now; but I must say for myself that I incline to saying that the cases do justify us, by following them out to their reasonable conclusion, in saying that in such a case, namely, where there are various covenants, to the breach of which this clause applies, and some of them are of such a small nature that the damages will presumably be very small—obviously and necessarily must be small—that then the Court, whatever language the parties may have used, will say, "This is not damage assessed for the breach of all these covenants, but upon the breach of any of them. The real damage is to be ascertained, and paid, the sum stipulated for liquidated damages being looked upon as a penalty only." I think that was the way in which Lord Justice Bramwell intended to deal with the case in which it had been said by Lord Wensleydale that the Court would only interfere where one covenant to which the clause referred was a covenant the damages for breach of which were capable of being accurately fixed as a covenant for payment of money, and that in other cases the Court would not interfere. That, I think, was what Lord Justice Bramwell was meaning to refer to. Although there are dicta of Judges that where the covenants are of varying importance the Court might treat the sum, not as liquidated damages, but as a penalty, I think, when fairly considered, they refer to the cases which come under the exception to which I have referred—namely, where some covenants are of so unimportant a character, or relate to matters of so unimportant a character, that it would be unreasonable to suppose that the parties could have intended to have assessed or fix a sum as liquidated damages for the breach of those trivial or unimportant covenants. I think the doctrine, as I understand it, is really laid down by Chief Justice Tindal in Kemble v. Farren (18). No doubt the point to which I am now referring did not actually arise, but I think one would be wrong in disregarding the opinion expressed by Judges, especially those of great learning, in deciding cases, even although some of their expressions were not necessary or applicable to the case before them.

They lay down the principle, even although in laying it down they may go (as possibly we are doing in the present case) beyond the exigencies of the case before them. What he says is this: "In the present case the clause is not confined"—that is to one particular point—"it extends to the breach of any stipulation by either party. If, therefore, on the one hand, the plaintiff had neglected to make a single payment of 3*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* per day, or, on the other hand, the defendant had refused to conform to any usual regulation of the theatre, however minute or unimportant, it must have been contended that the clause in question in either case would have given the stipulated damages of 1,000*l.* But that a very large sum should become immediately payable in consequence of the non-payment of a very small sum, and that the former should not be considered as a penalty, appears to be a contradiction in terms." He evidently considers it would be unreasonable to hold that the large sum of 1,000*l.* had been agreed upon and assessed between the parties as damage to be recovered for the breach of the regulations of the theatre, however minute and unimportant. That really, as I understand it, seems to contain the doctrine of the cases. Now here, can it be said that this clause refers to the breach of covenants of a minute or trivial character, or to covenants the damages for which must be, or obviously will be, small? In my opinion it cannot be so said. There was a contract to enter into a great speculation, and, of course, one knows that where land is laid out for building, it is very important that there should be no delay, if the public are taking to the property and if there is a demand for houses. Then this 25th clause says that there must be a substantial breach. The clause as to the forfeiture or payment of the sum only applies if there is a substantial breach with reference to the demand by the public, or by failure to perform any of the provisions therein contained. In my opinion, if there are (and I do not think there are) clauses which would be said to be of so trivial importance that the damage arising from a breach would be unimportant, that stipulation as to a "substantial breach," in my opinion, prevents the exception which I have mentioned from arising in this case. We simply have a condition for payment of a sum of money applying to the breach of a number of covenants, and, in my opinion, neither the cases nor any fair deduction from the cases justify us in saying that in such a case the words "liquidated damages" are not to have their proper meaning as damages agreed between the parties. But, really, we are considering cases which only are to give a canon of construction having regard to the whole of the provisions of the instrument, and I think there are other clauses in this contract which are worthy of consideration. For instance, clause 8 provides that in certain events the plaintiff should pay a sum of 5,000*l.* liquidated damages. That is applicable to one event only—namely, not making out a good title. It would hardly be argued that in that case the 5,000*l.* was to be considered, not as damage assessed by the parties, but as a mere penalty, and I think one might fairly have regard to that in considering the case. In my opinion, therefore, having regard to the cases and the contract, Mr. Justice Fry was right in not trying to ascertain what damage had been sustained by the plaintiff, and in giving him an ascertained fixed sum of 5,000*l.*

LINDLEY, L.J.—I also have come to the same conclusion, though, I need hardly say, not without difficulty, because all these cases are cases of difficulty. The difficulty arises from this—that there are certain rules of law which, when they apply, prevent the Court giving effect to the language used by the parties themselves, in which they have expressed what one must suppose to have been their intention at the time. However, those rules, so far as they are settled, have been followed, and the difficulty arises in exactly understanding them and understanding the principles upon which they rest. What we have to deal with here is clause 25 in this agreement, which I will not read again, but I will make one or two observations upon it. In the first place, the operation of the whole agreement is restricted by two clauses in it. It is restricted to a substantial breach, and there must be a substantial breach. What that means perhaps is not very clear, but it means, I suppose, a breach of some importance, or a breach for which more than nominal damages—substantial damages—would be recoverable but for the liquidated damage clause. The operation of the clause is further restricted by the proviso at the end, that the breach on the happening of which these damages are to be paid is not to be the consequence of misconstruction of the language or meaning of any of the provisions of the contract; therefore, in order that the clause may apply at all, you must have first of all a substantial breach, and then a substantial breach not the consequence of a misconstruction of the meaning of the provisions of the contract. That limits the operation of the clause, and relieves us from the difficulty of considering what the proper mode would be of applying it to what I may call trivial, or accidental, or inadvertent breaches. They are swept out by the language of the clause itself, and to my mind that becomes important. So far as the language goes the intention of the parties seems tolerably plain. The events are specified, and the 5,000*l.* is to be paid as liquidated damages; but, notwithstanding that, the point arises as to whether this clause, properly construed, does apply to one event—namely, the non-payment of the 500*l.*, part of the deposit money; because if, on the true construction of this clause, it did apply to the non-payment of the small sum of 500*l.*, then the doctrine of Kemble v. Farren (18) would be directly applicable, as I understand it. Although at first I thought that was the true construction, I am now satisfied that on the construction of this clause it does not. The clause takes it for granted that that payment had been made, and it was never intended to apply to the non-payment of a sum which was to be contemporaneous with the execution of the document itself. I think, therefore, on the true construction, that the non-payment of 500*l.*, part of the deposit, is not a substantial breach within this clause, even if it is a breach at all, which I doubt, having regard to the language of it. That difficulty being got rid of, Kemble v. Farren (18) does not apply. We are then reduced to this—that there is a stipulation for payment by Smith to Wallis of the sum of 5,000*l.* by way of liquidated damages upon any substantial breach by Smith of that agreement. We have to consider whether that is to be treated as liquidated damages—that is to say, as meaning what it says—or as a penalty which, as now understood, means nothing at all, or next to nothing. In order to determine that, we must look a little into the authorities. Now the authorities have been carefully examined, and there are only one or two to which I will advert; but they all seem to go on the principle that the object is to ascertain the intention of the parties. You are to ascertain the intention of the parties by what they said—that is plain enough—but you are to ascertain the intention of the parties not only by what they said, but by what the Court sees to be the consequence, and by what the Court may or may not consider to be absurd or oppressive—oppressive in former times, at all events. Take the common case of a money bond—it meant what it said. Take the ordinary case to pay 5,000*l.*, if 500*l.* was not paid by the day named—the parties meant what they said; but that has long ceased to have operation. Whether relief is given on the theory of oppression, or on the theory that the parties could not have meant what they said—that it was too absurd—or whether relief was given by reason of the usury laws, I do not know—it is an antiquarian research which I have not prosecuted; but it has long been settled that where a person agrees to pay a large sum if he does not pay a small one, he does not mean what he says, and the contract is not to have the effect that one would suppose it was intended to have. When we come to look a little further we find, at all events, that that principle pervades a great number of the cases with regard to liquidated damages. With the single exception of the case I shall refer to presently—Betts v. Burch (5)—I think that in all the cases which have been referred to—at all events, all into which I have looked—in which large sums have been held as penalty as distinguished from liquidated damages, it is stipulated that a large sum should be paid, amongst other things, on non-payment of a smaller one. That was so in In re Newman (8). There 1,000*l.* was to be paid in the event of the non-payment of 10*l.* a week. Therefore these cases are brought within the principle that relief is given in the event of the stipulation for payment of a large sum in default of paying a small sum. The moment we arrive at the conclusion that the 25th clause does not apply to the 500*l.* deposit, we are driven to the consideration of that class of cases in which the larger sum is to be paid on one or more breaches, and the amount of damages sustained is not mentioned and cannot be ascertained. Now, certainly there are to be found in the books a great number of dicta, which are to the effect that if the larger sum is stipulated to be paid in one of many events (I think there is one case which goes as far as that), then the larger sum is to be treated as penalty and not as liquidated damages. The dicta as found elsewhere are more modified, to the effect that if a larger sum is to be paid in one or more of many events in which the damage can be seen to be small or trivial, the sum is to be treated as penalty and not as liquidated damages. But, when I come to look at the cases, I cannot find a single case in which the larger sum has been treated as penalty where there has been no smaller sum ascertainable as the amount of damages. The nearest approach to it is the case of Betts v. Burch (5), and I shall refer to that because it was decided by Lord Justice Bramwell, whose familiarity with the subject is unquestionable. In order to understand Betts v. Burch (5) it is necessary to observe that the larger sum there, the 50*l.*, would have been payable not only in the event of the non-payment of the whole, but on non-payment of the last pound of the price; and the judgment of Baron Martin proceeds entirely upon this. The agreement was this. The plaintiff agreed to sell, and the defendant to purchase, the household furniture, fixtures, stock-in-trade and effects in and upon the premises by valuation in the usual way; the goods to be valued and possession given on or before the 13th of October, 1858; and in the event of the plaintiff or defendant not complying with every particular set forth in the said agreement, the defaulter should forfeit and pay to the other party the sum of 50*l.*, and all expenses attending the same. Then Baron Martin says (p. 509)—and this is the ratio decidendi—"The plaintiffs' counsel have established that the same construction must be put on the agreement for both parties. Now, as that is so, it would follow, if the construction contended for on the part of the plaintiff were to prevail, that if a very small part of the price were unpaid, the defaulter would be liable to the penalty of 50*l.* The cases are too strong, and I am bound to say that this is a penalty." Taking the view of Baron Martin, the 50*l.* would be payable even though 1*l.* might be unpaid in respect of the price, which would bring it within Kemble v. Farren (18) and that class of cases. One must bear that in mind in reading Baron Bramwell's judgment; and I think if one does bear that in mind, it will be found that there is nothing which really conflicts with the view taken in Kemble v. Farren (18). I refer to that case the more because Baron Bramwell adopted it in the case of Sparrow v. Paris (20), in which he said that the larger sum was payable in one event and not in several; but in Sparrow v. Paris (20) it was not necessary for him to discuss what would have been payable if the larger sum had been stipulated for in a different form. It was stipulated there to be paid in one event, and it was not necessary to consider how the case would have stood if it had been otherwise stipulated. In In re Newman (8), Lord Justice Bramwell takes the same view. There again, when one looks at the case, the 1,000*l.* was payable in the event of the non-payment of 10*l.*, which is again within Kemble v. Farren (18) and that class of cases. I have adverted to this more particularly because Mr. Justice Willes, in the case of Hinton v. Sparkes (11), says this: "If this agreement had not contained the provision for forfeiture of the deposit on the purchaser's failure to fulfil his part of the contract, we should have been bound to follow the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Betts v. Burch (5). I for one should have done so for the reasons set out in the judgments of Barons Martin and Bramwell, which present as satisfactory and full a view of the cases and of the principles and reasoning applicable to them as is to be found in any book, or indeed in all the books put together, and I will not attempt to add anything to what is found there." We must look at the cases, therefore, with reference to the actual facts before the Court; and we must bear in mind that in Betts v. Burch (5) the 50*l.* was payable even though 1*l.* was unpaid. I cannot find any case (and none has been cited) in which that element has not been found. In this case we cannot find that element at all, unless it is the 500*l.* deposit, which I have already dealt with. There is a large sum stipulated to be paid in a variety of events. What the damages would be on any of these events is not found specified in the agreement, nor can we say that it must be necessarily small or trivial. Under the circumstances, I cannot see my way to say that the clause is not to have the meaning which is the prima facie meaning of the words used; in other words, I do not feel compelled, by the decisions on penalty and liquidated damages, which are perplexing, to say that this is a case of what is called penalty, the practical effect of which is that it does not mean what it says. I am not driven to that; and I come to the conclusion that it does mean what it says, and that, therefore, the view taken by Mr. Justice Fry is right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Election — Parliament — Expenses — Payments by Sub-Agent—Corrupt Practices Act*, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 29), s. 2.

A solicitor engaged by a candidate as a local sub-agent to assist in procuring his election employed canvassers, and paid them out of his own pocket*:—Held, that the payments, not having been made through the expense agent, were illegal under section 2 of the Corrupt Practices Act, 1863, *and could not therefore be recovered from the candidate.

At the general election in 1880, Colonel Surtees was a candidate for the southern division of Durham. He appointed as his central agent a Mr. Watson. Mr. Watson appointed Messrs. Trotter, Bruce & Co. as sub-agents for certain sub-districts, and they employed the appellant Parker, who was a solicitor, to assist them as a local agent. In the exercise of his duties in this capacity, Parker employed runners and canvassers, and paid them for their services.

Upon presenting his account of his charges and disbursements to the expense agent of Colonel Surtees, the payments to runners and canvassers were disallowed. Parker accordingly commenced an action against Colonel Surtees in the District Registry for 113*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, the amount of his bill of costs.

Colonel Surtees obtained a common order to tax the bill under the Solicitors Act, and an order to stay all further proceedings in the action until the result of the taxation was known.

Upon the taxation of the bill the items disallowed by the expense agent were allowed by the Taxing Master; whereupon Colonel Surtees took out a summons to review the taxation, which was adjourned into Court, and heard by Chitty, J., on the 2nd of March, 1882.

Ince, Q.C., and A. T. Watson, for Colonel Surtees.—Parker had no express authority to make these payments; they should have been made through the expense agent—Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1863, sections 2, 3 and 4; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, and Nurton v. Dickson (1).

Macnaghten, Q.C., and Whitaker, for Parker, referred to In re Osborne (2).

Chitty, J., sent the certificate back to the Taxing Master, with directions to disallow the items in question.

From this decision Parker appealed.

Macnaghten, Q.C., and Whitaker, for the appellant.—The proceedings were irregular. The defence of the illegality of the payments ought to have been pleaded in the action. It could not be taken before the Taxing Master.

No election could be conducted without agents paying current expenses out of their own pockets. Such a construction of section 2 of the Act of 1863 is most unreasonable. Parker had authority to employ the canvassers, and therefore he also had authority to pay them.

Disbursements such as these are not intended to be paid by the expense agent —Nurton v. Dickson (1). There was an implied contract by Colonel Surtees to repay Parker all his current disbursements in the ordinary course of the agency.

Ince, Q.C., and A. T. Watson, for the respondent, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R.—In this case the facts are of no great complexity. At the last election of Parliament Colonel Surtees was a candidate for South Durham; the appellant Mr. Parker was one of his sub-agents or district agents, and as his sub-agent had the ordinary right to pledge the credit of Colonel Surtees for money expended in the performance of his sub-agency. Mr. Parker employed canvassers and paid them out of his own pocket. He brought an action against Colonel Surtees for his disbursements in the District Registry, and after the action was brought Colonel Surtees obtained the common order to tax his bill, and then obtained an order in the action to stay proceedings until the taxation was completed. That order has not been appealed from, and must be taken on this appeal to be a good and binding order. Then Mr. Parker brought in his bill of fees and disbursements, in which he claims all moneys paid out of his own pocket as the agent of Colonel Surtees. If he is allowed these payments at all it must be on the ground that they were payments made on behalf of Colonel Surtees, which Colonel Surtees was liable to pay.

The first point raised on behalf of the appellant was that by reason of the action having been brought in the District Registry, and having been stayed at the instance of Colonel Surtees, it is not open to Colonel Surtees to contend in the taxation proceedings that the disbursements in question were not made on his behalf, and that he was not liable to pay them by reason of their illegality under the Act of 1863. I am at a loss to understand this objection. The matter comes before us on the application by Colonel Surtees to tax his solicitor's bill; the action is not before us in any way. We have nothing to do with it. Whether the order to stay proceedings was right or wrong does not concern us on the present appeal; we have only to consider on this order to tax the propriety of allowing or disallowing certain items. It is admitted and cannot be denied that in his bill of costs a solicitor may make charges for ordinary payments which he has made on behalf of his client; and the question we have to decide is, whether the charges complained of in the present case were properly made, exactly as if no action at all had been brought. Therefore this objection is not sustainable.

With respect to the second and principal question, it is admitted that there was no express authority from Colonel Surtees to make these payments; but it is alleged that there was an implied authority. Was there any such implied authority to pledge his principal's credit for these payments? The answer is, that even assuming that in the absence of the Act of 1863 authority might have been implied, the Act clearly and expressly provides that no payments can be made on behalf of a candidate except through his expense agent, and these payments were not made through the expense agent. The result is that if these payments by Parker were made on behalf of Colonel Surtees, they were illegal, and therefore you cannot imply any authority from him to make them. And if they were not made on behalf of Colonel Surtees, they cannot be recovered from him by his agent. In my opinion the true view is that these payments were not recoverable from Colonel Surtees, because you cannot imply an authority to do an illegal act.

We were much pressed by arguments as to the inconvenience of construing the Act so strictly, and by the alleged impossibility of conducting an election if no moneys for legitimate expenses could be disbursed by a sub-agent. I am not convinced of the impossibility of so conducting an election; but, however inconvenient the result may be, it is not for the Court to say that the Act of Parliament does not mean what it clearly and distinctly says. We have nothing to do with the inconvenience.

Then it is contended that the result of a literal construction of the statute is so absurd that this could not have been the intention of the Legislature, and therefore we ought not to read it in this way. But we are not told how we ought to read it, and for my part I can see no other way of reading it.

The only remaining point was remarkable for its ingenuity. It was said that these payments were made by Parker on his own behalf, and that, after the payments had been made, then for the first time Parker had the right to recover the amount from Colonel Surtees on the principle of fair remuneration for the performance of his duties as agent. There might, no doubt, be such a bargain by express contract, but that would be a special agreement which must be made out by expressed terms, and cannot be implied from the mere fact of the existence of an agency, which is the only case that was before the Court. There is no foundation whatever for the contention of the appellant, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BRETT, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. An action was brought by Parker against Colonel Surtees, who had been a candidate for the southern division of Durham, to recover certain moneys paid by him on behalf of Colonel Surtees. This could only be sustained by shewing that there was a contract, expressed or implied, that he would repay them. Then Colonel Surtees obtained an order to tax Parker's bill, and also an order to stay proceedings in the action. As to whether the order to stay proceedings was right I express no opinion; but there has been no appeal from it, and it must be taken to be good.

If the objection had been that Colonel Surtees did expressly order and authorise Parker to pay money on his behalf, but that such payment was illegal, and therefore that Parker's claim to be repaid could not be allowed, I should have doubted if the question could be tried by the Taxing Master. But here the question is, whether they were payments which Parker was authorised to make; and it was admitted that the question of authority was one which it was open to the Taxing Master to decide. Therefore the question is, whether there was evidence before the Master that the payments were so made as to enable Parker to charge them against Colonel Surtees.

Now it is admitted that he had no express authority from Colonel Surtees to pay these canvassers and runners, but only that he had a general authority to employ such persons for the purposes of the election. It appears Colonel Surtees appointed Mr. Watson as his agent, and Mr. Watson employed Trotter, Bruce & Trotter, and they employed Parker. So that Parker must be considered the agent of Colonel Surtees for the purpose of carrying on a certain part of the election. By the custom of this kind of agency he employed canvassers. He was authorised to act in the ordinary way of election agents, and it was their ordinary custom to employ canvassers. He had therefore authority to employ canvassers; and if he employed them there was a privity between Colonel Surtees and them, and if he had not paid them I think Colonel Surtees would have been bound to pay them. But the question is, whether Parker had himself authority to pay them. I think he had not. It is not contended that he had express authority. Had he implied authority? In an ordinary case, no doubt, if a man has authority to employ people he is also authorised to pay them. But the Act of 1863, section 2, says expressly that no payment shall be made except through one particular agent—that is, the expense agent—and that any one who does make such payment, except through such agent, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. When the Act says that no payment shall be made except through one particular agent, and that if any other person makes such a payment he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, can the Court assume that Colonel Surtees employed Parker to do that which was directly contrary to the Act and would expose Parker to the penalties of a misdemeanour? It appears to me that the Court cannot imply such an authority. Parker ought to have employed the canvassers, and to have sent them to the agent who was appointed by the candidate to pay the expenses, or else to Colonel Surtees. At all events, Parker had no authority to pay them himself. It was suggested that there was a special contract between Colonel Surtees and Parker, that Colonel Surtees in effect said to him, "You are to employ the canvassers on your own account, and not on mine, and I undertake to repay you what you pay them." And so it is said that Parker paid the canvassers, not on Colonel Surtees's account, but on his own. That is an ingenious suggestion. Even if such a contract had been made in express terms, I doubt whether it would not have been a mere evasion of the Act, and whether the Court could not have held that the payments made by Parker were really disbursements on behalf of Colonel Surtees. However that may be, the question here is whether such a special contract can be implied, for it is not pretended that there was any express contract to that effect, and it is clear to me that no contract can be implied. Therefore in no sense could Parker recover these disbursements in an action; and it follows that the charge ought not to be allowed in taxation. I decide the case on the single ground that though Parker had authority to employ the canvassers he had no authority to pay them.

In re Parker, App.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The claim made by Parker is for sums paid to canvassers in the election, and of course on the ground that they were disbursements made by the authority of Colonel Surtees. His bill of costs is in respect of his services in the election, and it is not alleged that there was any express authority from Colonel Surtees to make these payments. The only authority was that which was implied from the fact that Parker was appointed one of his local agents, and that he was to do all that is ordinarily done by local agents. But that means all that can be legally done, as well as ordinarily done. If any Act of Parliament makes anything that is ordinarily done illegal, the ordinary authority will not give the agent authority to do it. Therefore, the only question we have to consider is, whether the Act in this case forbids what Parker has done. In my opinion it does forbid it. Therefore there was no implied authority to make these payments, and it is admitted that there was no express authority.

It has been argued that these payments were not made on behalf of the candidate within the meaning of the Act. But I am of opinion that if made by the authority of the candidate they were made on his behalf. Every payment that is made by his authority is made on his behalf, and by the express words of the section no payment can lawfully be made by any agent except the agent specially appointed for that purpose.

Then it was suggested that there was a contract that Parker should employ these canvassers on his own authority, and that he should be repaid by the candidate the expenses which he might be put to on this account. But there is no evidence of any such contract; and I doubt whether such a contract, if made, would be a legal contract. In my opinion these payments were made, not on behalf of Parker, but of the candidate.

The only other point is whether the defence is open to Colonel Surtees on the taxation. The only question now before us is whether these payments charged in the bill of costs were made by the authority of Colonel Surtees. We cannot consider the proceedings in the action. We are only dealing with the common order to tax. Whether the order to stay proceedings in the action is one which Parker could have resisted is a different question. He has not resisted it, and we must take it to be binding. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. GASKILL.

Local Board — Agreements by — Contracts under Seal—Compromise—Specific Performance—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 173 and 174 (1).

An agreement between a local board and a defendant against whom an action is pending, compromising such action, not being "a contract necessary for carrying the Act into execution," can be enforced against the defendant, though not sealed with the board seal.

Action.

In June, 1880, the Attorney-General, at the relation of the local board of Long Eaton, Nottingham, commenced an action to restrain the defendant from building so as to obstruct a public footpath over a close within the district of the local board. Shortly after the commencement of the action, application was made by the plaintiffs for an interim injunction, which stood over on the defendant giving an undertaking to leave matters in statu quo until the hearing.

In November, 1880, attempts were made to compromise the action, and, on the 29th of November, the defendant attended a meeting of the local board, when the terms of the arrangement then come to were embodied in the following minute:—

"Mr. Gaskill attended before the board, and made an offer to the board to settle action—namely, each party to pay their own costs, and he would undertake not to build on unbuilt land until road diverted by legal authority.

"He subsequently agreed to settle the matter by paying the costs of the board and undertaking not to build on unbuilt land.

"(Signed) W. Gaskill.

"Agreed board not to proceed as to pulling end house down.

"(Signed) J. Black,

"For Local Board, Long Eaton."

J. Black was clerk to the board.

The costs of the board amounted to over 50*l.* The path was not diverted, but the board refrained from pulling the defendant's end house down.

The defendant refused to perform this agreement, and by their amended statement of claim the plaintiffs sought to enforce it, or, in the alternative, to restrain interference with the footpath on the original ground.

The defendant, among other defences, set up waiver, surprise and duress; but the Vice-Chancellor decided that the defendant's evidence did not support his allegations. The only point calling for a report arose from the defendant's contention that the agreement not being under the seal of the board was void under the Public Health Act, 1875, section 174, and could not be enforced against him.

Horton Smith, Q.C., and Speed, for the plaintiffs.—This is not a contract necessary for carrying the Public Health Act into execution, and therefore it need not be under seal. Section 174 only requires contracts for the purposes of the Act to be sealed. The agreement, therefore, is valid, and can be enforced.

Marten, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the defendant.—All contracts entered into by local boards for anything over 50*l.*, as this contract is, must be sealed—The Mayor, &c., of Kidderminster v. Hardwicke (1). Section 174 is compulsory, and not directory—Hunt v. The Wimbledon Local Board (2), Young v. The Mayor and Corporation of The Royal Leamington Spa (3) and The Governors and Company of Copper Miners v. Fox (4); therefore there is no agreement which can be enforced. They also cited The Ashbury Railway Carriage Company v. Riche (5).

Horton Smith, Q.C., in reply.—Even if this contract is insufficient, it is now remedied by part performance. The board have abstained from pulling down the defendant's house; that is a sufficiently good Marten, Q.C., replied on cases cited by Horton Smith, Q.C., in his reply.

BACON, V.C. (after stating the facts previous to and leading up to the agreement, continued :)—Under those circumstances, they come to an understanding—an agreement, if you like to call it so—not, in my opinion, a contract such as is meant and mentioned in the Public Health Act. I paid the greatest attention and the utmost deference to those scraps which have been read to me out of judgments delivered by the various Judges in the cases that have been referred to, and, no doubt, there is a great deal of general reasoning to which I cannot for this purpose specifically and particularly attend. What I must attend to, and what I am bound by, is the decision of the Court in the cases which have been referred to, the result of which seems to be, that where there has been a contract between the parties within the meaning of the Act, the Act must be observed, for that is the fountain and origin of all the power the local board possesses; and if the directions of the Act or the restrictions of the Act have not been properly regarded, then the Court has held that there was no right of action upon the contract in question within the Act.

Then the question that presents itself is, whether the contract is within the Public Health Act, 1875, or not. The first clause on this subject is section 173 —"Any local authority may enter into any contract necessary for carrying this Act into execution." Now, what is the meaning of that? Reading the Act through to see the purposes for which the local authority is established, we find there are powers to abate nuisances, to make sewers, to do a variety of other things, and amongst others to levy rates for the payment of expenses necessarily incurred. Can it be said with any reason that this agreement into which two parties litigant entered in the face of this Court is a contract "for carrying this Act into execution"? In my opinion, there is no pretence whatever for saying so. Section 174 (sub-section 1), with respect to contracts made by an urban authority under this Act, says, "Every contract made by an urban authority, whereof the value or amount exceeds 50*l.*, shall be in writing, and sealed with the common seal of such authority." It is impossible to ascribe any kind of value to the subject of this contention. It is not for money, it is not for the value of goods, or for anything else; it is an agreement relating to the suppression of a nuisance — for that purpose, and that only; and, in my opinion, it is not within the provisions of the Public Health Act, and there is no foundation for the objection which has been argued out at such great length and with reference to such abundance of authorities. This is an action as if it was between A and B only, who while the action is pending come to an agreement, not for the purpose of carrying the Act into execution, but for the purpose of settling the difference which existed between them; and they agree upon the terms, and the plaintiffs—as I may call them the relators—are willing to be bound by the terms. They have performed them as far as forbearing because of this agreement to exercise what they thought was a right, or, at all events, to enforce the law which they thought they had a right to invoke. In my opinion, that is a perfectly valid agreement, which required no seal, for it was not for doing anything to carry into effect the purposes of this Act—carrying this Act into execution. It was not a contract for any value whatever, above or below 50*l.*; but it was a contract which the plaintiffs had a right to enter into, and having entered into it, and the defendant having entered into it, I think that ought to have put an end to the action, and no further proceedings ought to have been had in it.

The defendant, therefore, has no defence whatever to the demand which is made against him to perform that agreement, and must submit to an injunction restraining him from continuing a nuisance complained of, which injunction, under the authority of the Act of Parliament, the local board have instituted proceedings to obtain, and which they only forbore to enforce from his submission to the terms of the agreement which was then entered into between them.

If that is so, it is unnecessary to proceed further. Whether the original injunction should be granted or not is not now a question. The parties themselves, it happens in this case, as it does happen in a great many cases, having had enough of the litigation, when it had not ripened for a decision, agree that they will put an end to it upon terms. That is "no contract for carrying into execution the powers of this Act"—no contract to the value of more than 50*l.* It is no contract which the corporation, who are plaintiffs in this action, are prevented from entering into in the matter relating to the action in which they are plaintiffs; and, in my opinion, therefore, they have a right to the injunction which they asked for.

GUTHRIE v. WALROND.

Will—Construction—Chose in Action—Locality—Onerous Property—Election.

A testator domiciled in Great Britain bequeathed all his estate and effects in Mauritius:—Held, to pass debts due from debtors in Mauritius.

Prima facie a beneficiary under a will may disclaim one of two gifts, but must take or reject the whole of a single gift.

Held, therefore, that the donee under a will of "estate and effects" in Mauritius could not repudiate onerous leaseholds, part of the gift, and take the rest.

This was the second further consideration of an action to administer the estate of a testator whose will contained the following clause:—"I hereby give to my third son Walter Murray Guthrie all my estate and effects in the island of Mauritius absolutely if he shall attain the age of twenty-five years or die under that age leaving male issue at his death." The testator gave his residue for the benefit of all his children. It appeared that the testator had carried on business in Great Britain and in Mauritius, and was domiciled and resident in Great Britain at the time of his death. The testator shortly before his death had sold certain real estate in the Mauritius, and the purchase-money was due to him from persons residing in Mauritius. The first question now argued was whether the words "all my estate and effects in the island of Mauritius" included debts due from persons resident in that island.

Cookson, Q.C., and Onslow, for the testator's children other than Walter Murray, contended that debts had no locality: if they were to be considered as property situated anywhere, the place of their situation was the domicile or abode of the creditor, and therefore a general gift such as this of property in a particular place did not include debts from a person who happened to be living there, unless the testator had given some other indication of his intention that such debts should be included in the gift—Story on the Conflict of Law (1). They distinguished Nisbett v. Murray (2), The Earl of Tyrone v. The Marquis of Waterford (3) and Horsfield v. Ashton (4).

Glasse, Q.C., and Blakesley, for Walter Murray Guthrie, were not called on.

locality, and it is impossible that the words can carry debts due to the testator who resided in England. The question is a simple question of construction—that is to say, what meaning of the words is to be attributed to the testator. Now it appears to me that the words are sufficient of themselves, and, looking at the position of the testator's affairs and the relation which existed between some of the debts and his real property in the island of Mauritius, it appears to me that the meaning of the testator is to include debts due to him from persons in the Mauritius. The Courts have had occasion to consider the meaning of similar general words with reference to debts. One of the earliest cases on the subject is that of Nisbett v. Murray (2). There the testator resided in Jamaica. It appears that he devised and bequeathed among other things the residue of his estate in the island of Jamaica, except furniture and wearing apparel, to trustees. The question arose upon a debt which had been due to the testator from persons resident in the island of Jamaica, but for which a person resident in England had become solely responsible, and the Court held that it had become property in England. Now, if the rule had been strictly applied which has been pressed upon me that debts follow the person of the creditors, it is plain that in that case the debt would have been property in Jamaica. Therefore the Court did not proceed on such rule, but enquired what was the residence of the debtor. The same course was followed in the case of Arnold v. Arnold (5). There the testator made a bequest of "his wines and property in England." That was held to pass sums due from persons in England to the testator in India. There, again, if the locality of debts followed the person of the creditor the decision would have been otherwise, for it was shown that the testator's domicile was India—that circumstance appears in the report, and must have been relied on. Lastly, in the case before the Court of Appeal, Lord Tyrone v. The Marquis of Waterford (3), the Court had to consider the meaning of the expression "land and property of the testator in the county of Northumberland." There it held that debts due to the testator in respect of collieries passed as property in that county, and, in delivering judgment, the Lord Chancellor made these observations:—"The word property used in this will appears to me to have its most extensive signification. Personal property may have a locality, as we all know from the many cases in the books respecting bona notabilia. In the late case of Horsfield v. Ashton (4), the House of Lords gave full effect to the doctrine of locality of personalty, where the subject of the gift is intelligibly described." Lord Justice Knight-Bruce said this:—"It appears to me that the debts, whether for rent or otherwise, which at the testator's decease were due to him from persons then resident in Northumberland, were property then in Northumberland within the meaning of the will; and that the debts, whether for rent or otherwise, which were then due to him from persons then resident in Ireland, were property then in Ireland within the meaning of the will." Lord Justice Turner adopted the same line of reasoning, holding that debts due to the testator at the time of his death with reference to the collieries were property in Northumberland within the meaning of the will. The whole question, I repeat, is one of construction; the testator has, in my view, expressed his intention that these debts shall belong to his son Walter Murray.

Cookson, Q.C., and Onslow, then argued that Walter Murray Guthrie must take the burden of certain leaseholds in Mauritius if he took the other property. The rule was that where two gifts were contained in the same will the donee could repudiate one and take the other, but he could not repudiate part of one gift and take the other part—Hawkins v. Hawkins (6) and Green v. Britten (7).

Glasse, Q.C., and Blakesley, contra, contended that the accident whether different properties were included in one or more gifts made no difference—Hawkins v. Hawkins (6), Andrew v. Trinity Hall (8), Guthrie v. Walrond.

Moffatt v. Bates (9) and Warren v. Rundall (10).

Cookson, Q.C., replied.

FRY, J.—It appears to me plain that where there are two distinct legacies in one will given to one person, that person may prima facie take one and repudiate the other, but that his title so to do may be negatived by an indication in the will that the testator intended otherwise. There are cases in the books which have been cited to me where the Court has allowed a legatee to take one legacy and reject another; there are other cases in which the Court have found an intention to negative that right.

The present case, however, arises on a single and undivided gift. It appears to me that is prima facie an indication that the gift shall be one and undivided, and the legatee shall take all or none. It may be—and it is not necessary to decide whether it be so—that where the Court finds some other indication of intention, that the legatee might take one part of a gift and reject the other; but prima facie where things are given by one and the same gift, that fact makes it a single gift which the legatee must take or reject. That is a conclusion which seems consonant with good sense, and I am strongly confirmed in my view by the case of Green v. Britten (7), to which my attention was called. It is not necessary to go over the cases, they are all consonant with the principles I have stated.

[IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.]

1881. Nov. 3. 1882. July 10.

KEMP v. FALK.

Sale of Goods—Indorsement of Bill of Lading — Sub-sale — Stoppage in transitu before Delivery or Payment of Freight.

The purchaser and consignor of a cargo of salt indorsed the bill of lading by way of mortgage to a bank. The cargo was sold "to arrive" by the consignees to sub-purchasers. The purchaser having become bankrupt, the unpaid vendor gave notice to stop in transitu before delivery to the sub-purchasers or payment of the freight: —Held, that the right to stop in transitu was not destroyed by the sub-sales, and that the vendor was entitled to the balance of the purchase-money received upon the sub-sales after satisfying the bank's claim.

Per LORD BLACKBURN.—Where notice to stop in transitu is given to ship-owners, they are bound to forward it with reasonable diligence to the master of their ship. A notice so forwarded and received by the master is a valid and sufficient notice to him.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (reported Law Rep. 14 Ch. D. 446), which reversed one of Mr. Registrar Hazlitt sitting as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

G. M. Kiell, trading as G. M. Kiell & Co., on the 25th of March, 1878, bought from the respondent Falk a cargo of salt, to be placed by Falk on board the ship Carpathian for conveyance to Calcutta. The Carpathian was chartered by Kiell, and the salt consigned to Wiseman, Mitchell & Co., his agents in Calcutta. Kiell paid part of the price in cash, and accepted a bill of exchange for the balance, 847*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* The bill of lading was indorsed by Kiell, and delivered to the Bank of Scotland as security for an advance obtained through T. Wiseman & Co., the Glasgow agents of Wiseman, Mitchell & Co.

On the 17th of July, Wiseman, Mitchell & Co. sold the cargo "to arrive." On the 20th of July, Kiell filed a liquidation petition, under which his creditors accepted a composition. He assigned all his property to the appellant Kemp on trust for sale, and on his being subsequently adjudicated a bankrupt, Kemp was appointed trustee. On the 27th of July, 1878, Falk served a notice on the owners of the Carpathian to stop the salt in transitu. The ship arrived at Calcutta on the 29th of July. On the 30th, Wiseman, Mitchell & Co. presented the bills of lading and gave directions for delivery to the sub-purchasers. On the 31st of July, the shipowners sent to their agents the following telegram, which was received the same day: — "Charterers Carpathian failed. Unless bill of lading held for value, don't deliver." On the 2nd of August, Falk telegraphed to his agents in Calcutta to serve on the master notice of stoppage in transitu of "the cargo now on board." The notice was served on the 5th. The delivery was, nevertheless, made to the sub-purchasers, part before, but the bulk after, the notice of the 5th of August. The proceeds of the sub-sales were remitted by Wiseman, Mitchell & Co. to the Bank of Scotland, which, after satisfying its own claim, paid the balance, 426*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.*, to Kemp as Kiell's trustee. Kiell's bill for 847*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* was dishonoured at maturity. Falk claimed the 426*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.*, on the ground that he had given a good notice to stop in transitu.

The facts were stated by agreement. The claim was rejected by the Registrar, but allowed by the Court of Appeal. Kemp appealed.

The case was part heard on the 3rd of November, 1881.

Benjamin, Q.C., and G. W. Lawrance, for the appellant, and Cohen, Q.C., and F. Thompson, for the respondent.

Their Lordships (Lord Penzance, Lord Blackburn and Lord Watson) soon after the commencement adjourned the hearing for a further statement as to certain facts.

The following statement was accordingly agreed upon by the parties:—

1. No delivery order for the cargo of the Carpathian was given by Messrs. Steele & Co. (the agents in Calcutta for the shipowners) to the sub-purchasers or the consignees, but the consignees indorsed the bill of lading, and delivered the same to the captain of the Carpathian, together with a letter in the following terms:—

"Calcutta, 2nd August, 1878.

"To the Commanding Officer of the ship Carpathian."

"Dear Sir,—In order to save trouble, we will not sign delivery orders for salt, but have written our sircar on board the above vessel to deliver salt to those men who produce cash receipts from our cashiers."

"(Signed) Wiseman, Mitchell, Reid & Co."

2. The sub-purchasers paid their purchase-moneys to Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, Reid & Co., the consignees for the quantities of salt purchased by them respectively, and took receipts for the same from the cashier of the said consignees, and thereupon the sub-purchasers took the receipts to the vessel, and the quantities of salt for which they had respectively thus paid were then weighed out and delivered to them respectively, in the presence and under the supervision of the master or other officer of the ship, and the sircar or clerk of the consignees, in accordance with the letter of the 2nd of August, 1878. No arrangement was entered into for the payment of the freight other than that contained in the charter-party and bill of lading, copies of which are to be found in the supplemental appendix. The freight was paid in two instalments on the 22nd of August and the 3rd of September.

The hearing was recommenced on the 10th of July, 1882.

Bompas, Q.C., and G. W. Lawrance (Benjamin, Q.C., with them), for the appellant.—The right to stop the goods in transitu was destroyed by the sub-sales. The fact of the sub-sales distinguishes the case from In re Westcynthius (1) and Spalding v. Ruding (2). There being no property in the goods remaining in Kiell they could not be stopped, and the right of stoppage in transitu cannot apply to the purchase-money. Ex parte Golding, Davis & Co. (3) was wrongly decided, and ought to be overruled by the House.

If not destroyed by the sub-sales the right of stoppage was lost upon the delivery of the first portion of the cargo, since that in law amounted to a delivery of the whole — Crawshay v. Eades (4), Tanner v. Scovell (5), Slubey v. Heyward (6) and Hammond v. Anderson (7). The notice received on the 31st of July was not a good notice; the master was not bound by anything that took place before the 5th of August, and then the notice was too late. Lastly, the indorsement of the bills of lading and delivery to the captain was an indorsement for value which defeated the right of stoppage; and the cash receipts were documents of title within the Factors Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 39), s. 5, which protected their holders against the vendor's right to stop.

Cohen, Q.C., and F. Thompson, for the respondent, were not called upon.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD SELBORNE).—You have heard the argument of the two learned counsel for the appellant, and I believe that your Lordships are all of opinion that it is unnecessary to hear any further argument in the case. To me it seems a case of very great simplicity.

It is admitted that but for the indorsement, or, if there were more than one, the indorsements, of the bill of lading of the cargo in the Carpathian, the right of stoppage in transitu would have been well exercised as against everybody on the 5th of August, after which the greater part of the cargo was delivered to an amount which makes it immaterial between the parties to consider any question as to the few and small parcels which had been delivered before. Then the question is, what is the effect of the indorsement of the bill of lading? It was an indorsement to the Bank of Scotland, who had advanced money upon it; and the cases of In re Westcynthius (1) and Spalding v. Ruding (2) clearly establish that the right of stoppage in transitu is not discharged absolutely by an indorsement of a bill of lading by way of security or pledge, but that it remains, in equity at all events, (and that is quite enough for the present purpose), as it was before, subject to a charge in favour of the indorsee of the bill of lading which must be paid off, and which being paid off, the person entitled to and exercising the right of stoppage in transitu stands in exactly the same position as to everybody else as if there had been no security, and no pledge, and no indorsement of the bill of lading. And against what is that right of stoppage in transitu? Not against some imaginary interest of the purchaser, but against the goods themselves. It is a right to stop the goods; and I have no notion of any right of stoppage in transitu which is not a right to stop the goods when they are still in transitu in contemplation of law. It is a qualified right in the circumstances which I have mentioned—because it cannot be asserted as against the holder of the bill of lading without paying him off; but the instant his claim is discharged it is exactly the same right as if there had been no security, as against the original purchaser, and as against, in my opinion, every one claiming under him.

It was contended that when, after an indorsement by way of security, such as was here made to the Bank of Scotland, there has been a sale of the goods "to arrive" by the original purchaser, without any document of title (a sale which passes to the sub-purchaser such equitable interest as his immediate vendor could convey), that displaces the right of stoppage in transitu established by the cases of In re Westcynthius (1) and Spalding v. Ruding (2). From the beginning of the argument I was totally unable to understand how that could possibly be. The indorsement of the bill of lading to the Bank of Scotland can confer no title whatever upon the other persons to whom the original purchaser transfers such rights as he has. He can transfer no greater or better right than he has; and the right which he has is a right subject to a stoppage in transitu in all cases in which the right of stoppage in transitu remains in favour of the original seller of the goods. I put, therefore, aside the whole argument founded upon the existence of sub-purchasers. I assent entirely to the proposition that where the sub-purchasers get a good title as against the right of stoppage in transitu there can be no stoppage in transitu as against the purchase-money payable by them to their vendor; at all events, until I hear authority for that proposition, I am bound to say that it is not consistent with my idea of the right of stoppage in transitu that it should apply to anything except to the goods which are in transitu. But when the right exists as against the goods which are in transitu, it is manifest that all other persons who have, subject to that right, any equitable interest in those goods by way of contract with the original purchaser or otherwise, may come in, and if they satisfy the claim of the seller who has stopped the goods in transitu, they can of course have effect given to their rights; and I apprehend that a Court of justice, in administering the rights which arise in actions of this description, would very often find that the rights of all parties were properly given effect to, if so much of the purchase-money payable by the sub-purchasers were paid to the original vendor as might be sufficient to discharge his claim; and, subject, of course, to that, the other contracts would take effect in their order and in their priorities. I observe an illustration of that in the letter of the 5th of August, 1878, written by Messrs. Orr & Harris, the respondent's solicitors, in which they say that they have been told that Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell & Co. have contracted for the sale of the salt upon certain terms; that they do not want to put them to inconvenience, and that therefore they will be quite ready, upon being paid what is due to them, to let that contract receive proper effect. That is merely a way of working out the right of stoppage in transitu, which is a right against the goods, and which, as I said before, could be in no way whatever affected or prejudiced by any dealings between the original insolvent purchaser and persons purchasing under him without any title founded upon an indorsement of the bill of lading for value received.

I put that argument entirely aside; and I then come to the question which has been argued by Mr. Bompas upon the special circumstances of this case. I assume that there was no stoppage in transitu effectually made until the 5th of August. I put, therefore, entirely out of the question whatever had been bona fide done before that time; and the question is, whether there was not, as against the cargo then remaining undelivered, an effectual stoppage in transitu. Now the facts stated in the 2nd paragraph of the supplemental statement appear to me absolutely to exclude the notion of a constructive delivery of the whole cargo having taken place before the 5th of August, because it appears there that the sub-purchasers, to some of whom some small portions of the cargo had been delivered before the 5th of August, were all dealing separately from each other—each of them contracted to buy a certain quantity of salt, for which they paid Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell & Co.; they took receipts from them for their own portions; they "took those receipts to the vessel, and the quantities of salt for which they had respectively thus paid were then weighed out and delivered to them respectively, in the presence and under the supervision of the master or other officer of the ship, and the sircar or clerk of the consignees," without any arrangement as to the freight; from which it is apparent that nothing could be more separate and distinct than the delivery of each parcel in that case; and if there were no more than those facts, the delivery of one parcel could not possibly operate as a delivery of the whole.

Then it was said that it ought to be considered, on account of the terms of the letter of the 2nd of August, 1878, that there was some constructive delivery of the whole cargo to the sircar or clerk of the consignees. That also appears to me to be a suggestion for which there is no warrant in the natural construction of the letter itself; a suggestion entirely unsupported by anything else, and really inconsistent with the fact that delivery was not made by the sircar, but "in the presence and under the supervision of the master or other officer of the ship, and the sircar or clerk." The sircar or clerk might be present too and might concur, but his concurrence could not mean that he had already become the possessor of the cargo, as if it had been taken out of the ship and delivered to himself.

The only other argument advanced by Mr. Bompas was founded upon the fact, stated in the 1st paragraph of the supplementary statement of facts, that the consignees indorsed the bill of lading (whatever that may be worth I really will not stop to enquire), and delivered it to the captain. It was not indorsed to the captain for value, and there is nothing whatever to shew that your Lordships ought to infer that it had been indorsed to somebody else for value. We know that it had been indorsed for value to the bank, and we know the extent of their claim under it; and the bank have been satisfied, or must be satisfied. The suggestion that it was indorsed, either to Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, Reid & Co., as persons who were under contract or who might be liable, or to any of the various sub-purchasers through them, is entirely without foundation; and neither in the original agreed statement of facts, nor in this supplementary agreed statement of facts, is any indorsement mentioned at all except the indorsement to the Bank of Scotland. It seems to me evident that the Bank of Scotland sent the bill indorsed to them in order that their own security might be realised, and it then came into the hands of Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell & Co. (whether directly or through some intermediate agency is really not important) for that purpose, and it is not said, in this supplementary agreed statement of facts, that the indorsement which preceded the delivery of the bill of lading to the captain by those gentlemen was for any special purpose whatever which could give any new title, legal or equitable, to anybody who had it not before.

The result is that, under these circumstances, the case seems to me to be altogether within the ruling in the cases of In re Westcynthius (1) and Spalding v. Ruding (2), and therefore that the present appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I perfectly agree in the result that this appeal must be dismissed with costs. Originally in this case there was a statement of facts made in the Court of Bankruptcy, upon which there was an appeal to the Appeal Court, and on that statement of facts the ingenuity of counsel seems to have led the Court below to draw some inferences, which induced them, whilst giving judgment as they have done in favour of Mr. Falk the present respondent, to intimate at the same time that they thought the case raised a question which had been raised in the case of Ex parte Golding, Davis & Co. (3), and that therefore they should give leave to appeal. When the case came here the first time, my noble and learned friend Lord Penzance thought that the statement of facts was not intelligible, and that it was desirable that it should be sent down to have the facts made clear; and now it appears that the original statement of facts was not only not intelligible, but also not quite accurate; and we have now an amended and supplementary statement of facts, shewing what the facts of the case really were. Taking that statement, it seems to me that the case is perfectly clear. We have no occasion to consider whether the case of Ex parte Golding, Davis & Co. (3) was well or ill decided, because no point relating to it arises here.

It appears that Mr. Falk of Liverpool had sold to Mr. Kiell a quantity of salt, which was shipped on board a vessel bound for Calcutta; that Mr. Kiell accepted a draft drawn against that cargo; that bills of lading were made out, which were signed not, as is usual, by the master, but by the shipowner himself, and that Mr. Kiell got those bills of lading. Now, so far as that goes, standing there, nothing can be more thoroughly established than the law upon it. Mr. Falk having delivered the goods and taken a bill of exchange had no right whatever to meddle with those goods further, unless before the end of the transitus (I shall say a word presently as to what comes at the end of the transitus) Kiell the purchaser became insolvent and stopped payment, and then if Falk had stopped the goods in transitu, he would have been revested in his rights as an unpaid vendor as against Kiell. It is pretty well settled now that it would not have rescinded the contract. But before the end of the transitus came, his right to stop the goods in transitu might be defeated by an indorsement upon the bill of lading to a person who gave value. In the present case there was such an indorsement and transfer of the bill of lading, but it was only an indorsement and transfer for a particular and limited purpose. It appears that Mr. Kiell, in order to obtain an advance, got Messrs. T. Wiseman & Co. of Glasgow, the correspondents and agents of Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, Reid & Co. of Calcutta, to make an advance in his favour by drawing the bill of exchange upon him; and to secure the payment of that bill of exchange the bill of lading was indorsed, and the Bank of Scotland, who discounted or took that bill, became holders of the bill of lading for the purpose of protecting themselves. It was clearly a transfer for value to the Bank of Scotland, and as such, so far as that went, it defeated the right of the stoppage in transitu at law. But the unpaid vendor's right, except so far as the interest had passed by the pledging of the bill of lading to the pledgee, or the mortgagee, whichever it was, enabled the unpaid vendor in equity to stop in transitu everything which was not covered by that pledge. That was settled, and has been considered law, or rather equity, ever since the case of In re Westcynthius (1), and has been affirmed in Spalding v. Ruding (2); and I have no doubt it is very good law upon that point.

Here, therefore, the stoppage by Falk as unpaid vendor would revest in him his lien, except so far as concerned the Bank of Scotland, unless something else had happened. Now what has happened? The argument of Mr. Bompas was this: First of all it appears that Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell, Reid & Co., who were the persons to whom the goods were consigned (I do not understand whether they were purchasers, or merely agents for Kiell & Co.), sent over to their correspondents T. Wiseman & Co. of Glasgow a sale note, and then they forwarded it to Kiell & Co. in this letter: "Dear Sirs,—We enclose sale note of your cargo of salt ex Carpathian to arrive," and so on—the rest of the letter does not matter. So that at that time it appears that Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell & Co. had entered into a contract at Calcutta for a sale of the goods "to arrive." The date of that letter was the 17th of July, a fortnight or so before the ship actually did arrive at Calcutta. That, it was argued, put an end to the vendor's right to stop the goods in transitu, and pro tanto the equitable right to stop them in transitu which remained in Mr. Falk. I have endeavoured to understand on what ground it is supposed to put an end to it. No sale, even if the sale had actually been made with payment, would put an end to the right of stoppage in transitu unless there were an indorsement of the bill of lading. Why any agreement to sell, unless it was made in such a way as to pass the right of property in the goods sold, should be supposed to put an end to the equitable right to stop them in transitu I cannot understand. I am quite clear that it does not.

The next thing which was attempted to be argued was this. The Bank of Scotland, the holders of the bill of lading at Glasgow, forwarded the bill of lading in due course to their agents at Calcutta; and it is surmised that their agents at Calcutta must have been some persons different from Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell & Co. I infer that Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell & Co. were the people who acted as their agents in this transaction, but I do not think it matters whether they were or not. The Bank of Scotland sent the bill of lading to their agents, whether they were Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell & Co. or any one else. Those agents received that bill of lading well knowing (or at all events they ought to have known) that the Bank of Scotland had by virtue of this bill of lading a hold over the goods. They were entitled to see that the goods were not sold or disposed of in any way prejudicial to their lien, and, if they were sold, that the money, or enough of it to repay the Bank of Scotland and secure them, should pass through their hands or the hands of their agents; and I see nothing that happened afterwards which shews that they acted otherwise than in strict conformity with the duty thus cast upon them. It was argued that, inasmuch as Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell & Co. had acted for Kiell & Co. in selling the goods, taking a del credere commission to secure that the people to whom they sold should pay the price, therefore they were persons who were entitled to have the bill of lading indorsed to them as a security. I am utterly unable to understand that argument; it is clear to me that they were not so entitled.

The next thing which was said was this. There was a little confusion in the statement here, but it is now said upon the amended statement of facts, that Messrs Wiseman, Mitchell & Co., who I cannot but think were the persons employed by the Bank of Scotland as their agents, did at some time (I do not exactly know when) indorse the bill of lading and shew it to the captain. I do not think that that comes to more than this, that they gave the captain complete notice, when he arrived at Calcutta, "We are the persons who have the legal right to the delivery of these goods, for we have the bill of lading, holding it under the Bank of Scotland, and consequently we are the persons entitled to the goods. You can deliver only to us without being responsible to us; if you deliver to us or with our sanction you will not be responsible to us." I can put no other meaning upon it.

Then it was argued that this amounts to a delivery of the whole cargo by the shipowner to Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell & Co., who from that time forward would be holders of the goods; the shipowner in whose physical possession, in the hold of whose vessel the goods lay, being changed from holding the goods as shipowner, not having delivered the goods, into a warehouseman who was very inconveniently holding those goods in his ship as a warehouse. I think that that is an arrangement which might be made, although it is not a very convenient one. The freight was not paid; but I think it is possible to make an arrangement by which, though the freight is not paid, the shipowner changes himself completely into a warehouseman instead of being a carrier or a shipowner; he alters his responsibilities altogether; and yet by arrangement or agreement retains a lien over the goods until the freight is paid. I think such a contract might be made. But when one is asked to say that such a contract was made, the non-payment of freight is a very important element leading one to say that no such contract was made at all. In this case I cannot help thinking that no such contract was made, and there is no reason why we should hold that it was. The shipowner acted in the same way as if it had not been made and in no other way.

Then comes an argument which I really think is not tenable, and I should hardly mention it if it were not for the great importance of everything relating to the Factors Act, and of every question touching it in the commercial world. It was argued that the recent statute 40 & 41 Vict. c. 39. s. 5, which says that the transfer of a delivery order or any other document of title shall put an end to an unpaid vendor's right to countermand that delivery order and to keep the goods, operates just to the same extent and under the same circumstances as in the case of a bill of lading for goods at sea. In order to make out that proposition reliance was placed upon this fact—that Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell & Co., who were holders of the bill of lading, as I have already said, for the Bank of Scotland, wrote to the captain of the ship saying, "In order to save trouble we will not sign delivery orders for salt, but have written our sircar on board the above vessel to deliver salt to those men who produce cash receipts from our cashiers;" and by some strange process of reasoning it was said that the man who brought and shewed to the sircar of Messrs. Wiseman, Mitchell & Co. a receipt for a sum of money paid to their cashier for the salt, was the holder of a document of title for the salt in such a way that the indorsement of it could put an end to the right of stoppage in transitu by Mr. Falk. Now in the first place the statute in question was never meant to have that effect. In the next place it is an abuse of language to call such a receipt as this a document of title in any shape.

Then the last and desperate attempt was to say that the stoppage in transitu was not until the 5th of August. I see that Lord Bramwell takes a different view of the law from what I had always understood it to be. I had always myself understood that the law was, that when you became aware that a man to whom you had sold goods which had been shipped had become insolvent, your best way, or at least a very good way, of stopping them in transitu was to give notice to the shipowner in order that he might send it on. He knew where his master was likely to be, and he might send it on; and I have always been under the belief that although such a notice, if sent, cast upon the shipowner who received it an obligation to send it on with reasonable diligence, yet if, though he used reasonable diligence, somehow or other the goods were delivered before it reached, he would not be responsible. I have always thought that a stoppage, if effected thus, was a sufficient stoppage in transitu; I have always thought that when the shipowner, having received such a notice, used reasonable diligence and sent the notice on and it arrived before the goods were delivered, that was a perfect stoppage in transitu. Consequently, I think that when notice was given to the shipowners (and although they had signed the bill of lading instead of the master signing it, I do not think that that makes any difference—I only mention it to say that it makes none), they were under an obligation to forward it with reasonable diligence, if they could, to the master.

What the shipowners did was this: on the 31st of July they sent a telegram—they waited two days, and they might have got into a scrape by that means—but they did send this telegram, "Charterers Carpathian failed. Unless bill of lading held for value, don't deliver." That was, as it strikes me, a sending forward of the notice to stop the goods in transitu. It was tantamount to saying, "We send to our captain the notice we have formally received ourselves"; and consequently I should say that the stoppage in transitu was complete on the 31st of July. But it is not necessary to decide that point, for it is clear enough that the goods were not then delivered, and nothing was done which could be called a delivery of the whole or any part of them until the 3rd of August, when a person brings one of these receipts for, I think, 1,000 maunds of salt, or some small quantity of salt, and gets it delivered.

Then it is said that the delivery of a part is a delivery of the whole. It may be a delivery of the whole. In agreeing for the delivery of goods with a person you are not bound to take an actual corporeal delivery of the whole in order to constitute such a delivery, and it may very well be that the delivery of a part of the goods is sufficient to afford strong evidence that it is intended as a delivery of the whole. If both parties intend it as a delivery of the whole, then it is a delivery of the whole; but if either of the parties does not intend it as a delivery of the whole, if either of them dissents, then it is not a delivery of the whole. I had always understood the law upon that point to have been an agreed law, which nobody ever doubted since an elaborate judgment in Dixon v. Yates (8), by Lord Wensleydale, who was then Mr. Justice Parke. The rule I had always understood from that time down to the present to be that the delivery of a part may be a delivery of the whole if it is so intended, but that it is not such a delivery unless it is so intended, and I rather think that the onus is upon those who say that it was so intended. Therefore the delivery of this particular parcel of salt was not a delivery of anything else.

What we are now dealing with is the delivery of the salt which was delivered after the 5th of August, and which was quite sufficient to dispose of the whole sum now in dispute. We do not need to enquire what were the rights in any particular parcel of salt delivered on the 3rd of August. Supposing that those were misdeliveries no harm would happen, as quite enough remained to pay the Bank of Scotland, and no dispute would arise about that; there is no complaint by anybody respecting it. The present question is with regard to the stoppage in transitu of the residue after an undoubted notice of stoppage in transitu was served upon the 5th of August. Is that subject to the rule that although the whole of the cargo could not be stopped because the bill of lading had been transferred to the Bank of Scotland, the interest which still remained in Kiell or in Kiell's assigns to whom he had sold it, or in anybody else except those who had become transferees of the bill of lading, might be stopped and might become vested in Falk the original vendor? I think there is no reason why it should not; and that being so, the judgment of the Court below is right and ought to be affirmed.

LORD WATSON.—It is not necessary for me to say much in regard to this case, which appears to me to involve, when rightly understood, no question of law whatever. When the case was first presented to the House there was a very considerable amount of haze hanging over the statement of what had taken place in Calcutta with regard to the bill of lading which had been signed by the shipowners and subsequently indorsed to the Bank of Scotland for an advance. It was then stated that on the 30th of July, 1878, the consignees had presented that bill of lading to the agents of the ship, and had received in exchange delivery orders directing the master to make delivery to the persons therein named, and that the consignees had given over those delivery orders to the parties therein named, who by virtue of them had each obtained the parcel of salt mentioned in his delivery order. It now appears, on further enquiry, that these statements were made under a misapprehension.

I agree with your Lordships as to the result to which you will come in point of fact; and, arriving at that result, it is quite impossible for me to hold, notwithstanding the very ingenious argument which has been addressed to us by the learned counsel on behalf of the appellant, that the case is not directly ruled by the cases of In re Westcynthius (1) and Spalding v. Ruding (2). There is no occasion for your Lordships to consider the effect or the propriety of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Ex parte Golding, Davis & Co. (3). The law laid down in the cases of In re Westcynthius (1) and Spalding v. Ruding (2) is very well established, and very clear law, and, in my opinion, it directly applies to the facts of this case as they have now been ascertained upon further enquiry.

LORD FITZGERALD.—I concur in the decision which has been announced by the Lord Chancellor. One of the questions before your Lordships' House is, whether the transit of the goods had ended before the 5th of August, 1878, when the vendor's notice to stop was delivered to the master of the Carpathian at Calcutta. I accept the date of the 5th of August, as it renders it unnecessary to consider the effect of the prior notice given in Liverpool. "Transit" embraces not only the carriage of the goods to the place where delivery is to be made, but also delivery of the goods there according to the terms of the contract for conveyance. Thus in this case "transit" means the conveyance of the goods to Calcutta, and their delivery "at the port of Calcutta" by the carrier, according to the terms of the charter-party and bill of lading, into the actual or constructive possession of the consignee. This seems to me to raise a question of fact as to which, if there was any open for controversy in the Court below, there is none now, when we take into consideration the additional statement of facts ascertained on the enquiries directed by your Lordships' House at the opening of this appeal.

Upon the additional facts modifying the original statement in the case, it now appears that the freight which was to be paid "on the right delivery of the cargo agreeable to bill of lading at a tonnage rate on the quantity delivered" "in full of all port charges," was paid in two payments, the first on the 22nd of August, 1878, and the second on the 3rd of September, 1878. It does not appear that the shipowners had on or before the 5th of August given up their lien for freight. No delivery orders had been given by the shipowners to the consignees or to the sub-purchasers, of whom I infer there were several. The course pursued by Wiseman, Mitchell & Co., who stood in the position of consignees, was to indorse the bill of lading and deliver it to the captain, with the letter of the 2nd of August, 1878, and then as each sub-purchaser paid Wiseman, Mitchell & Co. for the quantity he had purchased he got a receipt, took it to their clerk on board the ship, and his quantity was weighed out and delivered to him over the ship's side under the supervision of the master. The deliveries commenced on the 2nd of August, when 1,000 maunds were unshipped and delivered. No delivery took place on the 4th, and on the 5th of August 2,800 maunds were delivered. The whole quantity on the ship was 49,195 maunds, so that assuming that the delivery on the 5th took place before the notice to stop was delivered, there remained then on the ship, in charge of the carrier, 45,395 maunds.

It seems to me that at the time of the delivery of the notice to stop, that portion of the cargo represented by the 45,715 maunds of salt was still in transit and liable to be stopped, and that there had been no actual delivery of the whole, and that the partial deliveries of the 2nd and 5th of August to different sub-purchasers of lots do not indicate any constructive delivery of part as representing the whole cargo, or give rise to any question of that character.

The preceding statement of facts negatives any question of intention that a delivery of part should amount to a delivery of the whole. This seems to me to determine the whole controversy, for, if there was nothing more, there could be no doubt of the unpaid vendor's equity to stop the surplus after payment of the demands of the bank. Another question was however raised—namely, whether the sub-sales of the whole cargo before the arrival of the Carpathian at Calcutta put an end to the right of the unpaid vendor to stop the goods, or defeated his equitable title to be paid out of the surplus of the unpaid purchase-money. The facts again seem to prevent any such question arising.

The argument of the present appellant in the Court below was that the sub-sales amounted to a complete transfer of the property in the goods both legal and equitable, and that there was by the attornment of the master a complete delivery to the sub-purchasers before notice to stop was given, and that in such a state of facts it had never been held that the vendor had any right against the sub-purchasers' purchase-money. The allegation of an attornment by the master was based on paragraph 19 of the statement of facts; but that has been completely displaced by the additional statement, from which we learn that no delivery orders were signed by the master or by the agents (Steele & Co.), nor were any delivery orders given by Wiseman, Mitchell & Co. representing the consignees.

The shipment in Liverpool was in bulk 1,882 tons of salt, "the ship not accountable for natural wastage," and each purchaser seems to have purchased, not any specific lot, but so many maunds to be weighed out to him ex ship.

I infer from the amended statement also that the money to be paid by the sub-purchasers for the 45,395 maunds which remained on the ship after the deliveries of the 5th of August had not been paid to Wiseman, Mitchell & Co., or at all before the notice to stop. The foundation, therefore, on which the appellant here rested his argument in the Court below is entirely removed.

Your Lordships ought to give full effect to the equitable principles on which the right of stoppage in transitu rests. It is a right founded on reason, and never works injustice. In affirming the decision of the Court below your Lordships merely decide that the claim of the unpaid vendor against the surplus produce of his own goods, after providing for all prior rights, is superior to that of the creditors of Kiell, who had not paid for the goods.

Confining myself to the facts of the case, I refrain from expressing any opinion how far a bona fide absolute sub-sale for cash, made whilst the goods were at sea, and without notice of the claim of the unpaid vendor, may or may not affect the right of stoppage in transitu, though the sub-sale be unaccompanied by an indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading to the sub-vendee.

Order appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

COTTON, L.J.
BOWEN, L.J.
1882.
Dec. 6, 11.

GUINNESS v. THE LAND CORPORATION OF IRELAND (LIMITED).

Company—Memorandum of Association—Articles—Capital—Division of, into A and B Shares—Provision in Articles that B Capital should form Guarantee Fund for Holders of A Shares—Ultra Vires—Variation of Memorandum—Companies Act, 1862, sections 6, 7, 12 and 38.

A company was formed for the purpose of acquiring, cultivating and farming land in Ireland, with a nominal capital, as stated in the memorandum, of 1,050,000*l.*, divided into 140,000 A shares of 5*l. each, and* 3,500 B shares of 100*l. each. By one of the articles of association it was provided that the capital produced by the issue of the B shares should be paid to trustees to invest and apply the income and the proceeds of sale of capital, if necessary, in paying the holders of the A shares a preferential cumulative dividend of five per cent.—the balance of the income, after replacing any capital sold, to be paid to the B shareholders; and in the event of a winding-up (subject to. liability for the company's debts), both capital and income of the trust fund were to be distributed among the B shareholders rateably and exclusively—and it was provided that the trust fund and income should in no event be used as working capital. There was no suggestion of any concealment or mala fides:*—Held (affirming the decision of CHITTY, J.), that the article of association was ultra vires, as being a contradiction of the memorandum of association in one of the matters (capital) required to be stated in the memorandum, and that the article could not be allowed to vary or add to the memorandum; that the proposed application of the B capital was a misapplication of part of the capital, to which the creditors would have to look, for an object not being one of those stated in the memorandum, and could not be said to be conducive to the business of the company within the meaning of the usual clause to that effect stated in the memorandum.

It is only as regards matters affecting shareholders inter se, and which are not required by the Act to be stated in the memorandum, that the articles can be read as a contemporaneous document with the memorandum for the purpose of adding to the memorandum.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Chitty, J.

The defendant company was incorporated on the 12th of July, 1882, for the purpose of acquiring, farming and cultivating land in Ireland, and carrying on the business of a land and financial company in all its branches.

The memorandum of association stated the above-mentioned objects of the company at considerable length, and contained the usual clause enabling the company to do all such other things as the company may deem incidental or conducive to the attainment of any of the aforesaid objects of the company.

The capital of the company was stated to be 1,050,000*l.*, divided into 140,000 A shares of 5*l.* each, and 3,500 B shares of 100*l.* each.

The articles of association (so far as material) were as follows:—

"1. The regulations contained in Table A in the 1st schedule to the Companies Act, 1862, shall not apply to the company.

"Capital and Shares.

"5. The nominal original capital of the company is 1,050,000*l.*, divided into 140,000 A shares of 5*l.* each, and 3,500 B shares of 100*l.* each.

"7. The nominal original capital of the company, or so much thereof as shall have been issued from time to time, shall be held upon the following terms:—

"(a.) The holders of the 'A' shares shall be entitled to a preferential cumulative dividend out of the profits, if any, of the company, at the rate of five pounds per cent. per annum on the amounts for the time being paid up in respect of the 'A' shares, and such preferential dividend shall be further secured in the manner hereinafter provided. Subject to the payment of such preferential dividend the holders of the 'B' shares shall be entitled to a non-cumulative dividend out of the said profits, at the rate of five pounds per cent. per annum, on the amounts for the time being paid up in respect of the 'B' shares. And the surplus profits in any year over and above such dividends shall be divisible rateably among the holders of the 'A' shares and the holders of the 'B' shares, according to the amounts for the time being paid up in respect of such shares respectively.

"(b.) In the event of the company being wound up, the capital produced by the issue of 'B' shares remaining unapplied, and not required for payment of debts of the company, shall belong exclusively to the holders of the 'B' shares, and be distributed among them rateably without prejudice to their right to share in any distribution of surplus of the other assets after payment of debts.

"8. The capital produced by the issue of 'B' shares shall (subject to payment thereout of expenses hereby authorised to be so paid), as and when it is received by the company, be paid to the trustees of the company, upon trust to invest or lay out the same in any securities approved by the trustees, or on deposit with or without security, with power to vary the same, and to apply the income, and if and so far as may be necessary from time to time the proceeds of sale of capital forming the trust fund or any part thereof, so as to secure and make good to the holders of the 'A' shares the said preferential dividend, at the rate of five pounds per cent. per annum on the amounts for the time being paid up in respect of the 'A' shares; and, subject thereto, in trust to apply the income of the trust fund for the time being remaining unsold—first, in or towards replacing any capital previously sold; and, secondly, in distributing the same or the balance thereof among the holders of the 'B' shares rateably; and in the event of a winding-up of the company (subject to the liability to pay the debts of the company), upon trust, as to capital as well as income, for the holders of the 'B' shares rateably and exclusively, and the said trust fund or the income thereof shall in no case be used as working capital of the company. An order of the auditors or auditor for the time being of the company, countersigned by the secretary, addressed to the trustees, shall at any time be sufficient evidence to the trustees that such sum as is therein named is required to secure and make good to the holders of 'A' shares the said preferential dividend, and they shall thereupon pay such amount out of income of the trust fund, or if and so far as may be necessary out of capital produced by the sale of a competent part of the trust fund, to the company, and a receipt signed by two of the directors on behalf of the company shall be a sufficient discharge for the same.

"95. The board of directors are authorised, out of the funds of the company produced by issue of the B shares, to pay the necessary legal and other expenses of and incident to the promotion, formation and registration of the company, and all other preliminary expenses of the company.

"101. No dividend shall be payable except out of the profits of the business of the company or out of capital representing the 'B' shares in respect of the security hereby made for the payment of the preferential dividend on the 'A' shares."

The directors issued a prospectus stating fully the proposed application of the B capital, and giving the list of the subscribers to the B shares.

The directors proceeded to allot the shares, and between the 22nd of July and the 31st of October, 1,750 B shares—being the first issue of such shares—and also a large number of A shares were allotted.

The directors, in pursuance of the powers conferred by the articles, paid the sum of 13,000*l.*, part of the capital raised by the issue of B shares, to trustees for investment, as provided by the articles, and proposed to pay over further sums, and to apply the capital and its income in paying a dividend on the capital raised by the issue of the A shares.

A doubt having arisen as to the legality of the provisions with regard to the appropriation of the capital of the B shares in the manner provided by the articles, a friendly action was instituted for the purpose of determining the question. The action was brought by the holder of one B share, who sued on behalf of himself and all other the holders of B shares other than the defendants, against the company, the directors and a holder of 100 A shares as representing all A shareholders, claiming an injunction to restrain the company and directors from making any further allotment of A shares of the company upon the terms of the articles of association, and from paying the capital produced by the issue of B shares in the company, or any part thereof, to trustees upon trust to lay out the same in manner provided by the articles of association, so that the same and the income thereof shall not be used as working capital, and from applying the capital produced by the issue of B shares in payment of dividends on the A shares, and from doing any act to appropriate the capital produced by the B shares to objects other than those described in the memorandum of association.

The motion was heard before Chitty, J., on the 13th of November, 1882, who granted the injunction in the terms of the notice of motion.

The defendants appealed.

Macnaghten, Q.C., W. Barber, Q.C. (W. Latham with them), for the appellants.—The Judge below has treated the application of capital in the way directed as being an object of the company, and therefore to be mentioned in the memorandum, and also as a reduction of capital, and held the articles providing for such application to be ultra vires the company. But it was not an object of the company. It was merely a mode by which the objects of the company may be carried out, and need not be inserted in the memorandum—Anderson's Case (1).

Having regard to the present condition of Ireland, and the disinclination to invest on Irish securities, it is, in the opinion of the promoters, conducive to the objects of the company that capitalists should be tempted to come in by having a guarantee fund, and it is sufficiently covered by the clause enabling things conducive to the objects to be done.

There is no express prohibition against the payment of dividends out of capital. Table A may be, and is here, excluded. Such payment may be justified—for example, when concerns cannot be remunerative for some years; and this being fairly incidental to the main purpose of the company, although not literally within it, it is not prohibited, upon the principle laid down in The Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Company v. Riche (2). See observations of James, L.J., Lord Selborne and Lord Bramwell in The Attorney-General v. The Great Eastern Railway Company (3). See too Simpson v. The Westminster Palace Hotel Company (4).

[BOWEN, L.J.—The arrangement as to letting the hotel was only temporary—Lord Campbell relies on that, on p. 718.]

This also will very probably be only a temporary measure, until the company is well started; and see In re The Peruvian Railway Company (5). We submit that the cases decided under section 165 of the Companies Act, 1862—for example, McDougall v. The Jersey Imperial Hotel Company (6), Rance's Case (7), In re The Alexandra Palace Company (8), and In re The National Funds Assurance Company (9)—do not apply here. They were cases of dishonesty or mala fides, whereas in this case the proposal is distinctly for the benefit of the company, and bona fide.

The capital must be stated in the memorandum, but not its mode of application, and there is in this instance no inconsistency between the memorandum and articles, but only further information contained in the articles as to the capital —Anderson's Case (1); and the memorandum does divide the capital into A and B shares, and does not shew in what they differ, and this would compel persons to go further and consult the articles, which with the memorandum must be treated as two contemporaneous documents, within the principle of Anderson's Case (1) and Harrison v. The Mexican Railway Company (10). Then this was not a reduction of capital in the sense in which it is prohibited by the Companies Acts. See In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Company (11).

Ince, Q.C., and Buckley, for the respondent.—The proposed dealing with the capital of the company is not a matter only affecting shareholders, and which if ultra vires the directors is intra vires the company itself, but it is also ultra vires the company.

Upon the construction of the Act of 1862 there is a clear distinction between the functions of the memorandum and the articles. Sections 8 and 10 refer to the memorandum, requiring, in the case of limited companies, the amount of the capital to be stated on the memorandum, whereas in unlimited companies it is not required. In the latter case, every member being liable to the full extent of his fortune, the amount of the capital is immaterial to the creditor, while in the former the capital stated in the memorandum is what the creditor has to look to.

The articles are to contain everything in the nature of regulations for the internal management of the company.

Both Anderson's Case (1) and Harrison v. The Mexican Railway Company (10) were really cases where the articles of association were dealing with matters which ought not to have been in the memorandum at all, being matters merely between the shareholders, and in which the creditors of the company had no concern.

The alteration allowed by reading a contemporaneous instrument is only an alteration as between shareholders, as is shewn by Hutton v. The Scarborough Cliff Hotel Company (12), where it was decided that if no power was given by the memorandum to issue preference shares, such power could not be conferred by special resolution, as it amounted to an alteration of the basis of the company. A limited company by its memorandum declares that its capital is to be devoted to the purposes of the business, per Jessel, M.R., in Flitcroft's Case (13).

Here there is a withdrawal of a third of the entire capital to which the creditors would look from the purposes of the company, namely, farming and cultivating in Ireland, to the purpose of inducing people to take shares in the company; and the fact that the object is fair is immaterial—see McDougall v. The Jersey Imperial Hotel Company (6) and Holmes v. The Newcastle Freehold Abattoir Company (14). In the case of The Droitwich Patent Salt Company v. Curzon (15), a company incorporated before 1862, which had power to reduce its capital under its articles, registered itself under the Companies Act; and it was held to have thereby precluded itself from reducing its capital.

The liability of the members is to be defined by the memorandum, and this provision is to be strictly adhered to—section 6 of Act of 1862; Dent's Case (16). The only modification of the conditions of the memorandum allowed is pointed out by section 12. Under section 26 the return to the Registrar would comprise 3,500 B shares of 100*l.* each as part of the capital; whereas it was no share of the capital, but an outside guarantee fund.

They also referred to In re The Ebbw Vale Company (17) and Hope v. The International Financial Society (18).

Macnaghten, Q.C., in reply.—The course proposed cannot injure either shareholders or creditors. The only persons who could in any way be injured are the B shareholders; but it is their own scheme, and they concur. It is a common practice to spend a large part of the capital in advertisements for the purpose of obtaining shareholders, and this plan is only another mode of doing the same thing.

COTTON, L.J.—This case is of very great importance, and but for the full argument that we have heard, and the interval of time that has elapsed, probably we might have reserved our judgment upon the matter, but we are prepared to give it now. This company was formed, under its memorandum of association, with the object of acquiring, or rather of cultivating, land in Ireland. That is the general purpose; and the memorandum, as required by the Act of Parliament, states that the liability is limited, and what the capital of the company is to be. Now both the A and the B shares are referred to generally as the capital of the company, without anything to intimate that they are to be different from capital generally so described. I will consider afterwards what is the meaning of "capital" in the memorandum of association. When we come to the 8th article of association (and this is really the clause upon which the case turns) we find how the B capital is to be used.

This action is brought by one of the B shareholders to restrain the directors from any further issue of A shares on the footing of those shares being entitled to the benefit of the article, and to restrain the application of the capital arising from the B shares in accordance with article 8. I may say here, once for all, that everything has been done by the directors with the utmost fairness. What they proposed to do was fully stated in the prospectus which they put forward, and I have no doubt that they did it perfectly bona fide, for the purpose of securing what they thought was best under the circumstances for the company. But that the defendants the appellants have not argued the point, I should have felt a difficulty in interfering at the instance of a B shareholder who had taken his shares upon the footing of the prospectus, with full knowledge of what the articles were, and of what was their intended application. That has not in any way been argued, and as the parties naturally desire to have the decision of the Court, I think it is not necessary for the Court to raise any objection as to whether it is not fatal to an action by a B shareholder. Now, prima facie, what is proposed to be done by the directors applying the capital arising from the B shares in payment of a dividend of five per cent. on the A shares, is to apply that fund for something different from the business (to put it in that way first of all) which is authorised by the memorandum of association. It was said here, first of all, that that difficulty was removed in consequence of the clause in paragraph 3 of the memorandum of association—"and do all such other things as the company may deem incidental or conducive to the attainment of any of the aforesaid objects of the company." We did not hear the respondent upon that point. In my opinion that clause cannot assist the appellants. It was said that the company had, in the most decisive way they could, shewn their opinion that this was incidental and conducive to the attainment of the objects of the company, and that therefore it came within this clause; but, in my opinion, that will not prevail. To my mind the short answer is this: that this is not incidental and conducive to the attainment of the objects previously specified—the cultivation of land in Ireland—but to the object of getting shareholders who were as a company to carry out the objects, the acquisition and cultivation of land in Ireland. Cases were referred to, and there are two that I will mention. There is the case of Simpson v. The Westminster Palace Hotel Company (4), in which a company was formed to start what was then a novelty—a very large hotel. The directors let part of the hotel for a short time to a public board for the purpose of its being used by the Secretary of State for India. It was held that this letting did come within the description of something conducive and incidental to its business. It was not known how far such a large hotel would find business such as to make it profitable suddenly, and it was considered that letting for a short time to a public board might attract what was essential to an hotel—customers. The agreement also provided for doing some things which are incidental to carrying on the business of an hotel—namely, providing luncheons. But the decision was, as I understand it, that the agreement for a short time was, not embarking the business of the company in anything at variance with its objects, but merely the means of getting by this short employment of the hotel, customers, and was in fact conducive to carrying on in that large building the business of an hotel-keeper. In the other case—The Peruvian Railway Company v. The Thames, &c., Insurance Company (5) —which was referred to by Mr. Macnaghten, there was, I think, no power given expressly to draw bills of exchange, and it was held that the directors had power under the general clause in that case to draw bills of exchange; that that was the mode of providing for payment of their engagements for a short time while they were calling up the capital; and that that not being inconsistent with such a business as they were carrying on, it did fairly come within the clause of being conducive to carrying on the business of the company. But here the object is, not only at the inception of the company, but without limit as to time, to apply this whole fund for the purpose of providing a dividend which otherwise would not be available for the A shareholders. That, to my mind, is an entirely different case from the two cases which were relied upon. Then it was said that, independently of that clause, we ought not to limit too strictly powers of these large corporations for carrying on their business, and the judgment of Lord Justice James in the case of The Attorney-General v. The Great Eastern Railway Company (3) was referred to; but that case was essentially different, in my opinion, from the present case. There there was done that which was not strictly within the objects of the incorporation of the Great Eastern Railway Company, supplying and providing, for a sum to be paid to them, rolling stock for a railway which could only be effectively worked in conjunction with them, and it was the mode of carrying on the business of providing for the traffic going over both railways; but all that the observations of Lord Justice James meant, as applied to such a case, undoubtedly was that the directors of these companies had and ought to have a very large discretion. It was something done in the course of carrying on their business, and not something which was not done in carrying on their business, as the trying to induce persons (by offering them what was substantially an inducement) to come into a company which was to carry on that business. Then, that being so, one must see whether, putting aside those matters, the effect of the memorandum of association, having regard to the articles, is such as that the directors are acting ultra vires in applying, as they propose to do, this capital arising from the B shares. Now, it is necessary just shortly to state what the memorandum of association of a company is. Under section 6 of the Companies Act, 1862, any seven persons by signing the memorandum of association can incorporate themselves. It is not necessary, except in certain cases, that there should be any articles of association. The memorandum is essential for the purpose of the incorporation of the company. Then section 12 says that, except in certain points which are there mentioned, it shall not be in the power of the company in any way to alter the memorandum of association. Therefore the memorandum is the charter of incorporation — a charter which this company can in no way alter except in the matters mentioned in section 12, which I need not go through, as they have no application to the present case. Then we come to this, what is meant by "capital," the matter required to be stated in the memorandum, and what is the effect of the memorandum combined with the other sections of the Act of Parliament as regards capital? The section applicable to this company requires that the memorandum of association shall state the objects and the capital; of course we do not get any farther until we ascertain what is meant by "capital." It is curious that there is no express prohibition in the Act against capital being applied to any such purposes as is here pointed out; but I think we have something which will guide us in determining what is there meant by capital. To my mind, section 38, as to the liability of members, is one of the utmost importance. It is this—in a company like this, where the liability is limited, no member shall be liable to contribute to the assets beyond the amount unpaid on his shares; and that, I think, points to this—that the capital of the company, as mentioned in the memorandum, is to be the fund which is to regulate and determine the liability of the members in the event of the company being wound up. It follows that whatever has been paid by a member cannot be returned to him.

In my opinion there comes also this consequence, that that which is described in the memorandum as capital is that which cannot be diverted from the objects of the company. It is of course subject and liable to be spent or lost in carrying on the business of the company; but it cannot be returned to a member who if it were paid to him would be liable to have it called back again as what he had not already paid. It cannot be diverted so as to take away the fund which the creditors have a right to look to as that which they have to be paid out of. In former days there were proceedings against individuals, members of the company, and then that was altered by Parliament; but here there is no power at all on the part of creditors to get any remedy against the goods of the company but by winding up; and then we have to see what the capital as defined by this memorandum is, and then each shareholder is liable to the amount not paid up, including what, if anything, he has had returned. The consequence must be this—that the capital, as mentioned in the memorandum, cannot be diverted to any purpose other than the purposes and objects mentioned, cannot be taken away by those who have the management of the company (by employing it for those purposes by which it may be lost) from that which is the fund to which creditors have to look. Then what one has to consider is, whether the provision in these articles which provides for taking away part of that which is described as capital can vary the general rule on any reasonable ground, so that you can say here, "Notwithstanding what may be the general rule, this capital fund can be so applied." Now the argument, as I understand it, is this: Here we have two classes of shares mentioned, A and B shares; that necessarily requires some explanation; and then, for the purpose of controlling what would otherwise be the effect of the memorandum of association, we must look to the articles which define what the A and B shares are. In my opinion that cannot prevail. If there were here that which shewed that the B capital was not to be capital in the ordinary sense (as a fund applicable towards the business of the company as defined in the memorandum of association), but that it was to be (what here it is clearly) a guarantee fund, the matter would stand very differently; but no one from the mere statement that they were A and B shares would expect anything else than that there was some difference as regards priority as between the shareholders, and would treat both classes of shareholders as holding capital in the company. But here we find something very different. I think Mr. Macnaghten stated truly that here really these B shares were not capital to be employed in the ordinary way in carrying on the business, but were a guarantee fund for the purpose of securing that shareholders who should come into this company should be secured their dividends, at least while the company was being formed. If the articles alter or vary that which would be the result of the memorandum as it stands, can they be allowed to do so? In my opinion they cannot. A special resolution cannot alter the memorandum in any way. There is an express provision in section 12 of the Act of 1862, that the memorandum of association shall not be altered in such a matter as this, and (subject to the questions whether rights given to any class of shareholders may be taken away by a special resolution if they are given by the articles), in my opinion, the articles can no more alter that which is provided for in the memorandum (if that which is provided for is required to be provided for by the Act of Parliament) than a special resolution can. The matter is very different where a memorandum introduces (which is very seldom the case) that which the Act of Parliament does not require should be there stated. The Act of Parliament itself says that the memorandum as defining certain objects shall not be altered except as specified in clause 12 of the Act of Parliament. But there undoubtedly one is met by some observations, especially of the Master of the Rolls, which might seem to militate against that. There are two cases which have been referred to—one decided by the Master of the Rolls when sitting in the Rolls Court, which of course would not be binding upon us, and the other decided by him when sitting here in the Court of Appeal. The decision in the case of Harrison v. The Mexican Railway Company (10) really does not in any way affect what I have been laying down as what in my opinion is the law, because the matter there being dealt with was the mere question of the dividends payable to the shareholders, not the fund out of which they were to be paid, and that is a matter which the Act of Parliament does not require in any way to be dealt with in the memorandum of association, and it was not dealt with there. But there is one expression of the Master of the Rolls in giving judgment which was much relied upon, and which does give rise to some little difficulty. He says, "If the memorandum of association is silent upon the subject of the terms of the original contract under which the company was formed, then there is an implied condition that all the holders of shares are entitled to rank equally as regards dividends without any preference or priority between themselves; but if it does clearly appear upon the articles that that was not the meaning of the original contract, then there is no such implication of law as to the meaning of the memorandum of association, that implication being rebutted by the clear terms of the contemporaneous instrument." Now there, no doubt, he was referring to and dealing with matters which the Act of Parliament does not require to be stated in the memorandum. But really it is not any implication upon the construction of the memorandum, having regard to the Act of Parliament from which the equality of the shareholders as regards dividends arises, but it is an implication which the law raises as between partners unless their contract has provided the contrary. But here, in my opinion, the memorandum of association being required to state its objects, and being required to state the capital of the company with which those objects are to be carried into effect, there is on the Act of Parliament, and from the memorandum itself (not from the mere position in which the parties are put as partners), an implication both that the capital is not to be applied to any other purpose, and that it is not to be withdrawn, even although it is not to be applied to any other business. I think a little verbal alteration is perhaps necessary as regards that observation of the Master of the Rolls. In the other case, he himself in his judgment in Anderson's Case (1) expressly corrects it, because he says, "I am now speaking of those portions of the memorandum of association which the Act of Parliament requires to be stated in the memorandum. Something might be said upon that question; but all the Act of Parliament requires to be stated is the amount of capital for which the company is proposed to be registered divided into shares of a fixed amount. It does not prevent your stating that the shares are to be paid for partially in money and partially in property, or even partially in property and partially in remuneration of services." So that he confines his observations as to the purposes for which the articles can be looked to, to those objects which are not required by the Act of Parliament to be stated in the memorandum of association. But with regard to the purposes which the Act does require to be stated in the memorandum, in my opinion the articles cannot be referred to for the purpose of modifying or qualifying the conditions of the memorandum—which is the charter upon which the company is formed, its act of incorporation, that which is to regulate its objects, and what its capital is to be, and to fix that capital as that which is to be applied for those objects, and not to be withdrawn so as to prejudice the creditors who look to the capital for their safety and payment. That being so, I think there is but one other case to which I need refer, that of In re The Dronfield Coal Company (11), which was before this Court. That was a very different case. Here, as I have pointed out, all the fund arising from the B shares may go, as regards the articles, for the purpose, and the sole purpose, of paying the dividends on the A shares. It may be entirely exhausted; and there is, in my opinion, on the articles as they stand, a trust which would enable the A shareholders, if article 8 is valid, to claim payment, without any discretion on the part of the directors, of the dividend of five per cent., if there was nothing else to pay them, until the whole of this fund was exhausted. As to whether it can be varied by a special resolution, I give no opinion at the present moment, as it is not before us. Here we are dealing with it as it stands, and that is the result and effect of the very words of article 8. In re The Dronfield Coal Company (11) was this: There was a discretionary power to expend the capital of the company in buying shares. It was decided, I think, in the Court below upon two grounds—that that was enabling the company to traffic in shares, which was to engage in a new business, and also that it was a reduction of capital. The Court of Appeal came to a contrary decision upon those points; and this matter which we have now to consider does not seem to have been much considered. I need not go into the question of reduction of capital, because that case dealt with the reduction of capital as regards the Acts of 1867 and 1877; but there it was certainly a mode to enable the directors in their discretion to apply money (instead of resorting to forfeiture) to get rid of shareholders who caused difficulty, or the better to manage the internal arrangements of the company; and in that case, as it had been used for that purpose, and reasonably used —not used as the means of a cloak to diminish the capital—and the shares were not in any way cancelled or put an end to, but were reissuable, we were of opinion that that was an article which did give the power to the directors which they exercised, and that the person whose shares they bought was not to be considered as still a shareholder, on the ground that the directors had no power to enter into a bargain with him. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to the injunction which he asks, on the ground that this article is in fact a contradiction of the memorandum in one of those matters which the Act of Parliament requires the memorandum to state, and that the article, in attempting what it did attempt, was ultra vires, and could not in any way add to or vary the memorandum of association.

BOWEN, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion without any doubt at all, but not without some regret, because in the present case the effect of our decision is to prevent this company from doing that which everybody no doubt wishes it to do, or at all events that upon the expectation of which everybody has subscribed his money. I agree with Mr. Macnaghten that, under such circumstances, the only real and governing question is, whether what is sought to be done has been in fact prohibited by the Legislature. It seems to me, upon the best conclusion I can come to upon the matter, that the Legislature has prohibited what the directors in this company seek to do, and that they accordingly must be restrained by the Court from doing it. The prohibition which, I think, bars the way to the carrying out of this scheme is that which is contained in section 12 of the Companies Act of 1862, which prevents companies from making alterations in the conditions contained in the memorandum of association. It is said by those who seek to restrain the company that the article of association to which reference has been made is in fact an alteration of the conditions contained in the memorandum of association. Now it is not necessary, in the year 1882, to point out the significant distinctions that obtain between the memorandum of association and the articles of association. A company which registers itself under the sections of the Act of 1862, which deals with companies limited by shares, can only obtain vitality by complying exactly with the conditions which the Legislature makes. It has no sort of power outside that which the Act of Parliament gives it. The Act of Parliament has prescribed in the first place with regard to such companies, that, although they may have, subject to certain exceptions, power to decide on their own internal regulations, there shall be certain fixed conditions by which they are limited as regards the outside world. Now, in the first place, a company which is limited by shares must in its memorandum, according to section 8, set forth the objects for which the proposed company is to be established, and also the amount of capital with which the company proposes to be registered divided into shares of a certain that the Court may turn to those articles to see whether they cannot supplement, so to speak, the memorandum of association, and for this particular purpose read with it the articles of association. Now with regard to that I desire to say one word only, as to how far it seems to me the articles of association may be looked at and read together with the memorandum of association. I do not agree that the 5th sub-section of the present memorandum of association gives any indication that the articles of association are to be looked to. I think it would be finding far more than there is in sub-section 5 of the memorandum, if one were to extract that meaning from it. There is an essential difference between the memorandum and the articles. The memorandum contains the fundamental conditions upon which alone the company is allowed to be incorporated, or to carry on its incorporated business. They are provisions introduced for the benefit of the creditors and the outside public, as well as the shareholders. The articles of association are the internal regulations of the company. How can you say that in all cases you have a right to construe together the fundamental conditions of the charter of incorporation of the company with its internal regulations? Harrison v. The Mexican Railway Company (10) was cited as shewing that the Master of the Rolls was willing to read the two together; but the distinction which Mr. Buckley points out is obvious, that in that case the matter involved was a matter with which the creditors had no concern whatever, and the criticism may be, so far as concerns the creditors, "You ought to look to the memorandum." Whether it is necessary now to put the proposition in that broad shape may be perhaps even questionable; but certain it is that, for anything which the Act says shall be in the memorandum, you must look to the memorandum alone. If the Legislature has said that one instrument is to be dominant, you cannot turn to another instrument and read it in order to modify the provisions of that instrument to which the Legislature has given the all-important position. But Mr. Macnaghten goes on to say in his argument that it is really only by an accident, so to speak, of legislation, by reason of the presence of the Act of 1862, section 38, that the directors of the company are prevented at all from devoting capital to the payment of a dividend. He says that he can conceive cases in which it would be perfectly lawful to apply capital for the purposes of dividend, and that if you take the Companies Act, 1862, and observe the provisions of that Act, and observe also the provisions of the present Act, and see that the company is entitled to modify any of the internal regulations contained in Table A at the end of the Act, and then turn to Table A, you find that in Table A there is an express provision (which he says may be modified under the Act, if the company desire it) that the dividends are not to be paid out of the capital. From that, argues Mr. Macnaghten, it is not a fundamental condition, so to speak, of the Act, or a fundamental condition of the incorporation of the company, that it shall not pay dividends out of capital; but it arises from the statutory legislation under section 38, so far as section 38 would affect the case. He says that he could conceive cases in which the thing might be lawful. It is always, it seems to me, unwise for a Judge to pronounce an opinion about cases outside the particular area which is under discussion. In answer to Mr. Macnaghten's suggestion, I can only reply thus, that I have not at this moment present to my mind any case in which it might be lawful; but, of course, I should be very sorry to assert the negative. I do not know at the present moment of any case in which the payment of a dividend out of capital would be justifiable, except in the very remote and unlikely contingency of the memorandum of association providing that that should be done. If any memorandum of association is ever drawn in that shape (of which I doubt the probability) it will be time to consider how far that enables the company to do it. Mr. Macnaghten has also pointed out with great force that there is a considerable difficulty in supposing this to fall under the class of cases which deal with reduction of capital. He says that this is not a case of reduction of capital at all. I do not put it as a case of reduction of capital, but it is a withdrawal of capital if anything. Reduction of capital may mean reduction of nominal capital—very likely it does. In In re The Dronfield Silkstone Coal Company (11) the Court appear so to have read the Act. But in this case it is objectionable, not on the ground that this is a reduction of capital, but is a withdrawal of capital from the objects for which the company was incorporated to carry on its business; and if it might be done in this case, I think one might defy the ingenuity of the counsel for the appellants to point out where is the limit and when it will ever be that in any case a company may not do it. That being my view of the law, let me for one moment consider what these articles propose to do. They propose to take a portion of the capital paid up in respect of the B shares, and to apply it to the payment of dividend in respect of the A shares. Is that an object of the company? I think Mr. Macnaghten, if I may respectfully say so, falls into a fallacy when he supposes that this is the question we have to decide. It may be that that application of the capital of the B shares could not be such an object of the company as could be stated conveniently in the memorandum of association; but that does not seem to me to get rid of the difficulty. The question is, not whether this application of the fund is an object of the company which is not stated in the memorandum, but rather whether it is not a misapplication of the capital to something which is not an object stated in the memorandum. That is a different question altogether. How can this possibly be said to be an application of the capital to an object of the company? The real object is by means of this expenditure of the B capital to float the company, and to make the A shares shares which will be readily taken by the public.

Not a word that I am saying could by any ingenuity be construed into anything like a censure on the gentlemen who conduct the business of this company, or as a doubt upon the good faith and honour with which they have acted from first to last; that does not really require vindication on my part. But, for all that, what they are doing when they propose to apply money in this way is not to carry on the business of the company, but to offer an incentive to persons to subscribe money with which to carry on the business of the company. It is not carrying on the business of the company, it is providing a bait in order to induce people to form the company to carry on the business. But, if it is not an application of the money to the objects of the company direct, is it incidental to the objects, or conducive to the objects, or what might reasonably be thought so? Mr. Macnaghten has put the case of advertisements. That seems to me to be wholly different. Every tradesman who does his business on business principles advertises, and every company which proposes to obtain subscribers for its capital advertises. If advertisements are issued in the ordinary way of the business of a company it seems to me that they are incidental to carrying out the objects of the company; but there is a limit to the powers of the directors to spend the money of the company in attracting shareholders. Suppose we were to disengage ourselves from the atmosphere of respectability and honour in which this company lives and moves, and to take the case, not of the Land Corporation of Ireland, but of some silver mine in a distant part of the world, which is put forward with a flourish of trumpets, the silver of which, however, exists probably only in the imagination of enthusiasts. I should like to know what the public would have a right to say, if, although they found that in the memorandum of association there was no provision for applying the capital of one portion of the shares to the payment of dividends upon the other portion, nevertheless in the articles of association such a supplementary provision had been introduced. I cannot see how one could possibly hold that the present appellants were entitled to do what they seek to do, without, so to speak, enabling every adventurers' company—yes, and every dishonest company, or company managed by dishonest directors—to drive a coach-and-four through the Act of Parliament. I deeply regret having to come to this conclusion, because these gentlemen are managing an honourable business and wish to do so in their own way; but the Act of Parliament is plain, and I think they cannot do what they seek to do without flying in the face of that Act of Parliament.

MARSH v. EARL GRANVILLE.

Vendor and Purchaser—Condition of Sale—Misleading Condition.

A condition of sale provided that the commencement of title should be an indenture which was a conveyance not for value of real and leasehold property on trust for the donor for life and then for sale, with power for the donor to revoke the trusts:—Held, that the condition was misleading by reason of its not stating the nature of the deed.

The trustees of the will of Mathew H. Marsh contracted with Earl Granville for the sale to him of certain freehold and leasehold property. One of the conditions of sale provided—"The titles will commence" . . . . "and as to the freehold portion of the estate, with an indenture dated the 18th day of October, 1845, and made between Henry Gawler of the one part and the Reverend Francis John Courtenay and Edward Harrison of the other part. The earlier titles, whether appearing by recital, covenant for production or otherwise, or not appearing at all, and the lessee's title to the leasehold premises, shall not be investigated or objected to."

The indenture of 1845 was a statutory release by which Henry Gawler conveyed inter alia the freeholds, the subject of the present contract, to the Rev. F. J. Courtenay and E. Harrison as trustees. The deed comprised some leasehold property. The consideration for the conveyance was expressed to be 10*s.*; the trusts declared were for Henry Gawler for life, and after his death on trust to sell and hold the proceeds of the sale and the rents and profits in the meanwhile on the trusts declared by a deed of even date. And it was provided that the said Henry Gawler might by deed revoke the trusts and declare fresh trusts of the property.

Henry Gawler died in 1852. The trustees of the indenture of 1845 in 1858 conveyed the property to Mathew Henry Marsh, by a deed which recited that they were selling in execution of the trust of the deed of 1845. A requisition was made on the part of the purchaser that "the conveyance of the 18th of October, 1845, is in part a settlement on the grantor, in part a voluntary conveyance to trustees for sale with trust of the sale moneys declared by a contemporaneous deed, and it contains a power to the grantor to revoke the trusts, which would include the trust for sale. Such a deed is not a good root of title, and a good forty years' title must be deduced."

This was a summons by the vendors under the Vendors and Purchasers Act, 1874, to determine whether Earl Granville was entitled to insist on that and another requisition.

Giffard, Q.C., and Smart, for the summons.—The deed of 1845 was not a voluntary conveyance, because it comprised leaseholds, and the obligations to perform the covenants were sufficient consideration—Price v. Jenkins (1)—to take it out of the statute of Elizabeth. Supposing, however, the deed were voidable, it never had been avoided; and a recital to that effect contained in a deed of 1858 is, under the Vendors and Purchasers Act, to be taken as conclusive on that point. Such a deed would form a good root of a forty years' title—Preston on Abstracts (2) and Hayes on Conveyancing (3); and there is no reason why if a shorter title is stipulated for it should not equally form a good root of title. Had the exact nature of the deed been specified there would have been nothing to deter an intending vendor from his purpose. Therefore the condition was in no way misleading.

Marsh v. Earl Granville.

Cookson, Q.C., and W. E. Mozley, for the respondent.—The question is to be tried in the same way as in an action for specific performance—In re Burroughs (4)—where it is sought to force a title on an unwilling purchaser, which the Court will not do where there is a misleading condition. Considerable doubt has been thrown on the case of Price v. Jenkins (1) and In re Ridler; Ridler v. Ridler (5). The question is not, however, really whether the deed was voidable, but whether the true nature of it ought not to have been disclosed, whether the nature of the deed was not a fact that might fairly influence an intending purchaser if he had known it; if so it clearly ought to have been particularised—Preston on Abstracts (2), Dart on Vendors and Purchasers (6), Bythewood and Jarman's Conveyancing (7) and In re Banister (8).

Giffard, Q.C., replied.

FRY, J.—The question which arises is this: Is the description given of the indenture of 1845 in the condition of sale sufficient to enable the vendors to force the title upon Earl Granville without shewing a forty years' title? I would observe that the form of requisition and the form of summons to some extent suggest that if the condition is not binding the purchaser is entitled to a forty years' title. That is not in my view strictly correct. The right of the purchaser is to revoke or to rescind the sale, or to refuse to complete; but he may refuse to complete subject to the condition which he may impose—namely, that he will complete if the forty years' title be shewn. That is his option, and not his right, if the vendor declines to disclose it—that is to say, he has no right to call for the forty years' title. The principle applicable to the decision of the question appears to me to be not in dispute. According to the view I take, a vendor who desires to limit the rights of a purchaser must do so by explicit and plain conditions; and he must tell the truth, and all the truth, relevant to the matter in hand. Now the reasons for that are twofold. In the first place, as I have observed on a former occasion, the vendor knows the condition of the title and the purchaser does not, and that puts upon him the burden of being very explicit in his description. In the next place the descriptions in the contract or conditions of sale are the only materials which the purchaser has for deliberating upon before he enters into the purchase. He knows as much as is told him and no more, and therefore he ought to be put into possession of everything, so far as it is touched upon by the conditions of sale, which is likely to influence his mind in determining whether he will buy or no. Now the deed of 1845 is a peculiar one in this sense—it is not an ordinary settlement, it is not an ordinary conveyance upon a sale, but it was a deed, if not voluntary, for consideration only because certain leaseholds were included in it; and under the doctrine of Price v. Jenkins (1) that may prevent its being treated as absolutely a voluntary conveyance. But subject to that it was voluntary, it contains an express power of revoking the trusts of the indenture. It was, therefore, not a dealing between parties at arms' length; it was in substance, though not perhaps actually in form, for the most part a voluntary conveyance. It was capable of revocation under the power, and it was possibly, according to what I am told has been the intimation and expression of opinion by some Judges since Price v. Jenkins (1), revocable under the statute of Elizabeth. It appears to me that placed the burden on the vendor of disclosing something more than he did. He merely stated that it was an indenture of that kind. I think he ought to have intimated the general nature of the instrument; I think so because it is evident that a person contemplating purchasing would be more or less influenced by the nature of that instrument. If it had been a dealing between persons at arms' length, there would have been more security in taking the short title than there would be under the circumstances of this case.

Then it is contended by the learned counsel for the vendors that under the particular circumstances of the case the matter became immaterial, because it is said that the recital in the deed of 1858 precludes the purchaser from raising the question as to the revocation, and that therefore it is just as good as any other conveyance. But that very circumstance shews very strongly that the purchaser ought to have been in possession of the fact, in order that he might know whether he would submit to be bound by such a recital if it should appear.

[His Lordship, after deciding against the purchaser on the other requisition, proceeded:]

It must be plainly understood that what I declare is this, not that the earl is entitled to the forty years' title, but that you cannot compel him to complete unless you yield to his requisition with regard to the forty years' title, and that had better be included in the declaration.

NICHOLSON v. SMITH.

Renewable Lease—Covenant for Renewal—Conditions Precedent—Compliance with Conditions.

A lease for twenty-one years, granted in pursuance of covenants for renewal, contained a covenant by the lessors that they would "from time to time before the expiration of the term thereby granted, whenever thereunto required by the lessees, and upon receiving from them" a fine of 1,000*l.*, grant to the lessees a new lease, the lessees executing a counterpart, and paying the expense of the lease and counterpart, and paying to the lessors "on the execution thereof respectively" a fine of 1,000*l.*; and every such new lease was to contain a covenant for renewal, "it being the intention of the parties that the lease should be renewable for ever at the option of the lessees, in pursuance of the covenant in the lease."

The lease also contained a covenant by the lessees that if they should not "before the expiration of the term avail themselves of the option of requiring a new lease, and on the execution of the new lease pay the fine of 1,000*l.*," then the lessees would, previous to the expiration of the term, perform certain works upon the demised premises, so as at the expiration of the term to render up a good dwelling-house:—

Held, that the payment of the fine and the execution of the new lease before the expiration of the existing term were not conditions precedent to the lessees' right to a renewal, but that a requisition by the lessees within the term was a condition precedent, and that a letter from the secretary of a company and of trustees of a guarantee fund, such company and trustees being the persons interested in the lease, written to one of several trustees of one moiety of the freehold being also tenant for life of the other moiety, was a sufficient compliance with this condition to entitle the lessees to renewal.

By a lease of the 29th of September, 1818, Thomas Garle demised to G. A. Robinson and three other persons, as trustees for the Globe Insurance Company, in consideration of a fine of 1,000*l.*, a messuage and premises, formerly called the Royal Point, on the south side of Cornhill in the city of London, for twenty-one years from the 24th of June, 1818, at a yearly rent of 100*l.* The lease contained a lessors' covenant for renewal, identical, except in some immaterial details, with that contained in the lease of 1860 stated below, and a lessees' covenant to restore the premises as a dwelling-house before the expiration of the term.

Thomas Garle died in 1832, and by a lease dated the 20th of June, 1839, but executed (as the plaintiffs in the action alleged) after the 24th of June, the previously demised premises were demised by Thomas Garle, the son of Thomas Garle the elder, to H. Rowles and three other persons (four of the directors and trustees of the Globe Insurance Company), in consideration of a fine of 1,000*l.* in pursuance of the covenant of renewal, for a further term of twenty-one years, from the 24th of June, 1839, at the same yearly rent as before. The lease contained similar covenants to those in the former lease.

Thomas Garle, the son, died in 1856, and by a lease dated the 24th of June, 1860, but executed (as the plaintiffs alleged) on the 17th of September, 1860, the persons entitled under the will of Thomas Garle the elder, after the death of Thomas Garle the son, to the freehold of the demised premises, demised the same premises to J. E. Johnson and three other persons (directors and trustees of the Globe Insurance Company), in consideration of a fine of 1,000*l.*, and in pursuance of the covenant for renewal in the lease of 1839, for twenty-one years, from the 24th of June, 1860, at the same yearly rent as before.

The lease contained a covenant by the lessors that they would from time to time, before the expiration of the term thereby granted, and also at any time before the expiration of every succeeding term to be granted by every renewed lease, whenever thereunto required by the lessees, or other the persons for the time being possessed of the interest in the term thereby granted, or in every succeeding term to be granted by every such renewed lease, and upon receiving from them the fine thereinafter mentioned, grant to the lessees, or other the persons for the time being possessed of the interest in the term thereby granted, or in such succeeding term as aforesaid, or to such other persons as they should direct and appoint, a new lease of the demised premises for a further term of twenty-one years, to commence from the expiration of the term thereby granted, or of other the term which should for the time being have been last granted in pursuance of this covenant, but subject to the same yearly rent, lessees' covenants, &c.: the lessees for the time being executing a counterpart of every such renewed lease for the time being, and paying the whole expense of such renewed lease and counterpart, and paying also to the lessors, their, his or her heirs or assigns, on the execution thereof respectively a fine of 1,000*l.* And in every such renewed lease should be contained a lessors' covenant to renew the said lease from time to time at or before the end of every twenty-one years, upon the request of the lessees, and upon receiving a like fine of 1,000*l.* upon each such renewal, such respective leases to be at the same rent and to contain the same covenants as in the present lease, including the covenant or covenants for renewal, it being the intention of the parties that the present lease should be renewable for ever at the option of the lessees, their executors, administrators or assigns, in pursuance of the covenant in the lease of 1818.

The lease also contained a lessees' covenant that if they, or other the persons possessed for the time being of the interest in the term thereby granted, should not before the expiration of the term avail themselves of the option of requiring a new lease, or should not accept such new lease and execute a counterpart thereof, and pay the whole expense of such new lease and counterpart, and on the execution of the new lease pay the fine of 1,000*l.*, then the lessees would, previous to the expiration of the term thereby granted, perform certain specified works on the demised premises, so as at the expiration of the term thereby granted to render up a substantial family dwelling-house.

At the end of the year 1862 the business of the Globe Insurance Company was transferred to the Liverpool and London Insurance Company (which afterwards acquired by Act of Parliament the name of the Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Company), and by the amalgamation agreement it was provided that stock of the Liverpool and London Company should be issued to shareholders in the Globe Company in lieu of their shares, and holders of such stock so issued should be given an option of exchanging it for a perpetual annuity, and that investments and securities to the value of 1,000,000*l.* should be transferred to the five trustees of a guarantee fund (afterwards commonly known as the Million Fund), who were to hold the same, on trust, in the first place to ensure the payment by the company of the perpetual annuities; and, subject to that primary trust, in trust for the company as part of their general assets and revenue. This arrangement was afterwards sanctioned by Act of Parliament.

In 1865 the leasehold interest in the demised premises was assigned to the trustees of the Million Fund as part of their investments.

In the year 1881 the freehold interest in the demised premises was vested, as to one undivided moiety, in Louisa Garle, George Smith and Edward V. Thompson, as trustees and joint tenants; and as to the other undivided moiety, in George Smith for life, with remainder to his wife Mary Ann Smith for life, with remainder to the same three trustees and joint tenants as the other moiety.

On the 23rd of June, 1881, no steps had been taken by the directors of the insurance company or the trustees of the Million Fund to obtain a renewal of the lease, though in March, 1880, and May, 1881, informal communications on the subject had taken place between some of the trustees and their secretary; but on that day George Smith, one of the freeholders above-mentioned, wrote to the directors of the company, calling their attention to the fact that the lease would expire next day; and on the same day Mr. A. Hendricks, who was the secretary both of the company and of the trustees, replied to Mr. Smith in a letter, in which he stated that "acknowledging receipt of your letter of this date, I have to state that the directors are of course prepared to renew the lease." Mr. Smith wrote again next day saying, that as the lease had been allowed to expire without compliance with the conditions of renewal, he must take his solicitors' advice. Further correspondence ensued, and the freeholders ultimately refused to grant a renewed lease. It appeared that Mrs. Louisa Garle had no knowledge of the correspondence between Mr. Smith and Mr. Hendricks till after the 24th of June.

On the 20th of August, 1881, Sir C. Nicholson and the four other trustees of the Million Fund (of whom two were also directors of the company) brought the present action against Mr. and Mrs. Smith and the former's co-trustees, alleging that they had done all that was necessary to entitle them to a renewal of the lease, and claiming specific performance of the renewal covenant in the lease of 1860.

This was the hearing of the action with witnesses.

Davey, Q.C., Kingdon and Wolstenholme, for the plaintiffs.—The contention which is to be raised on behalf of the defendants is, that the plaintiffs have lost their right to insist on a renewal of the lease by not having, before the expiration of the term, paid the 1,000*l.* fine and executed the new lease. But neither of those matters is made a condition precedent by the covenant. The covenant is favourable to the lessees, giving them a right to call for renewal at any time during the period of the lease, even before its expiration. There is no condition precedent at all; it was not even necessary for the lessees to declare during the term their intention of exercising their option of renewal. It was the duty of the lessors to offer a new lease for execution—Wentworth v. Wentworth (1), Lawson v. Widdrington (2), 6 Petersdorff's Abr. (3) and Bothy's Case (4).

Leases for years are different from leases for lives, as in the former case payment of interest is a sufficient compensation for overstepping the time, while in the latter case a life must be put in within the time, so that the lessor may have the chance of its dropping—McAlpine v. Swift (5) and The City of London v. Mitford (6).

The essence of the contract is to grant a new lease if desired, with an option to the lessees to give it up; and even if a request for renewal is necessary, it is not a condition precedent — Rawstorne v. Bentley (7), Harries v. Bryant (8), Finch v. Underwood (9) and Bastin v. Bidwell (10).

The request not being a condition precedent, equity will relieve against any consequences of delay in its being made, if there has been any—Lennon v. Napper (11), which has been adopted in England

Roberts v. Berry (12), Maxwell v. Ward (13), Tilley v. Thomas (14) and Allen v. Hilton (15).

If the words of the covenant do not distinctly make the various requirements conditions precedent they will be construed against the covenantors—that is, as not doing so Rubery v. Jervoise (16).

The continued possession of the premises by the lessees after the expiration of the lease of 1860 was a sufficient intimation of their intention to renew to entitle them to specific performance of the covenant for renewal Dowell v. Dew (17), Mills v. Haywood (18) and Fry on Spec. Perf. (19).

If there was a necessity for a definite request, that need not be in writing, nor within any particular time Maxwell v. Ward (13). But if it must have been in writing, then the letter written by Mr. Hendricks on the 23rd of June was a sufficient written request, and was made in time. The directors were the cestuis que trust of the trustees, subject to the prior annuities, and Hendricks was secretary to both bodies Austin v. Tawney (20).

Higgins, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the defendants. There were two conditions precedent which the plaintiffs were bound to perform before the expiration of the old term, if they were to be entitled to a renewal namely, first, payment of the fine, and, secondly, actual execution of the new lease. Time is of the essence of the contract [illegible] and [illegible] (15).

It was for the lessees to prepare the new lease, and tender it in time for it to be executed in time—Stephens v. De Medina (24).

Even if it should be held that actual execution of the lease before the end of the term was not necessary, at all events it was necessary for a proper written request to be made and the fine paid before then, and time was made of the essence—Fry on Spec. Perf. (25) and Bateman v. Murray (26).

When time is of the essence of the contract, and it is not a question of penalty or forfeiture, but one of privilege, the Court will not relieve against the consequences of the lessee's own neglect—Lord Ranelagh v. Melton (22), Brooke v. Garrod (27), Weston v. Collins (23), Finch v. Underwood (9) and Thompson v. Hudson (28).

The notice had to be given in strict accordance with the terms of the covenant, by the persons entitled to the benefit of the renewal, to the persons entitled to the reversion in the land—Joy v. Birch (29).

The letter written by Hendricks was not written to all the lessors, but only to one of them, and it was therefore bad as a notice—Doe v. Watkins (30).

It was also bad, as not being written on behalf of the trustees, but on behalf of the directors, who are not the same persons—Little v. [illegible] (31).

Moreover, it was written by Hendricks without any express previous authority from either body; and without such authority he could not act in such a matter as this—Doe v. Worsley (32) and The [illegible] Second Benefit Building [illegible] (33).

plaintiffs an indulgence, they must pay the costs of obtaining it.

Wolstenholme, in reply.

PEARSON, J.—I am much indebted to counsel for their arguments in this case. The question is a question whether the plaintiffs are, or are not, entitled to have a renewal of a lease of certain valuable premises in Cornhill, to a renewal of which they are entitled if they have exercised the option which was given them under the lease under which they hold the premises. The whole question really and truly depends upon the construction of the covenant to renew, which is at present to be found in the lease of 1860, which was the second renewal of the lease of 1818, and which expired on the 24th of June, 1881. [His Lordship read the covenants in the lease and stated the facts as above, and continued:]

Now it is said on the part of the plaintiffs that, assuming that they gave no notice before the 24th of June—assuming, that is, that the notice given by Mr. Hendricks was an insufficient and invalid notice—nevertheless they are entitled to renewal of the lease, because, they say, first of all, that the words "whenever thereunto required" do not constitute a condition precedent, that it was not necessary to their obtaining a new lease that they should have made any request before the 24th of June, and that, even if it was necessary that they should have made a request before the 24th of June, nevertheless, if the lessors were to bring an action of ejectment after the 24th of June, it would be a sufficient answer to that action to say—"although we made no request before the 24th of June, we are perfectly willing to accept a lease now, and you must therefore grant us a lease now, and all that you can claim from us is this—that, inasmuch as there has been a delay in paying the premium of 1,000*l.*, we must pay interest upon that sum from the time when it ought to have been paid;" and they say that this Court is entitled to extend the time for making the requisition, even if a requisition was necessary, upon the ground that the Court can do perfect justice between the parties by requiring them to pay interest upon the 1,000*l.* from the time when they ought to have paid it. They say that the substance of the whole agreement is this—that there was to be a perpetual lease of the land in question, subject to this, that at the end of every twenty-one years there was to be a payment of a fine of 1,000*l.*; and that being the substance, the Court would not insist (where there has been no misconduct on their part, and where there has been no intentional delay, where there has been no playing fast and loose with the bargain) upon that requisition, or the absence of it, as fatal to their right to renewal, but would treat the covenant as giving them a right to have a renewed lease upon payment of the 1,000*l.* now and the interest.

On the other hand, it is said that, if you read this covenant properly, there were two things that were absolutely necessary to the plaintiffs' obtaining a renewal of the lease. The first was that there should be a request for a renewal before the expiry of the term; and the second was that the 1,000*l.* should also have been paid before the twenty-one years' term granted by the lease of 1860 came to an end.

I do not agree with either of the parties upon the construction of the lease. I certainly do not agree with what the defendants say, that there is anything whatever in this agreement that could require the payment of the 1,000*l.* before the expiry of the twenty-one years' lease. On the contrary, I think it very plain that there is no stipulation of that kind. There is a most complete distinction made between the requisition, assuming the requisition to be necessary before the expiry of the term, and the payment of the 1,000*l.*, because, adopting the argument of the defendants that the requisition was to be made during the continuance of the twenty-one years, the stipulation with regard to the payment of the 1,000*l.* is, that it is to be paid on the execution of the lease, and I think I should be making the agreement between them simply a vexatious agreement if I were to say that it was absolutely necessary that the lease should be engrossed and executed before the expiration of the term of twenty-one years. I find it most distinctly stated, in the first place, that the requisition, giving it the strict construction which the defendants put upon it, is to be made at any time before the expiration of the lease; and further, that there is to be a covenant in every renewed lease that the lessors will renew at the expiration of the twenty-one years' term thereby granted. If they renew at the expiration of the twenty-one years' term, then, looking to the clause which says that the 1,000*l.* is to be paid "on the execution" of the new lease, it seems to me impossible to hold that the 1,000*l.* is to be paid before the previous lease has actually come to an end. I think the intention of both parties was that at the expiration of the lease, if not before, but at all events at the expiration of the lease, there was, at the option of the lessees, to be a new lease granted, and that whenever the document had been prepared and came to be executed, the payment of the 1,000*l.* was to be made eo instanti. This is further confirmed by the other covenant, which provides that, if the lessees shall not avail themselves of the option (which cannot be decided until the expiry of the lease), or if, having availed themselves of the option, they shall not pay the 1,000*l.* (which cannot be ascertained until the lease is tendered to them for execution, and they then refuse to pay the 1,000*l.*), then certain events are to follow—that is to say, the lessees are then to be bound to restore the house into a dwelling-house. I therefore dismiss altogether from my consideration that requirement upon which the defendants relied—namely, that the 1,000*l.* ought to have been paid before the expiration of the term.

There remains the more serious question, whether or not the requisition for the new lease was not to be made, and must not, in order to be properly made, have been made within the term of twenty-one years. Now, in Mr. Davey's opening, which was, like his usual arguments, very clear and very able, Mr. Davey pressed me very strongly with an authority which is certainly more like this case in many respects than any other case—namely, the case of Lennon v. Napper (11), which contains a great deal of what was certain to be and is extremely valuable as coming from Lord Redesdale. In the passage from which Mr. Davey read to me, Lord Redesdale, speaking of a case which related to a renewal of a lease, says this (p. 685): "The meaning of the parties to these contracts is to secure a continuance of the tenure, and rent, and payment of the fines, and to prevent a conversion of the tenure, by enjoyment without renewal, into a fee farm; for, notwithstanding the payment of rent, if there was to be no renewal from time to time, the presumption of a fee farm would arise; and where the covenant for renewal is upon a peppercorn fine, which is often the case, the preservation of the tenure, and of the remedies for the rent, must be the only object." Then Lord Redesdale, stating with very great accuracy the doctrines of this Court with regard to contracts of sale, applies to the case of a renewal of a lease the same equity which the Court is in the habit of applying daily to contracts for sale, and says that, where the Court sees that the substance of a contract is the payment of money, the Court will not allow the contract to be avoided simply because there has been a delay in the payment of purchase-money, seeing that the delay can be fully compensated for by the payment of interest. But looking at the case of Lennon v. Napper (11), I am of opinion that that passage which I have read must be held to apply to the practice of the Court in Ireland with regard to the renewal of leases, a practice which, at the time when Lord Redesdale delivered his judgment, had been, I think I am not wrong in stating, so wild that the Legislature thought it right to restrain it by an Act of Parliament, which was professedly passed for the purpose of stating under what circumstances only leases might be renewed, and in fact, so far as I understand it, limiting the power which the Irish Court of Chancery had exercised formerly of granting indiscriminately renewals of leases, when the time within which they ought properly to have been renewed had lapsed. I do not think I should be justified in importing that practice or founding my practice upon the statement of Lord Redesdale in that case, more especially when I find in another case in the year 1807, decided by Lord Eldon, and to which Mr. Davey also referred me—The City of London v. Mitford (6)—Lord Eldon says (p. 58), "I shall not notice the cases farther than by observing that there is a great distinction between this and the cases upon leases for lives, and that where there has been default of this kind in making a request, unless it has been excused by circumstances, there is no authority for decreeing a specific performance." I confess that, looking to this document, looking to what was the manifest intention of the parties, namely, that if the lessees desired it there should be a renewal of the lease, I should be exceedingly willing, if I thought I had the power, to adopt Lord Redesdale's view. I think that in a case where, as in the present case, there had been a manifest slip with regard to giving notice for renewal of the lease, where the intention of both parties was that upon payment of a fine of 1,000*l.* the lease should be continued in perpetuity, I should be only doing justice to the parties in saying, if I were justified in so doing, that the proper construction of the lease was that if, even after the expiration of the lease, within any reasonable time (there being no misconduct in the lessees, there being no attempt on their part to do anything that was tricky or treatherous) they agreed to accept the lease, they ought to have the right to do it. But I do not feel myself justified by what I believe to have been the practice and the decisions of this Court to adopt Lord Redesdale's views. I think I am bound, therefore, to hold that it was necessary, under the covenant in this lease, that there should be a request made, that the option of the lessees should be exercised, during the continuance of the lease, and upon this ground—that I think that, according to the doctrine in this country, the lessor was entitled at the expiration of the lease, at the moment when the lease expired, to know whether he had a tenant or whether he must look out for a tenant.

But it is further argued on the part of the plaintiffs that there has been a sufficient notice given. Now the notice which was given was this—On the 23rd of June, 1881, the day before the lease expired, Mr. Smith wrote this letter to the directors of the Globe Insurance Company—"As one of the joint owners with Mrs. Louisa Garle of property in Cornhill, for which you pay a rent of 100*l.* a year, I think it right to call your attention to the fact that the lease expires to-morrow." On the same day that letter was answered by Mr. Hendricks in these terms—"Acknowledging the receipt of your letter of this date, I have to state that the directors are of course prepared to renew the lease." It is said on the one hand that that is a proper notice. It is said on the other hand that the notice is insufficient. It is said it is insufficient for this reason—in the first place, that Mr. Hendricks had no authority to write the letter; in the second place, that the letter was not sent to the persons to whom notice ought to have been given. Mr. George Smith was tenant for life of one moiety, he was co-trustee with two other persons of the other moiety. It is said "you ought to have given notice to all the persons who are interested, and you ought to have given notice by some person who was duly authorised" (as I understand the argument), by a resolution of the trustees of the fund certainly, possibly also by a resolution of the directors, that the lease was to be renewed, for otherwise Mr. Hendricks had really no authority, and the letter was simply the letter of an outsider, having no authority whatever to write it.

Now the lease was undoubtedly held in the names of the trustees of the Million Fund, and by the trustees of the Million Fund as a security for the annuities charged on that fund; but it was by way of indemnity only. There was no right in them to apply any part of the interest of that million of money unless the company made default in paying the annuities, and until default was made the fund, with all the income of it, was to go to the company itself. I consider, therefore, that the persons who are really and truly mainly interested in this fund are the Globe Company themselves. It was a part of their assets, simply subject to a special indemnity in favour of the annuitants who had taken six per cent. annuities. But whether the company, or whether the trustees, were the persons who ought to have given notice, Mr. Hendricks united in himself the offices of secretary to them both. From the evidence which has been given before me, I consider that it was a part of his duties, as secretary for both bodies, to look after the investments, to take care that all that was proper to be done with regard to those investments was done, and that, amongst other things, it would undoubtedly have been his duty, if he had no instructions at all, to bring before the directors and trustees the falling in of this lease, and the necessity there was for their declaring an option if they wished to have a renewal of the lease. I consider, therefore, that it was a part of the duty of Mr. Hendricks to give due notice before the lease expired that the trustees and directors both wished the lease to be renewed, and I consider that Mr. Hendricks was therefore acting as he was bound to act, only rather later than I think he was bound to act, in giving this notice.

Then it is said that notice was not given to the proper person. It was given to Mr. Smith, who united in himself the character of tenant-for-life of one moiety, and of trustee, not only of the other moiety, but also of the moiety of which he was tenant-for-life, subject to his own tenancy for life. It is said that that is not a sufficient notice. I have not yet been informed distinctly by the counsel for the defendants to whom the notice ought to have been given; but, at all events, they seem to argue this—that it should have been given to Mr. Thompson and Mrs. Garle, who were the other trustees, as well as to Mr. Smith. I have come to the conclusion that notice to one of the trustees was perfectly sufficient, and that, inasmuch as Mr. Smith was one of the trustees, the notice given by Mr. Hendricks was a requisition given within the time within which the notice was necessary, and that, consequently, the plaintiffs are entitled to that for which they ask. Some trifling observation was made upon the form of Mr. Hendricks' letter. I do not think any form was necessary. No requisition in writing is required by the covenant. The lease is to be a lease which is to be renewed in perpetuity, at the option of the lessees. I think the option of the lessees, and their desire to remain tenants, were stated fairly and broadly upon the letter, not the less so because, even in the lease of 1860, the lessees are expressly stated to be trustees for the directors of the company. I think it would be impossible to hold that any formal notice, in any formal words, was requisite with regard to this option, when no notice in writing is required, and when it is expressly stated in the lease that the lease is to continue at the option of the lessees. I think the option of the lessees was sufficiently plainly declared in this letter; and I must hold, therefore, that the letter being written on the 23rd of June, and being sent to one of the three trustees, who was also a tenant for life of the moiety which had not fallen into the trusteeship up to that time, was a sufficient notice and a sufficient declaration of the option on the part of the lessees to take a renewal of the lease.

That being so, it only remains for me to declare that the trustees of the fund are entitled to a renewal of the lease, that the lease must be executed, and, of course, the 1,000*l.* must be paid on the execution of the lease, with interest at the rate of five per cent.

There remains only the question of costs, and inasmuch as I have decided the case upon the ground that there was a proper notice given, I think the plaintiffs are entitled to the costs of the action.

WARE v. THE LONDON, BRIGHTON AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY COMPANY.

A railway company has power to sell as "superfluous land" the whole of the land beyond their boundary wall, even though that wall be also a retaining wall thicker at the base than at the surface, and part of the land so sold would be within a line drawn on the surface vertically above the line of the footings of the wall.

Mulliner v. The Midland Railway Company (48 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 258; Law Rep. 11 Ch. D. 611) distinguished.

By an indenture of the 24th of March, 1851, the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company conveyed to Messrs. Nalder & Collyer, as being superfluous land, certain freehold hereditaments close to their Sydenham station. The parcels contained the following clause:—"And also all that piece or parcel of land situate in Sydenham Street aforesaid, and adjoining on the west side thereof the said messuage or tenement and premises in the occupation of Mr. Henry Doe, and abutting on the east side thereof on the said railway from Croydon to London, the site of which said piece or parcel of ground and its dimensions are more particularly delineated and shewn on the said plan drawn in the margin of these presents, and are therein coloured green."

In the year 1867 a house, afterwards called "The Railway Tavern, Sydenham," was built on the piece of land so purchased by Nalder & Collyer. The house was built of a nearly square shape, with its walls fronting north, south, east and west, and having the east wall nearest and parallel to the railway company's railway. Between the east wall and the railway, which at that point ran through a cutting, was a passage belonging to the house, and along the side of the passage farthest from the house, at a distance of about 5 ft 9 in., ran the boundary wall of the railway, which also formed the retaining wall. That wall was a little more than a foot in width at the surface of the ground, from which it rose to a height of a few feet, but it gradually widened down to its base, being at the foundations (nearly 20 ft. below the level of the passage) between 8 and 9 ft. in thickness. The green colouring on the plan on the deed of 1851 extended right up to a black line, which the learned Judge considered to represent the retaining wall, so that the railway company had apparently conveyed to Nalder & Collyer the whole width of what afterwards became the passage.

By a lease of the 24th of June, 1868, George Ware, the plaintiff, became the lessee of "The Railway Tavern" and premises, at a rent of 128*l.* 10*s.*, for a term of which 65½ years were still unexpired at the date of the action.

In 1877 the railway company commenced certain works upon a bridge which crossed the line close to the plaintiff's premises, and, while so doing, constructed a pier, some part of which, with its abutments, extended some fifteen inches into the passage along the plaintiff's house, and they at the same time made an excavation some three feet deep inside the retaining wall farther up the passage for the purpose of repairing the retaining wall.

On the 29th of January, 1880, the plaintiff commenced the present action against the railway company, alleging that the construction of the pier and the excavation constituted encroachments and trespasses upon his leasehold premises, and that thereby his house had become very seriously dilapidated, and he had suffered damage by loss of custom and lodgers; and he claimed damages and an injunction.

The railway company denied that there had been any encroachment, trespass or damage, and they pleaded that all that had been done had been done by the directions of the Board of Works for the Lewisham district, and they brought the Lewisham Board of Works into the litigation as third parties.

This was the hearing of the action with witnesses.

Rigby, Q.C., and Nalder, for the plaintiff.

Higgins, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the railway company.—The plaintiff has no cause of action with respect to the pier and its abutments, for this reason, that the pier was entirely within the company's land. If a line were traced on the surface of the soil vertically above the footings of the retaining wall, the pier would be wholly within the land on the railway side of the line. The railway did not convey away the land on their side of the line so drawn; nor could they legally do so, for the land lying above any part of their wall was necessary for the purposes of the railway for repairing the wall, &c., so that it was not "superfluous land" within section 127 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The case is governed by Mulliner v. The Midland Railway Company (1) and In re The Metropolitan District Railway Company and Cosh (2).

(1) 48 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 258; Law Rep. 11 Ch. D. 611

Everitt, Q.C., and Northmore Lawrence, for the Lewisham Board of Works.

Rigby, Q.C., in reply.—The company conveyed away and had power to convey away as "superfluous land" the whole of the soil right up to their boundary wall. That soil lay entirely beyond their boundary wall, and was not required for their purposes.

PEARSON, J.—The first question which I have to decide is, whether or not the company have encroached upon the plaintiff's land. The plaintiff claims the whole of the passage—the 5 ft. 9 in.—which runs along the east side of his house, and I am of opinion that the whole of that passage did pass by the conveyance. The description in the body of the deed is perfectly plain, that the land conveyed adjoins the house on one side and abuts on the railway on the other.

It was argued, however, very ingeniously by the counsel for the railway company that with regard to about eighteen inches of this land—the eighteen inches nearest to the boundary wall—the company had no right to sell that as "superfluous land," because, they said, if you drew a vertical line from the foot of the wall up to the surface of the earth you would get eighteen inches from the wall, and that, so far as the land covered any part of the wall, it was not "superfluous land," and the company could not sell it. One of the reasons which they gave for that was this, that the company would want to repair the wall, and if they wanted to repair the wall they could only repair it on that side. Mr. Higgins referred me very properly to the case of Mulliner v. The Midland Railway Company (1) and what is known as Cosh's Case (2). With regard to Cosh's Case (2), which of course is a binding authority upon me, I do not think it necessary to refer to it, because the circumstances of that case were so exceedingly peculiar that I do not think they could form any guide to me in deciding this case. The decision in Mulliner v. The Midland Railway Company (1), which I shall follow under similar circumstances, although not absolutely binding upon me, was much nearer this case than Cosh's Case (2). The distinction between that case and this, when you come to look at it, is exceedingly plain. In Mulliner's Case (1) what the company attempted to sell was the piece of land lying under one of the arches which supported a part of the station, and which was to all intents and purposes, therefore, a part of the works of the company which they required to keep for their own absolute use. What the Master of the Rolls decided, if I am to put it into plain and simple language, was, I think, practically this—that you could not in a case of that kind sell the floor of your house, keeping the roof only. The reason he gave in that case was that, if you wanted to repair the crown of the arch, it would be necessary to put a scaffolding under the arch, and upon this very piece of land which had been attempted to be sold. I need not say also that in that case there were other grounds for deciding as he did which would have disposed of the case without going into this question of law at all. But I cannot think that that is any precedent, or forms any principle, for the present case, or that I should be justified in extending it, and I certainly should be exceedingly unwilling to extend it unless I were obliged; and to say that when a railway company have a field on one side of the boundary wall for which they have no use, and which, if they do not sell it, will vest in the adjoining landowner, they must retain so much land on the further side of their boundary wall as will lie between that wall and a line drawn vertically from the footings of the wall, would be to give a most mischievous decision. It would involve this absurdity—the moment they had retained that amount of space, say, in this case, eighteen inches, if they wanted to put another wall to bound that eighteen inches, they would then take a few inches on the further side of that wall, and so they would go on ad infinitum, and I do not know when you would ever come to the boundary of the railway property. I am quite satisfied that the principle does not extend to a case of this kind, and I must therefore decide that the whole of this passage did belong to the plaintiff, and that the company have encroached upon his land by taking the small piece of ground which they have taken, and which, whatever it may be, will now belong to the company, and the company must of course pay for it.

Now I had at one time some little difficulty in arriving in my own mind at a conclusion upon the question whether there had been technically a trespass in this case —an encroachment I have no doubt about —but whether or not, both in this and in the case of the further excavation, almost everything had not been done by the leave and licence of Mr. Ware. In the face, however, of the admissions in the statement of defence, it is quite impossible for me to say that the plaintiff did not object. I must therefore hold that what was done was done against the plaintiff's will— done in spite of complaints made by him —and that consequently there was a trespass as well as an encroachment. That being so, the first thing that I have to decide with regard to that is, what is the value of that land, or what is the sum the Brighton Company are to pay for it.

As to that, the sum claimed by the statement of claim is 25*l.*, and I think, considering that the 25*l.* is not an unreasonable sum, and that there has been no objection taken to this amount, so far as the evidence goes before me, I cannot do better than decide that 25*l.* is the sum to be paid by the Brighton Company for the plaintiff's interest in this land, and that under those circumstances they must pay that 25*l.*, and the plaintiff, if necessary, must execute a conveyance to them of the piece of land upon which that abutment and pier rest, or, if the company on consideration prefer it, they may take a vesting order under the Trustee Extension Act.

[His Lordship then proceeded to dispose of the remainder of the case, and came to the conclusion that the company had committed a trespass in excavating in the plaintiff's passage for the purpose of repairing the retaining wall, but that no damage had been occasioned to the plaintiff by anything done by the company. His Lordship concluded as follows:]—Under those circumstances, what I must do is this: I must decide that the defendant company shall pay 25*l.* to the plaintiff for their encroachment upon his property, and that of course will be the amount of the damages for the trespass as far as regards that encroachment; and they must pay the costs of the action as far as they relate to that encroachment, because they have resisted the plaintiff's title to that piece of land, and they will pay the costs of the conveyance or vesting order.

With regard to the second trespass complained of—that of digging up the passage at the time when the retaining wall was repaired—I give one shilling as nominal damages, and there will be no costs.

With regard to all the other claims for damages, I refuse them entirely, and the plaintiff must pay the costs of the action, except so far as I have mentioned.

If any costs have been occasioned to the plaintiff by the local board being brought here, those costs must be paid by the railway company.

BEAZLEY v. SOARES.

Action by Mortgagee — Injunction — Trade Name—Personal Goodwill.

The mortgagee of the goodwill of a business and the right to use a trade name (who has never used the name, and does not allege that he intends to do so) cannot obtain an injunction to restrain persons claiming under the mortgagor from carrying on the business under the name.

Action with witnesses.

In the year 1872 the plaintiff W. P. Margetson and one R. E. Bell became the purchasers of a mineral water manufacturing business, carried on at Walworth, in the county of Surrey, under the style of "Fleet & Co." This business had previously been carried on there by one Benjamin Fleet.

By an indenture dated the 25th of March, 1876, Margetson & Bell (who had since the purchase of the business carried it on under the name of "Fleet & Co.") mortgaged the premises on which the business was carried on, and all the machinery, plant and effects, to one J. B. Arthy, to secure the repayment of 2,200*l.* This mortgage afterwards became vested in one H. Byrne.

In September, 1877, Margetson & Bell presented a liquidation petition, and in the following month their creditors agreed to accept a composition of 7*s.* 6*d.* in the pound, payable by three instalments at successive intervals of six months.

By an indenture dated the 12th of January, 1878, Margetson & Bell mortgaged to the plaintiff George Beazley (the father-in-law of Margetson), amongst other things, the goodwill of the business and the right to use the name of "Fleet & Co.," to secure the repayment of 1,025*l.*

By an indenture dated the 8th of May, 1878, Margetson & Bell assigned to one E. L. Ernest the premises in which the business was carried on, the goodwill, stock-in-trade and all other the effects belonging to or used on the premises in the business of a mineral water manufacturer, subject, nevertheless, as to the whole of the premises, to the mortgage of the plaintiff Beazley. By this deed they gave Ernest a power of attorney, authorising him to use the name of "Fleet & Co." for all the purposes of the business; and they also covenanted not to carry on the business of mineral water manufacturers within fifty miles of London for a period of five years.

It appeared that in the latter part of May, 1878, the plaintiff Beazley went to the business premises at Walbrook, saying that he had a mortgage under which he had a right to use the name of "Fleet & Co.," and claiming that all letters addressed to the firm of "Fleet & Co." should be delivered to him. A day or two afterwards he received a letter from Ernest, telling him that he had no right to come on the premises, and that any attempt on his part to get the letters addressed to "Fleet & Co." would bring him into serious trouble. The plaintiff Beazley took no further steps in the matter until he issued the writ in this action.

Ernest was a trustee for Byrne, who, in May, 1878, entered into possession of the business, and for some time carried it on under the style of "Fleet & Co."

In February, 1879, Byrne, in exercise of his rights under the mortgage-deed of the 25th of March, 1876, sold the business premises, machinery and plant comprised therein to the defendants Soares and Richards; and by a deed of the 31st of December, 1879, assigned the same to them, together with the goodwill of the business and the right to use the style of "Fleet & Co." in connection therewith, but subject to the rights of the plaintiff Beazley under his mortgage.

In February, 1880, the plaintiff Beazley issued the writ in this action. Subsequently Margetson was added as a co-plaintiff. By their amended statement of claim they claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from carrying on the business of mineral water manufacturers under the style of "Fleet & Co.," or holding out to the public that they were entitled to the goodwill of the business of "Fleet & Co.," until they had paid to the plaintiffs the amount due under the mortgage of the 12th of January, 1878.

The defendants, by their statement of defence, submitted that the mortgage-deed of the 12th of January, 1878, was an invalid security; that the plaintiff G. Beazley had not, when he brought the action, any beneficial interest therein; and that the action was in fact brought by Margetson, with the object of enabling him to evade the covenant contained in the deed of the 8th of May, 1878.

The dealings between Beazley and his son-in-law Margetson were very obscure, but, in the opinion of the Court, the evidence shewed that he intended to give up all his interest, under the deed of January, 1878, to his son-in-law Margetson.

Barber, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiff Beazley is, under the deed of January, 1878, the first mortgagee of the goodwill of the business and the right to use the trade name of "Fleet & Co." The right to use the name is really the only security Beazley now has for the money he has advanced. We admit that the premises on which the business is being carried on are vested in the defendants, subject to our mortgage. No doubt it was formerly considered that goodwill must be attached to a particular locality—Chissum v. Dewes (1); but this is a case of personal goodwill, "not connected with any interest in land"—Potter v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue (2)—and "not dependent on the business being carried on at any particular place"—Llewellyn v. Rutherford (3).

The name of "Fleet & Co." has a special value in connection with this business; and the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendants from carrying on their business under the name of "Fleet & Co."

[PEARSON, J.—What right have you to an injunction, as you have never used the name, and do not even allege that you intend to carry on the business and use the name?]

This is the only way in which the plaintiffs can realise their security.

Higgins, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the defendants, were stopped by the Court.

PEARSON, J.—I am asked to make an entirely novel decree in a novel case; and, in spite of the persuasion of the learned counsel for the plaintiff, I decline to make it. [His Lordship, after stating the facts of the case, continued:]—The first question to which I have to address myself is, whether Margetson, having become beneficially interested in this mortgage, could, by any possibility, set up his interest under it, against the covenant which he had entered into with Ernest by the deed of the 8th of May, 1878. I think I should come to the conclusion that Margetson had lost his right, and was bound by his covenant, and could not in this Court restrain Ernest, or those who claim under Ernest, from using the name of "Fleet & Co." However, I do not decide that point; and I should not like to decide it without hearing further argument upon it. Then comes this curious point: The premises and the stock-in-trade have become vested in the defendants; and the defendants, or their predecessors, have been carrying on the business since May, 1878, under the name of "Fleet & Co.," down to the present time, or I may take it simply down to the time the writ was issued, without any obstruction being offered to them either by Beazley or by Margetson. At all events, whatever may be Beazley's case, I must assume that during that time they were carrying on the business under the name of "Fleet & Co." with the knowledge and concurrence of Margetson. I am now asked to restrain them in an action (which I consider to be the action of Margetson, and not the action of Beazley) from continuing to carry on their business under the name of "Fleet & Co." And, inasmuch as the grounds on which an injunction is granted are, first, where the property is in the man who is using the name, and whose property is interfered with by somebody else assuming the name; and, secondly, where there is an attempt to deceive the public by one man trading under a name which he is not entitled to trade under and which does not belong to him, and imposing his goods on the public under a name that they ought not properly to bear—even if Beazley were here, I should certainly come to a conclusion against him, and I should not grant an injunction in his favour, as he has never used the name, is not using, and does not even allege that he intends to use the name. I do not understand how there can be a goodwill or a right to use a name kept alive in this way for a period of years during which the person who claims to have the right to use it has never used it, nor asserted his right to use it, nor alleges when he comes into Court that he intends to use it. I do not think the Court of Chancery has ever granted an injunction in a case of that kind. I have asked for some authority, and I have been told there is no authority to be found in the books for the proposition that an injunction has been granted under such circumstances—therefore I decline to be the first Judge to grant an injunction under such circumstances. This being so, the only thing I can do is to dismiss this action with costs.

I must say that, after hearing the evidence of Beazley in the box, I am by no means satisfied that this is an honest action. I think if the action had been heard out to the end I must have come to the conclusion that it was not an honest action, and on that ground also I must have dismissed it.

HOOD v. NEWBY.

Debtor's Summons—Compromise—"Act of Bankruptcy available for Adjudication"—Protected Transaction—The Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 94, sub-s. 3.

Although non-compliance with a debtor's summons is an act of bankruptcy only available for adjudication on the petition of the particular creditor who issues the summons, it will nevertheless avoid any bona fide contract or dealing between such debtor and creditor, if the debtor is subsequently adjudicated bankrupt, and if such act of bankruptcy is an act of bankruptcy available for adjudication at the date of the order of adjudication.

This was an appeal from a decision of Chitty, J.

The plaintiffs Hood and Innes and the defendant Newby were partners in trade, and the action was brought for a dissolution of the partnership.

On the 4th of August, 1881, a decree for dissolution and for consequential accounts and enquiries was made, and a receiver was appointed.

On the 29th of August, 1881, Hood and the receiver presented a bankruptcy petition against Newby, grounded on Newby's non-compliance with a debtor's summons taken out by them for payment of 134*l.* Negotiations then took place for a compromise of the action, and ultimately, on the 22nd of December, 1881, Newby agreed to purchase the plaintiff's interests in the partnership on certain terms, and thereupon further proceedings under the bankruptcy petition were postponed.

On the 20th of December, 1881, another bankruptcy petition was presented against Newby by one Pixley, on which Newby was adjudicated bankrupt on the 19th of January, 1882, and Pixley was appointed the trustee in bankruptcy.

The plaintiffs had no notice of Pixley's petition, nor of the act of bankruptcy on which it was grounded, at the time when the compromise of their action was entered into.

On the 6th of July, 1882, on a summons taken out by the plaintiffs, all proceedings in the action were stayed on the terms of the compromise.

On the 21st of July a motion by Pixley to discharge this order was refused, Chitty, J., considering himself bound by Ex parte Crosbie (1).

From this refusal Pixley appealed.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and Owen, for the appellant, contended that the compromise was void against the creditors, because the plaintiffs, at the date of the compromise, had notice of an act of bankruptcy committed by Newby, and available against him for adjudication at the date of the adjudication—Ex parte Hankin (2).

Ince, Q.C., and Kirby, for the respondents, argued contra, that as the only act of bankruptcy of which the plaintiff had notice was the non-compliance with their debtor's summons, it was not available for an adjudication in bankruptcy except on the petition of the creditors who took it out; therefore it was not available for the particular adjudication under which the defendant was made bankrupt—Ex parte Crosbie (1), Ex parte Gilbey (3) and Ex parte Bouchard (4).

od v. Newby, App.

SEL, M.R.—The only point which it essary to decide in this case is this: btor's summons having been issued st a bankrupt, and he having neg- to comply with it, he committed an bankruptcy. The creditor who had out that debtor's summons enters a contract with him for a valuable leration. Before the six months expired another creditor who also a trader debtor's summons made him nkrupt, and the question is, whether ontract or dealing after the first act nkruptcy was such as to be protected e 94th section of the Bankruptcy Act 69. That protects "any contract or ng with any bankrupt, &c., made in faith for a valuable consideration be- he date of the order of adjudication by son not having, at the time of making contract or dealing, notice of any act nkruptcy committed by the bankrupt, vailable against him for adjudication." ne time of the contract or dealing this tor of course had notice of the act of ruptcy created by the debtor's sum- , or consequent upon the issuing of lebtor's summons by himself. There question about that. Was it avail- against him for adjudication? Un- tedly it was. The creditor might him a bankrupt upon it.

en what is the meaning of "available st him for adjudication"? It does not available against any particular cre- ," but "available." Then at what available? "Available" may mean things. It may mean available at the of the contract or at the time of the lication. The cases of Ex parte Bou- t (4) and Ex parte Gilbey (3) decide it means available at the date of the of adjudication. That being so, it rs very plain that this transaction is protected by the 3rd sub-section of 94th section. The only remaining is this: Is there authority binding this Court, as Mr. Justice Chitty ght there was binding upon him, to e otherwise on account of the decision x parte Bouchard (4) and Ex parte y (3) following Ex parte Crosbie (1)? ny opinion there is not. You must ys look to what was being discussed ne Judges as well as the words used. The words used are undoubtedly sufficient to cover the doctrine contended for on the part of the respondent; but when you see what was before them and what they had to consider, it was this—whether the act of bankruptcy must be available at the date of the contract or at the date of the order of adjudication; and in deciding the latter they used the words "available for that particular adjudication," meaning available at that time, which was the only point they had to consider. They did not consider the other point or intend to decide it, and, indeed, if you look at mere dicta, there is a dictum in Ex parte Hankin (2) the other way. But I do not rely upon it, for the same reason—that was not the point then before the Court of Appeal. It appears to me that these decisions do not cover this point at all; that they were not intended to apply and do not apply to it. The point is a new point, and must be decided according to the fair reading of the Act of Parliament, which, as I have said, is in favour of the appellant. I think, therefore, this appeal must be allowed.

BRETT, L.J.—I am quite sure that if I had been in the place of Mr. Justice Chitty, and had been alone in the Court, I should have decided this case precisely as he decided it. I should not have felt myself entitled to act against the very trenchant words used by Lord Justice James in the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Crosbie (1), and followed twice after, as to the nature of the terms used and the phraseology used, by the Court of Appeal. But, on looking carefully into the case decided by Lord Justice James, and assisted as I am by the presence of two other Judges in a Court of Appeal, I cannot help saying that the present point was not before his mind, and that therefore the phraseology which he used, which is perfectly correct as to every other act of bankruptcy but this very peculiar one, is not to be taken as deciding the point in the present case. He was not considering this act of bankruptcy; and we must therefore, I think, decide this case now, not according to the phraseology used by Lord Justice James with regard to other acts of bankruptcy, but with regard to the phraseology used in the statute itself, having regard to this particular act of bankruptcy.

I cannot help still being of opinion that the argument used by Mr. Ince, and which must be used, does read, the last part of the 2nd sub-section of section 94, as if it were written, "Any act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt and available against him for the adjudication." Now is that a true reading of it? When those who drew this very section wished to refer to the adjudication they say "the order of adjudication," which is the same thing as "the adjudication." But in the latter part they alter their phraseology, and instead of putting in the definite article, which is required in order to support the argument, they leave it out. That may seem a minute criticism, and if that criticism made the section absurd in its practical application to business, I should be for not taking notice of this omission; but when you see that the very act of omitting that particle makes the statute sensible as applied to all acts of bankruptcy—to this particular one as well as to all the others—it strikes me that it was designedly left out, in order that the section might include this particular act of bankruptcy. The act of bankruptcy here is the non-compliance with the debtor's summons. It is true that that act of bankruptcy can only be relied upon for the support of a hostile petition, when that hostile petition is the petition of the person who took out the summons. That is true; but where there are several debtor's summonses it is obvious that if there was not adjudication upon any of the others, each of the persons taking out a debtor's summons could, by petition, make the man a bankrupt. Therefore the disobedience of each of these debtor's summonses is an act which is available as an act of bankruptcy. It is available not for all persons, but each of them is available for a particular person. Therefore this latter part of the section, if you read it as it is written, is applicable to each of them; and it would be strange, as my Lord has observed, if a man having notice that a debtor's summons has been taken out within the limited time by a creditor, and that the bankrupt did not comply with that summons, he could afterwards enter into a protected transaction with the bankrupt, although in the case of every other act mentioned in the statute he could not. I must say, I think that the business necessity of the Act shews the actual meaning of the Legislature in leaving out that one very small word which Mr. Ince of necessity requires us to put in, and under those circumstances I think we ought to decline to put it in.

COTTON, L.J.—The question which we have here to consider is this—as to whether this is a protected transaction; and for the purpose of considering whether it can be protected we have to decide whether the respondent here entered into the dealing "without notice of an act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt and available against him for adjudication."

Of course, if one takes those words in their widest sense there is no limit at all, and notice of any act of bankruptcy which was available for adjudication at any time is sufficient to deprive the person dealing with the bankrupt of protection. That evidently would be unreasonable. It cannot be that notice of an act of bankruptcy committed ten years before would prevent him getting the protection. There must be some limit, and the natural limit is limit of time, not a limit as to a particular person on whose petition an adjudication could be obtained. And here, if we look into sub-section 3, to ascertain the time that is to be the limit, we are, in my opinion, at once directed to the date of the order of adjudication. That is to say, if he has no notice of an act of bankruptcy which at the time when the adjudication took place would have been available, then he is within the protection. If he has notice of an act of bankruptcy which was available for adjudication at the time—time being the only limit to which we can reasonably look—then he is not protected. That is the construction at which I should arrive on reading the Act of Parliament and giving the section a reasonable interpretation.

But it is said that we are precluded from giving that interpretation by the decision of this Court. Now, undoubtedly in Ex parte Crosbie (1), and in two other similar cases, words were used by Lord Justice James, and by the members of the Court, which point to the particular adjudication.

Lord Justice James says, "It must mean notice of an act of bankruptcy which would have been available for the making of the particular adjudication for which the proof is now tendered." Now Judges, as well as other persons, sometimes use short expressions which if expanded would be perfectly clear, but which applied to a different set of circumstances in their now expanded form are ambiguous. The Lord Justice was dealing there with this question—whether an act of bankruptcy committed twelve months before the actual adjudication would be an act of bankruptcy available for an adjudication within the meaning of this section; and what he there, to my mind, clearly means, having regard to the point before him, is adjudication at the particular time when the adjudication was in fact made. It is adjudication at that particular date, which was the only thing material, not the particular adjudication in the sense of an adjudication on the petition of the creditor who actually did get the adjudication. I think this is the reasonable interpretation of the words and language of Lord Justice James.

Then, on the other hand, we have the language in another case, of Ex parte Hankin (2). That is not a decision any more than that in the other case on the point before us. Ex parte Hankin (2) is a decision which invites us to say that non-compliance with a debtor's summons is not a complete act of bankruptcy. But here the very act of bankruptcy of which there was notice was an act of bankruptcy in consequence of non-compliance with a debtor's summons, and Ex parte Hankin (2) is expressly a decision on that very point; but all that was there decided was that the payment into Court at the time when it was paid before the adjudication, was in fact a payment to the creditor—a conditional payment to him, subject to his establishing his title. And then, undoubtedly, it was said in that case, as Lord Justice Mellish had said before, that although non-compliance with a debtor's summons within the limited time is a complete act of bankruptcy, yet it is an act of bankruptcy which is subject to this peculiarity—that if the debt is paid, then it is wiped off, and is no longer available for adjudication. But in this case the time elapsed without the debtor's summons being complied with, and it has not been wiped off by payment; and therefore it was an act of bankruptcy available for adjudication at the time when, in fact, the adjudication was made.

Jurisdiction — Sequestration — Debt — Costs.

The balance due from his bankers to a party to an action was ordered to be paid into Court on motion in the action, under a sequestration issued on judgment obtained in the action against such party.

Mr. MacMurray, an accounting party to this action, was in default in not having complied with an order that he should account for certain annuity payments. He had been out of the jurisdiction of the Court, and a writ of sequestration of his estate had been issued to enforce obedience to the order. He had since come within the jurisdiction, and had been arrested and lodged in Holloway Gaol. It was now desired to put an end to the sequestration, and this was a motion for an order on Messrs. Smith, Payne & Co., Mr. MacMurray's bankers, to pay the amount of their debt to Mr. MacMurray as his bankers into Court, and for providing the costs of sequestration and of the motion out of the money so paid into Court. The bankers admitted that 2,689*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* was due from them to Mr. MacMurray.

Cookson, Q.C., and A. J. Allen, for the motion.

Latham (Kekewich, Q.C., with him), for the bankers, suggested, on the authority of Crispin v. Cumano (1), a doubt whether, notwithstanding the earlier cases of Wilson v. Metcalfe (2) and Wood v. Freeman (3), there was jurisdiction to make such order on motion in the action. Seton on Decrees (4) was also referred to.

Mr. MacMurray was not represented.

FRY, J.—It appears to me I have jurisdiction to make this order without further proceedings. I think this case is a very simple one, and comes within the decision of Wilson v. Metcalfe (2), which shews that the proper mode of proceeding is only by service on the third person of notice of motion. I cannot help observing that to take any other course would involve everybody in much greater delay and expense.

I will direct the respondents to pay the money into Court, either on an admission by them as to the amount in their hands, or, if they prefer, on an affidavit.

[Messrs. Smith, Payne & Co. elected to admit the amount due. An order to the following effect was made:—

Messrs. Smith, Payne & Co. admitting 2,689*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* to be standing to the credit of MacMurray in their books, order them to pay into Court to the credit of the action (sequestration account) that sum within seven days from service of the order on MacMurray. Let the Taxing Master tax the costs of and incidental to sequestration, and fix the remuneration of the sequestrators, and tax the costs of Smith, Payne & Co., and order payment of the amounts out of the fund to be paid into Court.]

the law, but bona fide and honestly, makes a claim which cannot be supported and is disallowed, he does not pay the costs; and even if the brewers had failed, I should have held them entitled to have their costs in the Court below. Under the present circumstances, of course, they are entitled to their costs both here and below.

I have only one further observation to make, and it is this—that in all cases where a claim is brought against an estate in an administration action, only one party should attend to oppose it. The General Order XVI. rule 12*a* (Order, April, 1880, XVI. 8), ought to have been attended to. As a general rule the executor or administrator is the proper person to attend, unless the Court otherwise orders. The personal representative here took out the summons, and in strictness the plaintiff ought not to have been allowed to appear. As no opposition was made to it we heard Mr. Pearson for the plaintiff; but it must not be considered as a precedent, and if such a case occurs again I shall certainly, as far as I am concerned, not allow any costs to the unnecessary party.

The appeal must be allowed with costs, both above and below, to the appellants, who will take them out of the fund in their hands.

COTTON, L.J., also came to the conclusion that the debt was due to the brewers from the assign of Watts within the meaning of the terms of the agreement, the widow being tenant-for-life of the house under the will of her husband, and proceeded:—

I will add one word to what was said by the Master of the Rolls as regards the costs. All mortgagees, unless they misbehave themselves, have a right to their costs, and it cannot be said that when a mortgagee having such a point as this requires it to be brought before the Judge personally, he is guilty of anything wrong. He has a right to require that the matter should be decided by the Judge himself, and although he was unsuccessful, he ought not to have been made to pay the costs of going before the Judge and taking his opinion upon such a point. That, in the present case, becomes immaterial, because in our opinion the appellants were right; and therefore of course they will have their costs, and will deduct them from the money they have in hand in respect of the sale of the mortgaged property.

That case has no application. It applies only where the gifts are by the same instrument, or by instruments which for the purpose of construction are to be treated as one. The present case is almost identical with Stokes v. Bridgman (2), where it was held that the appointees took according to priority of appointment. See also Booth v. Allington (3), Trollope v. Routledge (4) and Morgan v. Gronow (5).

They were stopped by the Court.

Hastings, Q.C., Warrington and G. B. Freeman, for the appointees under the will. —The appointees ought to take rateably, so far as the fund will extend, in proportion to the amounts appointed to them. With the exception of Stokes v. Bridgman (2) all the authorities cited are distinguishable, because they were cases in which the appointments made exceeded the original amount of the fund, and in such cases the excessive appointment is properly treated as no appointment at all. In this case the whole fund has been properly appointed; but by reason of the deficiency of the fund the appointments cannot be satisfied in full. The Court must look at the intention of the testator, which undoubtedly was to distribute the fund among his children in proportion to the amounts appointed to them. This is the principle of Miller v. Huddleston (6), where a testatrix, having a power of appointment over a sum of 5,000*l.*, appointed 1,000*l.* and left the rest unappointed, and the fund proving insufficient to raise the 5,000*l.*, it was held that the appointee of the 1,000*l.* must abate rateably with those entitled to the residue.

Moreover, these appointments, which were all of them revocable, are recited in the will, and confirmed thereby; and the case is thus on the same footing as Page v. Leapingwell (1), and that class of cases, where the appointments are all contained in one instrument.

Gilbert v. Whitfield.

Stokes v. Bridgman (2)* was wrongly decided. In a subsequent unreported case Hall, V.C., came to a like decision, which was in effect reversed by the Court of Appeal.

[KAY, J.—One difficulty in your way is that if these appointments had been for value they must necessarily have ranked in order of date. Why should a different construction be put on the same words according as the appointments are or are not for value?]

Because, when the appointments are not for value, the intention of the appointor is alone to be considered.

Stallard, for parties in the same interest.

Underhill, for the defendants, the trustees.

No reply was called for.

KAY, J.—I must say in this case it seems to me that the construction has been determined for me by authority, and I do not feel at liberty to go against what seems to me an unbroken current of authority. Naturally one cannot help feeling inclined, if possible, to admit all the children of a person who has a power of appointment, and to distribute the fund rateably in the event, not contemplated by the appointor, of the subsequent diminution of the fund. But it is impossible for me to carry into effect any desire of that kind unless I find upon the face of the instrument that that was in fact the intention of the appointor. I have not the least doubt, and indeed it has been admitted in argument, that this very point—namely, the failure of the fund or diminution of its amount by reason of the insufficiency of the security—was a thing which never occurred to the appointor at all. It never occurred to him in any way to provide for such a contingency. [His Lordship then stated the facts of the case as above set out and continued:] We have here a series of appointments at different dates disposing of definite sums in favour of certain of the children. Then the will reciting those deeds treats them as operative and valid, adding a word by way of confirmation in case there should be anything inoperative in any of them, and appointing the residue. Well, now, it has been argued, and it occurred to me that there was one way in which the case might be treated as brought within Page v. Leapingwell (1). For certainly to some extent an appointment must be treated as read into the instrument creating the power, and in that way the two are connected together; so that if the appointments here were by one instrument, or a series of instruments which for this purpose were to be treated as one, it would be possible to apply to this case the principle of Page v. Leapingwell (1), and treat all these gifts as gifts of aliquot portions of the fund, and therefore to be satisfied rateably. But I find a series of cases which I cannot possibly get over, and which I think prevent me from applying that construction, and of course the answer on the other side was this: When you are considering from the words of instruments what the intention of the person making them is, you are at liberty to look at all of them together where they are contemporaneous and parts of one transaction, or where they are all instruments which, like a will and codicil, constitute together one testamentary disposition. But it is hardly legitimate to look at instruments executed days, or it may be years, later to find out the intention of an appointor when he executed a previous instrument. Put this illustration: Suppose by one of these deeds or by his will he had said "my intention when I made the first appointment was that all should take rateably." It would be a serious question whether the Court could look at that as evidence of his intention when the first deed was executed. That is not the case before me. Here is a case where there is no appearance of the intention of the appointor in the event which has happened. The fund has turned out, by reason of the failure of the security, to be less than the 10,000*l.* contemplated by the appointments. Trollope v. Routledge (4) was a case where the donee of a similar power appointed a gross sum, part of the fund, and afterwards executed other deeds appointing aliquot parts. The gross sum was never severed from the mass. It was an appointment of a definite sum, accompanied with an assignment of the appointor's own life interest in the appointed fund, so that it would take effect in possession at the date of the appointment; and then by subsequent appointments reciting the settlement, she appointed four-fifths of the whole amount to children in different proportions, and, as I understand it, the sum of all these appointments came to more than the actual amount of the fund. It was not that the fund became diminished, but that she really made too large appointments. But the Vice-Chancellor said that his impression was that the donee meant to give the property which she appointed, and that so far as the fund was deficient the last appointment must fail. In Booth v. Allington (3) the appointor appointed first a specific sum, which she described as "part of" a gross sum over which she had a power of appointment, and she went on in the appointment to use words which seem to me equivalent to the words used here in the appointment I have read. She appointed "30,000*l.*, part of the said sum of 120,000*l.*, so by the will of the said T. W. given and bequeathed for the use and benefit and to be at the absolute disposal of the said E. Booth as hereinbefore is mentioned, of the stocks, funds and securities in or upon which the said sum of 30,000*l.* shall for the time being be invested." No appointment at all was made there of the residue, but the gross sum proving deficient it was held that the specific sum appointed was to be paid in full, and not to abate rateably with the unappointed part. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Cranworth) there said: "The only point which at first presented any difficulty to my mind was the clause in the appointment which speaks of 'the stocks, funds and securities in or upon which the said sum of 30,000*l.* should for the time being be invested'; but I think that Mr. Hardy's observation is correct, that it referred only to the stocks, funds and securities in which the 30,000*l.* might happen to be invested at the time when it became payable. The provision is superfluous, and would have been implied if it had not been inserted. With all deference, therefore, to the Vice-Chancellor, though with the hesitation which I always feel when I differ from the opinion of so learned a Judge, I think Mrs. Booth meant to appoint an absolute sum of 30,000*l.* I need not speculate upon what I might have thought if she had gone on to say 'I appoint the residue to my children'; she however makes no appointment of the residue, which therefore goes in accordance with the direction contained in the will of her father." It was there held that the 30,000*l.* must be paid in full.

* In the course of the argument it was pointed out that the case of Miller v. Huddleston (6), referred to by Hall, V.C., in his judgment in Stokes v. Bridgman (47 Law J. Rep. Chanc. at p. 760), was not, as would appear from that report, the case of Miller v. Huddleston (3 Mac. & G. 513; 21 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 1), but the case of the same name already cited.

Now it was observed quite properly that the difference between that case and this is that here there is an appointment of the residue and there there was not. But the appointment of the residue is not in this case by the same instrument, and therefore the exact point suggested does not really occur here. But if those cases left the matter at all in doubt there is this case in the Law Journal Reports of Stokes v. Bridgman (2), which I cannot take upon myself to alter if I differed from it. There the power was a similar one to this, to appoint funds, and it was exercised first of all by a deed which appointed the sum of 1,000*l.*, part of a certain sum of 3,000*l.*, upon certain trusts in favour of a daughter, being in effect an appointment to her absolutely, and by a subsequent deed the donee of the power appointed another sum of 1,000*l.* to another daughter, and again later on another sum of 1,000*l.* to a son, and subsequently the security failed and the fund became considerably deficient. Now Vice-Chancellor Hall, before whom the case came, said this: [His Lordship read the judgment and continued:] Now, in that case Page v. Leapingwell (1) and Trollope v. Routledge (4) were cited, and also Miller v. Huddleston (6), the reference to which is quite clearly wrongly given, and I am told by counsel that it is in fact wrong, and that the Miller v. Huddleston (6) actually referred to was not the case of that name in 3 Macnaghten and Gordon's Reports, but the case in the Law Reports.

[W. Pearson, Q.C.—Both were referred to.]

In that case a sum of 5,000*l.* was appointed upon certain trusts subject to powers given to five persons of appointing to the amount or value of 1,000*l.*, one of which had been exercised; but the fund proved insufficient, and the Vice-Chancellor Malins held that the appointees of the 1,000*l.* and the persons entitled to the residue of the fund must abate proportionately, because the case came within Page v. Leapingwell (1). The distinction between that and the other case is that by one instrument the whole fund was in effect appointed, which was not the case in Stokes v. Bridgman (2) and in the case now before me. It seems to me that if these authorities are to be overruled they must be overruled by some Court of higher authority than this. I cannot distinguish this case from Stokes v. Bridgman (2); I cannot say I intimate the least dissent from it. I must, therefore, hold that these appointments take effect in order of date.

KAY, J. 1882. Nov. 21.

THE ROCK PORTLAND CEMENT COMPANY (LIMITED) v. WILSON.

Specific Performance—Damages in Lieu of—Misrepresentation—Lord Cairns' Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27).

In a purchaser's action for specific performance a plaintiff cannot recover damages for breach of contract unless he establishes misrepresentation on the part of the defendant. The object and intention of Lord Cairns' Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27), which gives the Court jurisdiction to award damages in substitution for specific performance in all cases in which the Court has jurisdiction to entertain an application for specific performance, was not to give any new right to damages, but to prevent the mischief arising from two distinct methods of procedure, which, previously to the time of its passing, were in existence. In no case where damages could not previously have been recovered at law can they now be obtained under Lord Cairns' Act.

Semble,—In a contract for a lease the words "immediate possession if required" do not fix the commencement of the term.

This was an action for specific performance of an agreement for the lease of certain lands in Essex.

The agreement was contained in a correspondence which was set out by the plaintiffs in their statement of claim. The first letter was written by the late defendant G. H. Wilson (deceased), who represented himself to be the owner of about thirteen acres of land at Rainham Ferry Marsh, in Essex, and was dated on the 5th of November, 1880. It ran as follows:—

"Sir,—I make you the offer of my land at Rainham Ferry Marsh thirteen acres more or less for a lease of ninety-nine years at a rental of one hundred and thirty pounds per annum clear to myself of all charges except income tax and taxes &c. with the option of purchase during the next five years, at the rate of four hundred and fifty pounds (450*l.*). Immediate possession if required.

"Remaining yours truly,

"G. H. Wilson."

The next letter was written on the same day by G. H. Wilson to the defendant Stone, and was as follows:—

"Sir,—On perusal of my offer to you of land per note to-day I note by the omission of certain stops my terms do not read plainly. Please understand I offer to let your company the land at 130*l.* a year on lease clear of all taxes and charges to myself except income tax, and the offer is made subject to your reply within a week or ten days. I am, yours truly,

"G. H. Wilson."

This was followed by a memorandum dated the 11th of November, 1880, addressed by G. H. Wilson to the defendant Stone, which ran thus: "All the land at 350*l.* per acre. Half the land at 350*l.* per acre or half the land at a rental of 12*l.* 10*s.* per. ann. on lease. This is the best to be done. My offer of Nov. 5th of 10*l.* per acre on lease for the whole expires Nov. 14 inst.

"To Mr. Stone. G. H. W."

On the 12th of November, the defendant Stone wrote to G. H. Wilson the following letter:—

"G. H. Wilson, Esq.

"Dear Sir,—I accept your offer of the fifth instant for 13 acres of land at Rainham Ferry at a yearly rent of one hundred and thirty pounds, say 130*l.* per annum 99 years lease.

"Robert Stone."

The benefit of this agreement was transferred by the defendant Stone to the plaintiff company, who afterwards commenced this action.

In October, 1881, G. H. Wilson died, leaving the defendants S. Wilson and B. W. Wilson his executors and devisees in trust of his trust estates. After the death of G. H. Wilson it was discovered by the defendants S. Wilson and B. W. Wilson that the land in question was purchased by G. H. Wilson, on behalf of himself and one William Colchester, out of moneys one half of which belonged to the said William Colchester and was held in trust for him by G. H. Wilson. William Colchester denied that G. H. Wilson had any power or authority to contract for the leasing or sale of the property, and he accordingly refused to ratify the agreement or to concur with the defendants S. Wilson and B. W. Wilson in carrying it into effect.

The company then brought this action, claiming that the defendants S. Wilson and B. W. Wilson might be ordered to specifically perform the agreement, and to procure the concurrence therein of W. Colchester, and that the defendant Stone might, if necessary, be ordered to concur therein; or that, in the alternative, the defendants S. Wilson and B. W. Wilson might be ordered to pay to the plaintiff company an adequate sum in respect of damages.

Rigby, Q.C., and Bradford, for the plaintiffs.—We have a clear right to specific performance of the agreement so far as G. H. Wilson could have performed it, and to compensation for so much thereof as he could not perform. We do not now, however, ask for specific performance, but for damages under Lord Cairns' Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27). For, by that Act, the Court of Chancery obtained jurisdiction "in all cases" in which it could entertain an application for specific performance, if it should think fit, to award damages either in addition to or in substitution for specific performance. Therefore, although there is no allegation of misrepresentation or deceit on the part of the vendor, and the case is not one in which, under the old practice, damages could have been obtained at common law, still, by virtue of Lord Cairns' Act, we are entitled to the damages we ask for—Hopkins v. Grazebrook (1) and Kelner v. Baxter (2).

[Kay, J., referred to Bain v. Fothergill (3).]

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Procter, for the defendants, were not called upon.

KAY, J.—In my opinion this action fails. It is alleged that by certain letters which are set out in the claim, one G. H. Wilson, who is since deceased, contracted with a Mr. Stone, who was acting as agent for a joint stock company, to be thereafter formed, to let certain land to him upon the terms therein mentioned. The statement of claim sets out that contract, and then it states that Stone had agreed to transfer his rights under the agreement to the plaintiffs, who are the company which was thereafter formed, and that the benefit of the agreement is in fact vested in the plaintiffs. It then says that Wilson, the intended lessor, died in October, 1881, and that the defendants Sarah Wilson and B. W. Wilson are his executors and devisees in trust of his trust estates. It then continues [his Lordship read a portion of the statement of claim and proceeded:] Then it states as a fact that Colchester does refuse, and still refuses, to ratify the agreement and to concur with the last-named defendants in carrying it into effect. Then the claim is for specific performance, and that the defendants S. Wilson and B. W. Wilson should procure

(1) 3 B. & C. 31; 5 Law J. Rep. (o.s.) K.B. 65.

(2) 36 Law J. Rep. C.P. 94; Law Rep. 2 C.P. 174.

the concurrence of Colchester; and that, in the alternative, S. Wilson and B. W. Wilson may be ordered to pay to the plaintiffs an adequate sum in respect of the damages sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the refusal of the defendants to perform the agreement.

Now the first observation I make upon that is, that there is no statement whatever there that any misrepresentation of fact was made by Wilson; there is no allegation of misrepresentation in any shape or way; and there is no claim for damages as in an action of deceit—damages because of misrepresentation. That case is not set up; it is not pleaded or suggested by the pleadings in any way. At the bar the plaintiffs say, We do not ask for specific performance so far as Wilson had any estate in the property, and compensation so far as he could not give them all that the contract purported to give them—namely, a lease of the whole property. That may be so, but they say we do not ask for that at all. What we ask for is, entirely waiving any claim for specific performance—we ask for damages.

Now I take it to have been perfectly settled in Bain v. Fothergill (3) that in an action upon a contract the plaintiff is not entitled to damages for any loss of the benefit of the bargain; he is only entitled to his actual expenses incurred, if the bargain cannot be carried out because of a defect in the vendor's title; and that is so in an action upon a contract, even if a vendor knew that he had not a good title at the time when the contract was entered into.

That is the distinct decision in Bain v. Fothergill (3): the only damages he can possibly have in that state of things are any damages he may have incurred or any expenses he may have been put to by reason of the contract. It was most distinctly pointed out in that case that if he wanted damages in respect of the breach of contract, those damages must be such as he could recover in an action for deceit.

Now I have said—and that is why I began by pointing out that this is not an action for deceit—no claim on the ground of misrepresentation, or any ground which could found an action for deceit, is made in this case. Therefore that is entirely out of the case, and I must therefore consider it as an action for specific performance or damages under Lord Cairns' Act.

Then it was argued—and I need not say that everything has been said that could be said on behalf of the plaintiffs—that under Lord Cairns' Act there is a right in a plaintiff to have damages in an action for specific performance, even though he might not be entitled to damages in an action at law. Now, is that so? Every one who is familiar with the practice in equity knows that at the time when Lord Cairns' Act was passed, it was the constant practice in equity to say when an action was brought for specific performance—that is a discretionary equity, the Court does not think fit under the circumstances of this case to grant specific performance, but it dismisses the bill without prejudice to an action at law. And the mischief which Lord Cairns' Act and afterwards Lord Justice Rolt's Act both were aimed at was this—that a man should not be, to use a phrase which has been used continually, bandied about from one Court to another, but that the whole relief to which he was entitled in respect of the subject-matter should be given in one and the same Court. It has been argued that that was not the entire intention of Lord Cairns' Act, that the intention was something beyond, and the argument has been that under Lord Cairns' Act damages may be obtained in a case where any relief in the nature of specific performance might be given, although damages in such a case could not be given at law. I venture respectfully to dissent from that. It does not seem to me that Lord Cairns' Act was intended to manufacture a new right to damages which a man had not before; but that it was intended, as I have said, to prevent the mischief of his having to work out his rights by another action in another Court.

It is quite true that there may be many cases where a man is entitled to so much as the vendor can give him by way of specific performance; and if the vendor cannot give him all that he contracted to give him, he may be entitled to damages, as it is called, or compensation, which is the better word, for that which the vendor cannot give him—that the Court would always give, and did give, before Lord Cairns' Act was passed; and in that case the compensation given was of this kind. To take the simplest case that can be conceived, of a man contracting to sell a hundred acres and having only fifty, the Court then would say to him—You are bound by the contract to give as much as you can, but the purchase-money shall be diminished; and seeing that you have only got half of that which you contracted to sell, the purchase-money shall be diminished to a proper amount by way of compensation, or, if you please, damages.

I am most certainly of opinion that this is not a case in which Lord Cairns' Act helps the plaintiffs in any degree. It is clearly a case in which they could not have got damages at law for the loss of the bargain, but they might have recovered at law any expenses which they had actually been put to by reason of the bargain. I do not know whether any claim of that kind is made, but I do not think the pleadings raise any claim of that kind. That is the utmost they can be entitled to under any proceedings at law. The Court of equity cannot give any other damages than they are entitled to at law. I am quite unable to give them any damages in this case at all.

However, it is a case in which there is another very considerable difficulty in the plaintiffs' way with regard to the question of damages—namely, that plaintiffs are not suing as assignors, they are not the persons with whom this contract was entered into; and Stone, with whom the contract was entered into—supposing it always to be a binding contract between Stone and the vendors, as to which I do not express any opinion—has not assigned to them, if he could have assigned to them, any damages which he is entitled to for breach of the contract; he has only assigned to these plaintiffs the benefit of the contract. Therefore there is another very considerable difficulty in the plaintiffs' way of recovering damages for breach of the contract. However, I need say no more about that.

But there remains this. This is an action for specific performance, and if it be the case that plaintiffs are entitled to any relief in the nature of specific performance, that seems to me, Mr. Hastings, subject to anything you may say, a ground why I should dismiss the action without costs.

Graham Hastings, Q.C.—Without regard to the question of damages, I say there is no contract at all, because it is wanting in one of those terms which it is now settled must be found in a contract to grant a lease—namely, the date from which the lease is to begin—Marshall v. Berridge (4).

Rigby, Q.C.—The letter of the 5th of November, 1880, contains these words—"Immediate possession if required," which sufficiently point out the commencement of the term, that is, from the first reply.

KAY, J.—I think upon the whole I must dismiss this action with costs. It seems to me it would be making too fine a distinction between this case and Marshall v. Berridge (4) to say that here was a contract capable of specific performance. I do not think, looking at this contract, that any time for the commencement of the term can fairly be found in it. Therefore Marshall v. Berridge (4) is a decision that it was not a contract of which specific performance could be granted.

Company — Winding-up — Payment of Dividends out of Capital—Tort or Breach of Trust—Joint and several Liability of Directors—Set-off—Separate Debt against Joint Liability—Statute of Limitations—Companies Act, 1862, s. 165.

On a summons under the 165*th section of the Companies Act*, 1862, by the liquidator, asking that the directors of the company might be declared jointly and severally liable to repay the amount of dividends declared and paid out of capital during their directorship,—Held, that the directors had committed a breach of trust, not a tort, that the claim was not barred by the Statute of Limitations as to dividends declared and paid more than six years previously, and that they were jointly and severally liable to repay such dividends, with interest at four per cent. Held also, that the directors could not set off debts due to them from the company against their liability to make good the amount of the dividends.

(4) 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 329; Law Rep. 19 Ch. D. 233.

This was an appeal by three directors of the company from a decision of Bacon, V.C., reported 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 525, holding that the directors had committed a breach of trust in paying dividends out of capital during their directorship, and must repay the same to the company with interest, and could not set off against their liability debts due to them from the company.

Warrington, for the appellants, admitted that the question of set-off was concluded by the decision of the Court of Appeal on the previous day in In re The Anglo-French Co-operative Society (1).

On the question of tort or breach of trust he repeated the arguments in the Court below; and further submitted that the payments had been sanctioned and acquiesced in by the company, and could not now be questioned by the company, and the liquidator was in no better position than the company. If the order was sustained the shareholders would be receiving twice over so much of the capital as represented these dividends. If the case of In re The National Funds Assurance Company (2) had been decided after Coventry and Dixon's Case (3), the decision might have been the other way. The decisions in those two cases were conflicting.

Davey, Q.C., and Ryland, for the liquidator, on the second proposition relied on In re The National Funds Assurance Company (2); and on the question of acquiescence, contended that the whole transaction was ultra vires the company and could not be cured by acquiescence—The Ashbury Railway Carriage, &c. Company v. Riche (4).

JESSEL, M.R.—This is an appeal from an order of Vice-Chancellor Bacon by which he directed that certain directors who had improperly made payments to the shareholders out of capital by way of dividend should repay to the liquidator the amount of the sums so paid; and the question is whether he had authority to make such an order.

The facts are these. The directors had for several years been in the habit of laying before the meetings of shareholders reports and balance sheets which were substantially untrue, inasmuch as they included among the assets as good debts a number of debts which they knew to be bad, and then made it appear that the business had produced profits when in fact it had produced none. The meetings acting on these reports declared dividends out of in fact assumed profits, which the directors paid out of capital. The liquidator has taken out a summons to compel the directors to replace the sums so paid, and the Vice-Chancellor, following the decision in In re The National Funds Assurance Company (2), has made the order. Even if he had himself entertained a different view he was not likely to refuse to follow that case; so that the present appeal is in fact an appeal from that case, and the reason is that that case was decided before and is not consistent with Coventry and Dixon's Case (3). But the case of In re The National Funds Assurance Company (2) is founded on an equity entirely distinct from Coventry and Dixon's Case (3). That case was shortly this. It decides that under section 165 directors cannot be made liable for anything (except perhaps for interest) for which they could not be made liable independently not of the Act but of that particular section. If, then, the decision in In re The National Funds Assurance Company (2) had been founded on some new equity arising under section 165 it could not be relied upon. It is not, however, founded on any such equity, but on the law independently of that section, and I entirely adhere to the judgment given in it. A limited company by its memorandum of association declares that its capital is to be applied for the purposes of its business. It cannot reduce its capital except in the manner and with the safeguards provided by statute, and, looking at the Act 40 & 41 Vict. c. 26, it clearly is against the intention of the Legislature that any portion of the capital should be returned to the shareholders without the statutory conditions being complied with. A limited company cannot in any other way make a return of capital. The sanction of a general meeting can give no validity to such a proceeding, and even the sanction of every shareholder cannot bring within the power of the company an act which is not within its powers. If therefore the shareholders had all been present at the meetings, and had all known the facts, and had all concurred in declaring the dividends, the payment of the dividends would not be effectually sanctioned. One reason is this—there is a statement that the capital shall be applied for the purposes of the business, and on the faith of that statement, which is sometimes said to be an implied contract with creditors, people dealing with the company give it credit. The creditor has no debtor but that impalpable thing the corporation, which has no property except the assets of the business. The creditor therefore, I may say, gives credit to that capital, gives credit to the company on the faith of the representation that the capital shall be applied only for the purposes of the business, and he has therefore a right to say that the corporation shall keep its capital and not return it to the shareholders, though it may be a right which he cannot enforce otherwise than by a winding-up order. It follows, then, that if directors who are quasi-trustees for the company improperly pay away the assets to the shareholders they are liable to replace them. It is no answer to say that the shareholders could not compel them to do so. I am of opinion that the company could in its corporate capacity compel them to do so even if there were no winding-up. They are liable to pay, and none the less liable because the liquidator represents not only shareholders but creditors. The body of the shareholders no doubt voted for a declaration of dividend, but they did so on the faith of the misrepresentation of the directors, so that the directors cannot rely on the sanction of the company, because it was obtained by false balance-sheets. That being so, it is unnecessary to refer to previous decisions to shew the equities on which they are liable. But if it were, there is no doubt that Evans v. Coventry (5) is directly in point. The order of the Vice-Chancellor will therefore be affirmed, but with this variation, that the directors in each case are to be declared jointly and severally liable, and not only jointly liable.

BRETT, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case the directors paid away part of the capital of the company for purposes not authorised by the memorandum or the articles of association. I cannot doubt that their doing so was a clear breach of trust. It is argued that the shareholders, by accepting the dividends which were paid out of capital, authorised or ratified what the directors had done, so that their acts cannot be treated as breaches of trust. But in this case I am of opinion that there was no ratification at all, because the assent of the shareholders was procured by false accounts, the untruthfulness of which the shareholders did not know. But even if they had known it, I am of opinion that what was done was equally a breach of trust which they could not ratify. It may be that if the shareholders had with full knowledge assumed to ratify what was done they could not individually impeach the transaction, but the shareholders are not the corporation. In my opinion the corporation could at any time during the winding-up have compelled the directors to replace the moneys thus improperly expended, and the liquidator now can do so. Even if the shareholders had all sanctioned what was done and had remained the same throughout, still the company could have sued the directors for a breach of trust.

(5) 8 De Gex, M. & G. 835; 25 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 489.

In re Exchange Banking Co., App.

They are trustees for the company, not for the individual shareholders. The liquidator represents the company, and is bound to discharge towards the creditors all the duties which the company owes them. It is therefore his duty, when such a breach of trust as this is discovered, to get a return of the assets improperly expended that they may be applied in payment of debts. The act of the directors is impeached as a breach of trust, not on the ground of tort or misfeasance. There are persons who may be made liable under section 165 without having been guilty of a breach of trust; but where the person charged under that section is a trustee the act which brings him within the section is a breach of trust. In my opinion the case is clearly within the section as a breach of trust, and on that ground, and not as a tort, this application is maintainable. Therefore no Statute of Limitations nor any bar by analogy to the statute can be applied to a breach of trust; and the question of set-off is disposed of by our decision of yesterday.

COTTON, L.J.—The first point to be considered is, whether this was a breach of trust and a misapplication of the funds of the company. I am of opinion that it was. The assets of a company are to be dealt with only for the purposes of its business. The application of the capital in paying dividends was therefore a misapplication, and the Court has power under section 165 to order a return of the moneys so expended. Several objections to this have been urged. It was contended that though the directors might be ordered to repay what they had themselves retained, they ought not to be ordered to refund what they had paid to the other shareholders. But directors are in the position of trustees, and are liable not only for what they put into their own pockets but for what they, in breach of trust, pay to others. Then it was said that general meetings confirmed these payments and that the shareholders all received the dividends, and that therefore the company, which only consists of the aggregate of shareholders, cannot get them back. I am of opinion that there was no confirmation which could bind the shareholders as individuals, for there can be no effectual confirmation where the parties are under a mistake of fact. Here the directors had issued false returns and balance sheets which made it appear that the company had made a profit, and there is not even an allegation that the shareholders knew aliunde that these documents were incorrect. But even if the shareholders had known it they could only bind the company to things which were within the powers of the corporation. Now a payment of dividends out of capital is contrary to the constitution of the company, and is incapable of ratification.

The argument that the money has in fact been received by the company and that the company cannot get it back is ingenious, but unsound. The corporation is not a mere aggregate of shareholders. If the corporation were suing for the purpose of paying over again to the shareholders what the shareholders had already received, the Court would not allow it. But that is not the case here. The company is insolvent, and there is no objection to allowing it to get back its funds for the purpose of paying debts. The case of the liquidator is stronger, for in some respects he, as a quasi-trustee for creditors as well as shareholders, stands in a different position from the company. But I rely on this, that the money was not paid to the corporation, but was paid improperly to individuals, and the corporation can sue the directors to get it back that it may be applied in payment of the debts of the corporation. I do not see how to make any distinction between what the directors retained and what they paid to other shareholders.

The Statute of Limitations can in no way apply to a case like the present, for the ground of our decision against the directors is, that they have misapplied funds as to which they stood in the position of trustees.

This was an appeal from a decision of Bacon, V.C., holding, on the facts stated in the headnote, that the widow was entitled to have her annuity paid to her free of any deductions on account of income tax. The case is reported 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 821.

Hemming, Q.C., and Maidlow, for the widow, contended that, as the orders of 1861 and 1863 contained no express declaration of the rights of the parties, they were not intended to be a final decision on the question.

Brodrick, for the trustees of the will.

JESSEL, M.R., said,—The difficulty in this case is that, as between these parties, an order was made long ago. What are the facts? The plaintiff claimed payment of her annuity, and sought to enforce her claim against the executors by an administration suit, which proceeded in the usual way. The decree directed the defendants to account and provide for the annuitant such a sum as would make up 1,500*l.* per annum. The trustees at first deducted both income tax and succession duty, and then the matter came before the Court in July, 1861, upon the very question of what deductions ought to be made from the annuity. The Vice-Chancellor then decided in favour of the annuitant as to the succession duty, but directed the annuity to be paid to her by half-yearly payments, until the further order of the Court, free of all deductions except income tax. It appears to me that was meant to be a declaration of rights. It was a decision between the parties as to the proper amount to be paid to the annuitant. Whether counsel for the widow argued the point or not we need not enquire; the question was before the Court. If the order was wrong it ought to have been appealed against at the time. It cannot now be appealed against without the leave of the Court, and, considering the date of the order, and that incumbrances have been created on the faith of it, I think it would be wrong to interfere with it. The order of the Vice-Chancellor will, therefore, be discharged.

I may add for the satisfaction of the parties that, subject to anything which might have been addressed to us by way of argument, I think the order made in 1861 was perfectly right.

COTTON, L.J., said,—The question we have now to consider is, whether the point raised by this petition has already been adjudicated upon, and I am of opinion that the order made in July, 1861, is a clear decision upon the rights of the parties on this point. When the case was before Vice-Chancellor Wood, he ordered that the succession duty, which had been deducted should be made good to the annuitant, but directed that the deduction for income tax should continue. It is said that that was only "until further order"; but it seems to me that the order was final as to the rights of the parties, and temporary only as to the funds out of which the annuity was to come: and as to the mode of payment. I do not dissent from the opinion expressed by the Master of the Rolls that the order of 1861 was right, though I do not like expressing an opinion without hearing argument.

Will—Construction—"Dying."

A testator gave legacies to three persons, and directed that, in the event of any of them dying, his legacy should go between the others, and he gave the residue to the same persons as tenants-in-common. The testator and one legatee were killed by the same catastrophe, and there was no evidence to shew which survived:—Held, that "dying" meant dying in the testator's lifetime, and there was a lapse of one share of the residue.

William Elliott, by his will, dated December, 1875, bequeathed to his natural son William James Elliott a legacy of 8,000*l.*, and furniture and other specified property; to his natural daughter Sarah Elliott a legacy of 3,000*l.*; and to his housekeeper Mary Ann Hutley a legacy of 3,000*l.*, and declared that "in the event of any of the aforesaid dying, then the others named remaining should have their share equally divided among them." He gave his residue equally among his children, William James Elliott, Sarah Elliott, and Mary Ann Hutley, share and share alike.

On the 3rd of September, 1878, the testator and his legatee Mary Ann Hutley were drowned in the Thames by the sinking of a steamship on which they were. There was no evidence to shew which was the survivor. The testator had no next-of-kin.

A question arose in this administration action as to whether the gift over on the legatee Mary Ann Hutley's dying took effect in the event, which had happened, of her dying so that it could not be shewn whether she died before, at the time, or after the testator. The testator's daughter Sarah Elliott was plaintiff. The defendants were the trustees of his will and his son William James Elliott.

Glasse, Q.C., and Spence, for the plaintiff; and Cookson, Q.C., and Owen, for William James Elliott.—The testator by "dying" must be taken to have meant dying so as not to take the legacy—that is to say, either before or concurrently with the testator.

In the great number of cases on this subject, where it has been laid down that such contingency relates to death in the lifetime of the testator, this particular contingency of concurrent death was not in question, the question being whether the death referred to is in the testator's lifetime or at any time which would give a mere life estate. If it had been put to the testator what he meant, there can be no doubt that he would have said he wished the gift over to take effect in case the legatee could not herself take.

testator and the legatee dying, so far as is known, at the same time. If I ask myself what did the testator mean—I answer, he meant dying in his own lifetime; the contingency of their dying at the same instant, or of their so dying that it could not be shewn which was the survivor, was not in his contemplation. Lord Hatherley, in the case of O'Mahoney v. Burdett (1), says: "The only mode of construing" such a gift was "to understand the testator as saying 'this contingency referred to the case of F.'s death during my (the testator's) lifetime, in which case the legacy would remain undisposed of, and I therefore provide that in that event it shall go over to another.'"

It appears to me, further, that a long line of decisions have settled that where there is a gift in the event of a person's death, that must be construed to be in the event of his death during the lifetime of the testator. Therefore the legacy will sink into the residue, to one-third of which the Crown is entitled.

Bankruptcy — Practice — Witness — Examination as to Dealings with Bankrupt — Jurisdiction to require Witness to furnish an Account — Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), ss. 96 and 97.

The Court has no jurisdiction under sections 96 and 97 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, to order a witness to furnish an account in writing of his dealings with the bankrupt.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar Hazlitt sitting as Chief Judge.

G. K. M. Reynolds was summoned by the trustee in the bankruptcy of his brother L. R. Reynolds, under section 96 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, for the purpose of being examined as to his dealings with the bankrupt. The witness was examined on several occasions before the Registrar, and during the course of such examination, at the suggestion of the trustee's counsel, he promised to furnish an account of all monetary transactions between himself and the bankrupt. In fulfilment of his promise he put in an account, with which the trustee was not satisfied. The examination was several times adjourned in order that the witness might furnish a further and better account, and on the 5th of July, 1882, the witness stated on oath that he was unable to furnish any better account than that which he had already rendered. Ultimately, on the 11th of July, upon the application of the trustee, the Registrar made an order that the witness should on or before the 17th of July furnish to the trustee a further and better account of all monetary transactions between the bankrupt and himself.

The witness appealed.

Finlay Knight and A. A. Terrell, for the appellant.—Under sections 96 and 97 the Court has power only to examine a witness upon oath. There is no jurisdiction to order him to put in an account in writing.

They were stopped by the Court.

The defendant in an action for an injunction to restrain the fouling of a stream, and for damages, was sued as a firm, and, being the sole member of the firm, died more than six months after the issue of the writ:—Held, affirming the decision of HALL, V.C., that the defendant having died more than six months after the commission of the tort, no action either for damages or injunction could be maintained against his executors.

This case is reported fully in the Court below. See 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 445.

Terrell (Graham Hastings, Q.C., with him), for the appellants, the plaintiffs in the action, contended that as the injury had been done to the estate of the plaintiffs, they were entitled to damages against the executors of the defendant—Twycross v. Grant (1), Hambly v. Trott (2) and Bradshaw v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (3); and that the plaintiffs, even if they were not within the letter, were within the equity of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42, for the action had been commenced in the lifetime of the testator, and the proceedings against the executors was merely a "continuance" of the action, under Order L. rule 4.

W. Pearson, Q.C., and L. Field, for the executors, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R., said,—I cannot help feeling that this is a very hard case; but we must not allow hard cases to make bad law. It is an action for a simple tort. As I understand the rule at common law it was this—executors could not be sued for a wrong committed by their testator for which only unliquidated damages could be recovered. That rule has never been altered, except by the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42, which enacts that executors may be sued in certain cases where the injury has been committed not more than six months before the death of the testator. That is not so here; therefore the statute does not apply, and the rule of common law remains. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Vice-Chancellor had no option but to dismiss the action. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

When an appeal upon a point of law is allowed, and the case is remitted to the Court below for trial on the issues of fact, the Court of Appeal will not, as a general rule, stay the trial of the issues of fact pending an appeal to the House of Lords on the point of law.

facturers, on the ground that the words in question could not properly be used as a trade mark. The words had been registered for more than five years.

On the hearing of the summons, Chitty, J., held, as a matter of law, under sections 3, 5 and 10 of the Act, that the registration could not now be impeached—see 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 673.

This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal in May, 1882, who remitted the case to Chitty, J., to be heard upon the issue of fact whether the words in question were capable of being registered as a trade mark.

Messrs. Palmer & Sons then appealed to the House of Lords on the point of law, and now applied to the Court of Appeal that the hearing of the issue of fact before Chitty, J., might be stayed pending the decision of the House of Lords, on the ground that if the appeal was successful it would render the hearing of the issue of fact before Chitty, J., unnecessary.

E. Carpmael, contra, was not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R., said,—This application is entirely unprecedented. The position is analogous to a demurrer, and it was always the practice that the trial of the issues went on pending an appeal upon a point of law raised by demurrer. This application, it is true, arises under the Trade Marks Registration Act, and the question between the parties is raised by a summons; but in substance it is the same as the trial of an action. When the summons came before Mr. Justice Chitty, the Messrs. Palmer & Sons, the respondents to the summons, took a preliminary objection upon a point of law. The learned Judge allowed the objection; but his decision was overruled by the Court of Appeal, who remitted the case to be tried upon the evidence. If the learned Judge had taken the same view of the law in the first instance as the Court of Appeal afterwards did, he would, of course, have heard the case upon the evidence when it was before him, and the trial would have been over long ago. The Messrs. Palmer & Sons, however, have appealed to the House of Lords upon the point of law, and it is no doubt a very difficult question of law; and they now desire to stay the trial of the issues in the meantime, upon the ground that if they succeed in what I may term their demurrer the costs of the trial will be an unnecessary expense and will be thrown away. But it is admitted that the respondents to this application, the Messrs. Bryant & May, are perfectly solvent, so that, though the costs may be wasted, Messrs. Palmer & Sons will lose nothing. On the other hand, if the House of Lords affirms the decision of the Court of Appeal, the trial would, if we granted this application, be delayed about two years, during which time the Messrs. Bryant & May might perhaps lose evidence of the utmost importance to them. That would be a very great hardship. It appears to me, therefore, that no sufficient ground has been shewn for a departure from the usual practice, and that this application must be refused with costs.

HACK v. THE LONDON PROVIDENT BUILDING SOCIETY.

Building Society — Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), s. 34 — Reference of Disputes between the Society and its Members to Arbitration.

The Building Societies Act of 1874 was purposely passed with the view of conferring; and has conferred, on arbitrators larger powers than they possessed under earlier statutes in reference to disputes arising between building societies and their members.

The rules of a building society established under the above Act provided that disputes between the society and any of its members should be referred to the Registrar of Building Societies. A member, who had borrowed money from the society on mortgage, brought an action against the society for an account of the proceeds of sale of the mortgaged property (which had been sold by them under their power of sale), alleging that the property had been sold at an undervalue, and claiming that the defendants should be charged with the difference between the true value and the sale price. There was also a question as to the right of the defendants to retain certain moneys:—Held, on an application by the defendants for a stay of proceedings, that the dispute being merely as to a money demand, was one which must be settled by arbitration.

Wright v. The Monarch Investment Building Society (46 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 649; Law Rep. 5 Ch. D. 726) followed.

Adjourned summons.

The defendants were a building society established under the provisions of the Building Societies Act, 1874, with the object of raising, by the subscriptions of its members, a fund for making advances to its members on mortgage of landed estates.

The plaintiff, in May, 1881, applied to the society for a loan of 600*l.* upon the security of certain land, and the society agreed to make the advance upon the terms that the same with interest should be repaid by quarterly instalments of 21*l.* 12*s.*, extending over ten years, and thereupon the plaintiff became a member of the society and a holder of sixty shares of 10*l.* each.

The plaintiff, on the 18th of May, 1881, executed a mortgage of the premises for the sum of 600*l.*, and thereby covenanted that he would during ten years from the 31st of March, 1881, pay to the society forty quarterly payments of 21*l.* 12*s.*, together with any fines, &c., and other moneys which might become due from the plaintiff under the rules of the society. The deed contained a power of sale, which was not to be executed unless default should have been made for the space of one month in payment of moneys due to the society, and a clause providing that the rules of the society should be applicable thereto.

Only 400*l.* was actually advanced, the remaining 200*l.* being retained by the society by agreement until certain buildings to be erected on the mortgaged premises should be finished.

The payments under the mortgage-deed having become in arrear, the society sold the premises under their power of sale for 500*l.*

Upon an account rendered to the plaintiff, the society claimed 864*l.*, the total amount of quarterly payments extending over ten years. They also at the time of sale retained the 200*l.*

In May, 1881, the plaintiff effected a further charge on the premises, and he subsequently agreed with the second incumbrancer for the absolute sale to him of the equity of redemption.

In November, 1882, the plaintiff brought this action, alleging by his statement of claim that the property had been sold at an undervalue, and claiming an account of the moneys received by the society in respect of the sale of the mortgaged premises, and of the moneys which at the time of the sale were owing on the security, and that in taking the account the society might be debited with the excess of the true value of the premises above the price for which they had been sold, and a declaration that the society were not entitled to credit for more than the amount of subscriptions and fines and costs due at the time of sale, and the balance then remaining unpaid of the principal moneys secured.

Rule 78 of the rules of the society was as follows: "A reference of every matter in dispute between the society, or any person claiming under them, and any member or person entitled to claim on account of any member, on which the resolution of the board shall not be deemed satisfactory shall be made to arbitration by the Registrar." Rule 11 provided that every person paying or subscribing for a share should be a member.

The Registrar of Building Societies has certified that the rules of the society were registered under the Building Societies Act, 1874.

This was a summons taken out by the defendant society asking that the action and all matters therein should be referred to the Registrar, pursuant to rule 78, and that all proceedings in the action should be stayed.

Hack v. London Provident Building Soc.

Section 34 of the Building Societies Act, 1874, provides that "where the rules of a society under this Act direct disputes to be referred to arbitration, arbitrators shall be named and elected" as therein mentioned; "and whatever award shall be made by the arbitrators, or the major part of them, according to the true purport and meaning of the rules of the society, shall determine the dispute; and should either of the parties to the dispute refuse or neglect to comply with or conform to such award within a time to be limited therein, the Court, upon good and sufficient proof being adduced of such award having been made, and of the refusal of the party to comply therewith, shall enforce compliance with the same upon the petition of any person concerned. Where the parties to any dispute arising in a society under this Act agree to refer the dispute to the Registrar, or where the rules of the society direct disputes to be referred to the Registrar, the award of the Registrar shall have the same effect as that of arbitrators."

By section 36, the arbitrators or Registrar may, at the request of either party, state a case for the opinion of the Court on any question of law, and may grant to either party such discovery as to documents and otherwise as might be granted by any Court of law or equity.

William King, for the society.—The present case is almost identical with that of Wright v. The Monarch Investment Building Society (1), where the Master of the Rolls decided under this Act of 1874 that the jurisdiction of the Court was ousted, and the dispute ought to be referred to arbitration. The powers conferred by the Act of 1874 are far wider than those conferred by the earlier statutes.

Dunham, for the plaintiff.—The case cited was in effect overruled by the decision of the House of Lords in Mulkern v. Lord (2). That decision followed Morrison v. Glover (3), which was not cited to the Master of the Rolls when he decided Wright v. The Monarch Investment Building Society (1). The principle established by Morrison v. Glover (3) and Mulkern v. Lord (2) is that an arbitration clause in the rules of a building society is only binding as to disputes arising between the society and its members as members—in other words, that the disputes must be of such a kind that they could only arise between the society and its members.

[PEARSON, J.—Mulkern v. Lord (2) was an action for redemption, and the decision proceeded on the ground that a decree for foreclosure or redemption was relief which only a Court could give. The present action is simply a money demand.]

But the true ratio decidendi was that clauses of this kind are only intended to apply to internal disputes between the society and its members; that, as Lord O'Hagan puts it, they deal "with small affairs amongst humble people, simple controversies easily brought to a short and final issue." In the present case difficult questions of law will arise which the Registrar is not competent to decide; and, although he has power to state a case for the opinion of the Court, he cannot be required to do so.

[PEARSON, J.—But the question remains, whether the extended provisions of the Act of 1874 were not put in with reference to the decisions on which you rely, and in order to enable cases to be referred to arbitration which could not previously have been so referred.]

There is no material distinction between the arbitration clause in the Act of 1874 and that of the 10 Geo. 4. c. 56, under which Mulkern v. Lord (2) was decided. Moreover, the line must be drawn somewhere. If a member supplied goods to the society and sued for the price, could it possibly be said that such a dispute was referrible to arbitration?

PEARSON, J.—I think I am bound, so far as I can be bound by the decision of a Court of concurrent jurisdiction, by the case of Wright v. The Monarch Investment Building Society (1). That was a decision of the Master of the Rolls upon this 34th section of the Building Societies Act, 1874; and I am rather surprised in looking at

(1) 46 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 649; Law Rep. 5 Ch. D. 726.
(2) 48 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 745; Law Rep. 4 App. Cas. 182; in Court below sub nom. Lord v. Mulkern, 47 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 228.

the judgment of the Lord Justice James in Lord v. Mulkern (2), when that case came before him in the Court of Appeal, that he does not at all refer to the fact that the Act of Parliament which he was considering was not the Act under which the Master of the Rolls decided the case of Wright v. The Monarch Investment Building Society (1).* If this were a case under the older Act, I should undoubtedly be bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Lord v. Mulkern (2), confirmed by the House of Lords in Mulkern v. Lord (2), and which decided, under the old Act, that the terms of that Act shew that only small disputes, of what I may call an internal character, between the society and its members were to be referred to arbitration, and that Act did not apply to such cases as foreclosure or redemption of mortgages, in regard to which Lord Cairns pointed out very clearly—and his observations were concurred in by the other noble Lords—that it is impossible to suppose that the section applied to such cases, inasmuch as it was not within the power of the arbitrator to give the relief which the Court could give in an action of foreclosure or redemption. It is admitted in this case that, though the dispute is as to the amount of the purchase-money of the property sold, the whole question is in reference to a money claim. That is a question as to which I conceive, under the terms of the Act of Parliament, the arbitrator, the Registrar, is entitled to go into all the circumstances of the case, and make the award, when he does make his award, neither for foreclosure nor redemption, but simply that a sum of money has been found to be due from the one party or the other. Nothing but money would be the subject of the award. Under these circumstances, finding that the Master of the Rolls construed this section as I am inclined to construe it myself, I must follow the decision of the Master of the Rolls in Wright v. The Monarch Investment Building Society (1). I cannot help thinking that the Act of 1874 was passed purposely to give the arbitrator larger powers than he had under the old Act, and that I should be going counter to the provisions and spirit of the Act if I were to withdraw from this society and its members the right which they have of having their disputes determined by arbitration, and instead thereof drive them to the expensive luxury of an action in this Court. I shall make an order as asked by the summons, and leave the costs of the proceedings to be awarded according to the discretion of the arbitrator.

* His Lordship was referring to the report of that case in the Weekly Reporter, which alone was cited to him. The report in the Law Journal Reports shews that Lord Justice James expressly referred to the circumstance above noticed.

In re PUMFREY. THE WORCESTER CITY AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY (LIMITED) v. BLICK.

Trustee—Power to invest in Real Estate—Purchase of Property of greater Value than Amount of Trust Funds—Advance of part of Purchase-money by Trustee—Lien of Trustee.

Under a power in a settlement trustees purchased real estate at a price greater than the whole amount of the trust funds, and, in order to supply the deficiency, part of the purchase-money was borrowed by P., one of the trustees. On the death of P.,—Held, that his estate was entitled to a lien upon the purchased property, for the amount advanced by him, subject, however, to the first charge of the trust estate for the full amount of the trust fund; and liberty was given to the trustee to apply to realise such lien.

By an indenture of settlement, dated the 3rd of January, 1863, and made between the defendant W. S. Mappin of the first part, M. A. Mappin, his wife (described in the settlement as Mary Ann Pumfrey), of the second part, and George Smith of the third part (being a settlement made in contemplation of the marriage then intended and shortly afterwards solemnised between the defendant W. S. Mappin and M. A. Mappin), certain personal estate, of the value of about 2,700*l.*, was settled, as to the income thereof, upon trust for M. A. Mappin for her life for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and after her death upon trust for the defendant W. S. Mappin during his life, if he should survive her, liable to be defeated by his bankruptcy or otherwise, as therein mentioned; and as to the capital of the trust estate, after the death of M. A. Mappin and the failure of the trust in favour of the defendant W. S. Mappin, upon certain trusts in favour of her children as therein mentioned. The settlement contained a power for the trustees for the time being, during the lives of M. A. Mappin and the defendant W. S. Mappin and the life of the survivor of them, upon their, his or her request in writing, to invest all or any part of the trust funds in the purchase of freehold, leasehold or copyhold hereditaments in England or Wales, and to resell the same hereditaments or any part thereof, and to stand possessed of the proceeds of any such sale, upon the same trusts as the money laid out in the purchase of such hereditaments would have been subject to if the same had not been so laid out. And the settlement also contained a declaration that in the meantime the profits of the said hereditaments should be paid to the person or persons for the time being entitled to the income of the trust fund.

In 1876 the defendant W. S. Mappin and his wife were desirous of having the trust fund invested in the purchase of certain freehold property at Twickenham, which was offered for sale at the price of 3,050*l.* They therefore requested their trustees to purchase such property. The trustees of the settlement at this time were John Hillman (since deceased), Charles Pumfrey and John Hillman Pumfrey. The trust fund not being sufficiently large to provide the whole of the purchase-money, a sum of 449*l.* to supply the deficiency was borrowed by Charles Pumfrey, one of the trustees, from the plaintiffs the Worcester City and County Banking Company. Upon receipt of the money, Charles Pumfrey signed the following memorandum, dated the 14th of August, 1876: "I, the undersigned, Charles Pumfrey, trustee of Mrs. M. A. Mappin, acknowledge to have received of the Worcester City and County Banking Company the sum of 449*l.*, and I undertake to place in their hands as further security the several title-deeds relating to a freehold dwelling-house and hereditaments called Riverside, at Cambridge Park, Twickenham, and I authorise them to hold the same until payment of the said sum and interest." The property was then conveyed to the trustees of the settlement, and in September Charles Pumfrey deposited the title-deeds relating thereto with the plaintiffs, together with an instrument executed by himself alone, which stated that he, as one of the trustees, had deposited with the plaintiffs the title-deeds to the property for the purpose of securing to them all sums of money in which he was or might be indebted to them either solely or jointly with any other person, and he thereby granted, conveyed, assigned and assured, and also limited and appointed the said hereditaments unto and to the use of the company and their successors for all his estate and interest therein, nevertheless by way of mortgage only. Charles Pumfrey died in December, 1877, leaving John Blick his executor and sole legal personal representative and sole devisee in trust of his real estate.

In August, 1881, only one payment in respect of interest on the loan having been made to the bank by W. S. Mappin, the whole principal sum and a large amount of arrears of interest being due to the plaintiffs, they brought this action against John Blick, John Hillman Pumfrey and W. S. Mappin, claiming that an account might be taken of what was due to the plaintiffs for principal and interest on their securities, and that the defendants or some of them should be ordered to pay what should be so found due; that in default of such payment the premises should be sold, or that the plaintiffs should be entitled to the premises free from all title and interest of the defendants or of any person claiming under them, and that so far as might be necessary the real and personal estate of Charles Pumfrey might be administered by the Court.

P. Vernon Smith, for the plaintiffs.

In re Pumfrey.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Maidlow, for the defendant John Blick.—The loan was obtained and the money invested by Charles Pumfrey according to the terms of the settlement for the purposes of the trust estate, and in no way for his own benefit; he is therefore entitled to a lien upon the purchased property for the amount of the money found by him.

Warrington, for the other defendants.—I admit that Charles Pumfrey's estate ought to be indemnified by the defendant W. S. Mappin, but beyond that Charles Pumfrey could have had no lien upon the property for the amount of the purchase-money provided by him. He having as a trustee mingled his own money with the trust fund the purchased estate belongs entirely to the cestui que trust. But even if he had a lien upon the property it could only be subject to the first charge of the trust estate for the full amount of the trust fund; and, that being so, he could not realise or enforce his lien until the time comes for the realisation or sale of the property under the trusts of the settlement—Leedham v. Chawner (1) and Darke v. Williamson (2)

P. V. Smith, in reply.

KAY, J.—This case certainly raises a rather curious question. The claim is made by the Worcester City and County Banking Company (Limited) to have an account of what is due to them for principal and interest upon certain securities, and to have those securities realised, and, if necessary, the real and personal estate of Charles Pumfrey administered by the Court. [His Lordship then stated the facts of the case, and proceeded:] Now, it is not disputed that the person to indemnify Charles Pumfrey is W. S. Mappin; but it is quite clear to me that he will not be able to do so; and that raises the question, whether C. Pumfrey, who obtained this loan, and who is undoubtedly liable to the bank, has any right to be indemnified out of the trust estate. If he has, it is not contested that under these circumstances of attempted mortgage, at least he has given to the bank whatever claim he is entitled to between him and the bank as against the trust estate.

First, I must take it on the pleadings that the bank knew they were dealing with the trustee, and therefore I cannot for a moment say that they have any right as legal mortgagees under this document, which was in fact a deed-poll, and which purported to assign the estate—to grant and convey the estate—to them. I cannot for a moment admit that under that document they had any prior remedy to the trust estate. It seems to me that, in any possible view of the case, the first right against this property is a right of the trust estate to have the trust fund completely provided for—that is a right which is a paramount right; then I must treat the bank as having a right to stand in the place of C. Pumfrey against the trust estate, and have transferred to themselves whatever right of indemnity he may have out of the purchased estates for the moneys which, under the above-mentioned circumstances, he advanced.

Now, prima facie, a trustee who, according to the well-known case of In re The German Mining Company (3), bona fide, without any intention of benefiting himself, advances money of his own for the purposes of the trust estate, has a right to be indemnified. Now, let me see whether that was so or not in this case. There is no suggestion that Pumfrey intended to benefit himself in any way. The conveyance of the estate was made to the three trustees. Pumfrey has never made any sort of claim on his own behalf; he does not now claim to have any profit or advantage of this purchase. His utmost claim is indemnity. It is plain, I think, from a letter I have read, that he advanced this money for the purpose of completing a purchase which was within the trust, the trust to make which had properly arisen at the request of the husband and wife, and which, I suppose, could not have been made at all, it being a small household property, unless the money to make up the amount of 3,050*l.* had been provided somehow or other.

Therefore it appears to me that this is entirely a case of a trustee, who, without the slightest chance of benefit to himself, for the convenience of his cestuis que trust, advanced a sum of money of his own to complete a purchase, which otherwise was entirely within the trust and within his power to make. Therefore, it seems to me that he has, quite apart from all these transactions of attempted mortgage, which I treat as being no more than an assignment of such equity as he had, or might have, to the bank—it seems to me he has got an equity to be indemnified, prima facie, in respect of this advance. But then a suggestion was made that the rule which is so often applied, and sometimes very harshly applied, against trustees, that where a trustee mixes his own money with trust funds the whole heap resulting from that admixture belongs to the trust, must be applied to this case. But on looking at Mr. Lewin's book on Trusts (7th ed.), I find, at p. 763, that which I think we all understand has always been the rule, that where an estate is bought partly with trust money and partly with other money, the trustee has never been held entitled to the whole estate, but all that he has been entitled to is a lien upon that estate for the full amount of the trust fund. Mr. Lewin's words are these: "We may here put a case of a trustee's money mixed in the same heap with the trust money. It may be said that the trust money has, like water, run into the general mass and become amalgamated, and therefore the cestui que trust has no lien. But clearly this cannot be maintained, for suppose a trustee, partly with his own money and partly out of the trust fund, to have purchased an estate. It cannot be predicated of any particular part of the estate that it was purchased with the cestui que trust's money, and yet the cestui que trust has a lien upon the whole for the amount that was misemployed."

(1) 4 Kay & J. 458.

That is the converse of the ordinary case where the equity arising from that admixture has been enforced against the trustee. But I find in Mathias v. Mathias (4) that a sole trustee who bought an estate with trust money, but expended money of his own to the amount of 820*l.* in paying costs, which expenditure with the purchase-money exceeded the amount of the trust estate invested in the purchase of the estate by a sum of 593*l.*, was declared by Vice-Chancellor Stuart to have a charge upon the purchased estate for that excess; and, unless the doctrine of admixture of trust moneys with the trustee's own money would prevent the trustee's claiming any right of indemnity, that seems to me to be the equitable and just mode of dealing with the case. Well, I cannot conceive that in this case the doctrine of admixture can be applied for this purpose. In strictness it ought only to be applied where it is impossible to make out how much was the trust fund and how much was trust money. Here there is no difficulty at all upon this point. The exact figures are perfectly well known; it is quite possible to make the separation which the trustee now desires to have made, the claim being made against him or his right against the trust estate. But then it is said—and I must say I am very much indebted to Mr. Warrington's argument, which was an extremely ingenious and able one—that the trustee, although he may have this lien, cannot enforce the lien until the trust for sale of this purchased estate arises again. But it seems to me, with all possible respect for that ingenious and able argument, that that is not sound. If the trustee has a right to be indemnified out of the trust estate, there is no reason why he should wait for his indemnity until the trust estate has been turned again into money under the trust. His right of indemnity gives him a right of charge or lien on the trust estate; he has a right to come at any time and say, "I claim to have my right of indemnity; I am now called upon to pay a sum of money for which I have a right of indemnity out of the trust estate, and the right gives me the right in equity to have a charge against the estate, and to have the charge enforced by the process of the Court of equity," and I think it does. It would be extremely harsh upon trustees, who are treated with all proper severity, and quite harshly enough by the rules of this Court, if, when they have a right of indemnity, it should be held that they are not to be allowed to enforce that right of indemnity until the estate happens to be turned into money under the trusts contained in the settlement. I do not think there is any such rule. I think if a trustee has a right of indemnity, he has a right to come to the Court to enforce that right. But then that right of indemnity must be enforced only subject to the right of the trust, and I hold the right of the trust to be this—to have this estate treated—to use the words of the settlement—"as an investment for the amount of the trust-moneys expended in purchasing it," and that the trust estate has the first charge upon the purchased property for the full amount of that money; and if it is not more than sufficient to pay the money required, the trustees' right of indemnity is only a second right subject to that, and must fail. On the other hand, supposing the trust estate so purchased should produce more than enough to pay the trust fund and to satisfy the trustees' right of indemnity, then it seems to me that the profit of this transaction must belong entirely to the trust estate.

(4) 3 Sm. & G. 552.

Therefore I think I must in this case declare that the bank have a right to stand in the place of C. Pumfrey as against the trust estate, and that C. Pumfrey's estate (he is now dead) has a right, subject to those prior rights of the trust estate which I have mentioned, to be indemnified out of the trust property in respect of all the moneys advanced by the plaintiffs which were actually invested in the purchase of the property. There must be an account of such moneys; W. S. Mappin to pay this; and his life estate must be impounded. Is the wife dead?

Warrington.—No. The life estate is defeasible upon alienation.

KAY, J.—I know that; but it must be impounded nevertheless, whatever that may be worth. I mean that he is not to get it. In case it shall appear that W. S. Mappin is unable to pay this money, I cannot make his estate pay, because that would destroy it; and only in that case there must be a decree to realise the lien against the trust estate. I think you had better take liberty to apply to realise the lien against the trust estate, and upon that application it must be proved to the satisfaction of the Court that W. S. Mappin cannot pay, and that every reasonable means of making him pay have been exhausted.

Will — Construction — Appointment — Election.

A testator having power to appoint among children of his first marriage, purported to appoint, subject to charges, partly in favour of the children of his second marriage, and gave benefits out of his own property to children of his first marriage:— Held, that the latter were put to their election.

John Richard White, the testator in this action, was twice married; by his first wife he had seven children—a son, Walter Alexander Sherrer, and six daughters; by his second marriage a son and a daughter.

On the occasion of his first marriage three undivided ninths of an estate called Coombe Hill estate, one undivided seventh of an estate called the Copplesbury estate, and the entirety of a house called Marksdanes House and premises, were settled upon trust, after successive life interests, to the husband and wife, for the issue of the marriage born in the lifetime of the survivor of the husband and wife as they should jointly appoint, and, in default, as the survivor should by deed or will appoint.

The testator in his lifetime acquired three other undivided ninths of the Coombe Hill Estate. His will, dated November, 1872, contained the following clauses:—

"Now, I do hereby, by virtue and in execution of the power of appointment given to me by the hereinbefore recited settlement, direct and appoint my said three shares and interest in the estate at Coombe

In re White.

Hill aforesaid unto my eldest son Walter Alexander Sherrer White, his heirs and assigns for ever, but subject to the charges in favour of his brother and sisters in this my will hereinafter mentioned, and in every other respect I confirm my said settlement.

"I devise my remaining shares in the said estate at Coombe Hill aforesaid, and the closes adjoining which I purchased of Miss Dampier and others and Mr. Moore, unto my said eldest son Walter Alexander Sherrer White, his heirs and assigns for ever, but subject to such charges in favour of his brother and sisters as shall equalise the shares of all my children in all my said property."

After a provision for the transfer of shares in a banking company to the testator's eldest son, the will proceeded—"And I direct that the value of such shares shall be ascertained at the date of my decease, and that the amount thereof shall be accounted for by my said son as part of his share in my estate, and be charged with such a sum as shall equalise the shares of all my children in all my property; but I empower my said trustees to sell all or any of such shares, if they shall feel it convenient so to do, and apply the proceeds as part of the residue of my real and personal estate."

The testator devised his residuary real and personal estate to his trustees upon trust for sale and reinvestment, with power to postpone the sale; and, after providing an annuity for his wife during widowhood, directed "that my said trustees shall stand possessed of the remainder of the income to arise from the residue of my said real and personal estate, in trust to pay the same for the maintenance and education of all my children until they shall attain the age of twenty-one years, and when and as they shall respectively attain that age, in trust to pay to each of them such an annual sum out of the said income as shall appear to my said trustees to be their fair equal share of such income. And when my youngest child shall attain the age of twenty-one, then my said trustees, after due provision for the annuity to my said wife if she shall be then living, shall sell the undisposed part of my real estate, except the Coombe Hill estate and the lands adjoining hereinbefore devised to my son Walter Alexander Sherrer White, subject as aforesaid, and get in the outstanding personal estate, and hold the same in trust for my child or children living at that time in equal shares as tenants in common; but if either of my children shall die, leaving issue which shall be living at the date of the division of my property, then such issue shall be entitled to the share of the parent or parents so dying, in equal shares."

The testator died March, 1874.

The action was brought by two of the daughters of the first marriage for administration of the testator's estate.

Cookson, Q.C., and B. B. Rogers, for the daughter of the first marriage, and Everitt, Q.C., and Rawlins, for the eldest son.—In cases where an appointment is made by will to objects of a power, and the donee adds a condition in favour of strangers to the power, though the provision is void no case of election arises. The Court reads the will as if all the passages in which attempts are made to impose such conditions were eliminated for all purposes, so that such passages cannot be relied on for the purpose of raising a case of election—Carver v. Bowles (1), Blacket v. Lamb (2), Woolridge v. Woolridge (3) and Churchill v. Churchill (4). The result of the decisions as summed up by James, L.J., when Vice-Chancellor, is that, "The rule as to elections is to be applied as between a gift under a will and a claim dehors the will and adverse to it, and is not to be applied between one clause in a will and another clause in the same will"—Wollaston v. King (5) and Wallinger v. Wallinger (6).

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Dyne, for the children of the second marriage.—The true rule to be derived from the cases cited on the other side is that where a testator appoints property partly to persons not objects of the power, and partly to persons objects of the power on whom he confers other benefits, a case of election is raised, except where the persons not objects of the power are persons he might naturally be attempting to provide for by the exercise of the power, such as children of objects of the power. This is not such a case, and a case of election is raised.

Moreover, in this will the condition and appointment are so mixed up that they cannot be separated and the condition rejected—Whistler v. Webster (7).

Cookson, Q.C., replied.

FRY, J. [in stating the facts, observed that the testator, in reciting the settlement, described his interest in the property which he had conveyed to the trustees as if it were still his own, calling it his reversionary interest. That might be explained, it was said, because it was his reversionary interest at the time of his marriage; but the subsequent language shewed he thought it was part of his property, and that in the appointment of the three shares he had treated the property as his own, and that the charges on the three settled shares in the Coombe Hill property were the same as those imposed on the other shares, and proceeded:]

Now the first question which arises is this, and it arises in this way. The two first clauses in the will subject settled property and unsettled property to the same charges in favour of the persons some of whom only are objects of the power of appointment. Does that create a case of election between those persons, namely, the children of the second family, who were clearly entitled, under the terms of his disposition, to charges upon the settled and unsettled property? or does it create no case of election at all? It is plain that they are objects of the charges on the settled property, and it is plain that the persons who take, through default of appointment, that settled property, are themselves objects of benefits conferred by gifts comprising the unsettled property; prima facie, therefore, you have a case in which certain persons who take the settled property are themselves objects of the benefits arising from unsettled property, and if they take the settled property in a manner which defeats the intention of the testator, that would appear to give rise to a right to compensation of the persons who are so disappointed.

That that is the rule as regards appointments can hardly be doubted, and it has been stated by Lord Justice James in the case of Wollaston v. King (5) in these terms. The rule laid down by the Master of the Rolls in Whistler v. Webster (7) is in general terms that no man shall claim any benefit under the will without conforming, as far as he is able, and giving effect to everything contained in it, whereby a disposition is made shewing an intention that such a thing should take place.

Now there is a class of cases which at first sight appears to be in conflict with the generality of that rule. That class of cases consists of Carver v. Bowles (1), Woolridge v. Woolridge (3) and other cases of the same description, including the case of Wollaston v. King (5), before the then Vice-Chancellor James. In those cases the testator has exceeded the power which is vested in him by directing that certain property which he has in the first place appointed to one object of the power shall be held upon trust, or subject to a condition, for persons who are not objects of the power, but who would probably be objects of any settlement or provision made by the donee of the power.

Now the question arose whether those gifts to persons not objects of the power were void, or whether the absolute appointment must be held good and the modifications be rejected, and the conclusion which the Court arrived at was undoubtedly that there being an absolute gift to the object of the power that must prevail, and that there being modifications which were not valid in law, they must be rejected; and the moment you arrive at that conclusion it is apparent that no case of election arises, because the object of the power is the only person who takes, and there is no conflict between a person taking under the exercise of the power who is not an object of it at all. Therefore the whole question as to the case of election falls entirely.

The question I have to determine, therefore, is this, Is the present a case in which the gift to Walter can stand, and the condition that it shall be subject to a charge can be rejected, at any rate so far as it is in excess of the power? or is it a gift in which the appointment to Walter can take effect only so far as the testator intended him to take it? It appears to me that that question really may be stated in another way—Is the condition or charge in the present case such a modification of the gift to Walter as, according to the ordinary course of family arrangements in this country, the testator would be likely to make? I think it is not. It differs entirely from an appointment to a person, subject to a declaration of trust for the benefit of the issue of the husband or family of that person. It is an attempt by the testator to impose on the appointed property an obligation to produce an equality between the objects of the power and the other members of the family. I think, therefore, the present case is not within the principles of Carver v. Bowles (1) and the cases I have referred to.

(7) 2 Ves. jun. 367.

In re White.

Now that being so, I hold that the case of election has arisen between the persons who claim in default of the exercise of the power and those who claim under the gift of the will.

PEARSON, J. 1883. Jan. 29. } SWAINSTON v. FINN AND THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

The Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 36), s. 20—Easement—Extinguishment of Easement affecting Land purchased by Local Authority—Right to Compensation.

The effect of section 20 of the Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875, is that upon the purchase of land by a local authority for the purpose of carrying into effect a scheme under the Act, all easements whatsoever affecting the land become thenceforth extinguished, subject only to this, that compensation is to be paid by the local authority to persons injured in manner provided by the section.

A local authority, under the powers of the above Act, purchased and took a certain house for the purposes of an improvement scheme. The plaintiffs, the owners of adjoining land, claimed to be entitled to a right to support to a building thereon from the house so purchased, and brought an action to restrain the local authority from removing the house in such a way as to interfere with the plaintiffs' right to support. The local authority had taken no proceedings to purchase the alleged easement of the plaintiffs:—

Held, that the only right the plaintiffs could have was to receive compensation under the above section, and that their action must therefore fail.

Badham v. Marris (45 Law Times, N.S. 579; infra p. 237) followed.

The plaintiffs, as feoffees of the parish of St. Olave, Jewry, were the owners in fee simple upon certain charitable trusts of the Essex Coffee House, No. 41 on the north side of High Street, Aldgate. The eastern wall of this house (66¾ feet in length) abutted on Middlesex Street, and on the east side of that street, immediately opposite to No. 41, were certain premises known as No. 148 High Street, Whitechapel.

The plaintiffs, in their statement of claim, alleged that for upwards of twenty years before the acts complained of in this action their eastern wall had without interruption been, and when the action was commenced was, supported by six wooden struts, fixed against and supported by the western wall of No. 148, and that they had acquired an absolute right to such support.

The Metropolitan Board of Works in the year 1877 projected a scheme of improvement at Whitechapel by widening Middlesex Street, and on the 14th of May, 1877, a provisional order was made by one of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State under the provisions of the Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 36), confirming the scheme proposed by the Board; and declaring (inter alia) that Middlesex Street should be widened to 40 feet.

By the Metropolis (Goulston Street, Flower and Dean Street, Whitechapel, &c.) Improvement Provisional Orders Confirmation Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. ciii.), the provisional order of the 14th of May, 1877, was confirmed. For the purposes of the improvement scheme it became necessary to pull down No. 148 and throw the site into Middlesex Street. Accordingly the Board, within the period of three years limited for that purpose by the Act of 1875, purchased and took No. 148.

In February, 1882, the plaintiffs ascertained that the Board were about to pull down No. 148 without making any provision for the support of No. 41, and so as, in fact, to deprive No. 41 of support. On the 14th of February, 1882, the plaintiffs gave the Board formal notice of their claim to a right of support. In July, 1882, the plaintiffs ascertained that the Board had in April, 1882, sold the materials of No. 148 to the defendant Finn, and were about to pull down the house. Notice was given to the defendants not to interfere with the plaintiffs' right to support, and, as it was disregarded, the plaintiffs issued the writ in this action, and on the 30th of August, 1882, obtained from the vacation Judge an injunction restraining any interference with their right to support until the second motion day in November sittings.

The plaintiffs claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from removing or interfering with their premises, or any part thereof, in such a manner as to deprive the plaintiffs of or interfere with the support given to the plaintiffs' premises by the struts, and in the alternative damages for any loss which might be occasioned to the plaintiffs by reason of the pulling down of the premises or interfering with the plaintiffs' right to support; or if the Court should be of opinion that the Board were entitled under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to deprive the plaintiffs of or to interfere with the support, then they asked for an injunction to restrain them from removing or interfering with their premises until they had paid to the plaintiffs or deposited in accordance with that Act the purchase or compensation money for such deprivation or interference.

The defendant Finn did not appear in the action. The Board, in their statement of defence, did not admit the plaintiffs' right to support, and denied that they were bound to provide the plaintiffs' premises with any support from their wall; and they did not admit that they were bound to compensate the plaintiffs for any damage which might be occasioned to their premises by the removal of No. 148.

Section 20 of the Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings Act, 1875, is as follows:—

"Upon the purchase by the local authority of any lands required for the purpose of carrying into effect any scheme authorised by a confirming Act, all rights of way, rights of laying down or of continuing any pipes, sewers or drains on, through or under such lands or part thereof, and all other rights or easements in or relating to such lands, or any part thereof, shall be extinguished; and all the soil of such ways, and the property in the pipes, sewers or drains, shall vest in the local authority, subject to this provision, that compensation shall be paid by the local authority to any persons or bodies of persons proved to have sustained loss by this section; and such compensation shall be determined in the manner in which compensation for lands is determinable under this Act, or as near thereto as circumstances admit."

The plaintiffs moved for an injunction, but by arrangement the motion was turned into an action for trial with witnesses, and set down to be heard.

Fischer, Q.C., and Northmore Lawrence, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs' easement or right to support over the land taken by the Board is an "interest in land" within the meaning of section 19 of the Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875, which the Board were empowered to purchase, and which they ought to have purchased. That section in effect incorporates into the Act of 1875 a modified version of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, including section 63 thereof, and the plaintiffs are persons whose lands have been "injuriously affected" within the meaning of the last-named section. The whole scheme of the Act is permissive, and very similar to that of the Act under which the case of The Managers of the Metropolitan Asylums District v. Hill (1) was decided. The 20th section of the Act of 1875, which applies to easements relating to lands required for the purposes of the scheme, and provides for the extinguishment of the easements, requires that compensation should be made to persons entitled to such easements. The Board, therefore, are not at liberty to do any act which may interfere with the plaintiffs' easement, unless or until they have paid or provided compensation.

[PEARSON, J., observed that the facts of the case must be read in connection with the language of section 20, which seemed very intelligible. That section appeared in effect to provide that upon the purchase of lands by a local authority for the purpose of carrying into effect a scheme under the Act, all easements whatsoever relating to the land should be extinguished, subject only to this, that compensation should be made as specified in the section. Therefore, upon the purchase of the land by the Board, the easement claimed by the plaintiffs became extinguished, and they retained only a right to compensation.]

W. Pearson, Q.C., and Method, for the Metropolitan Board of Works, referred to Badham v. Marris (2), in which the Vice-Chancellor Hall had expressly decided the point, holding that the effect of the section was as his Lordship had indicated.

Fischer, Q.C., and Northmore Lawrence admitted that they could not distinguish the case cited.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the argument: Angus v. Dalton (3), Lemaitre v. Davis (4), Moody v. Steggles (5), Francis v. Hayward (6), Hutton v. The London and South Western Railway Company (7) and Clark v. The London School Board (8).

PEARSON, J.—I shall follow the case of Badham v. Marris (2), and the action must therefore be dismissed. I decide against the plaintiffs being entitled to an injunction upon the construction of the 20th section of the Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings Act, 1875; but inasmuch as the plaintiffs may take proceedings to obtain compensation, I have not expressed my opinion, and I do not offer any suggestion now as to whether they have or not a perfectly good legal easement in respect of the struts.

[His Lordship then ordered that the action should be dismissed with costs as against the Board, with the exception of the costs of certain affidavits, which were not to be allowed to the plaintiffs. As against the defendant Finn the action was dismissed without costs.]

BADHAM v. MARRIS.

Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 36), s. 20—Easement—Right to Light.

A right to light over lands is an easement within the meaning of section 20 of the Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875.

This was a Special Case stated in an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants for an injunction and damages, pursuant to an order obtained by the plaintiffs under the Rules of Court, 1875, Order XXXIV. rule 2.

The plaintiffs were the owners of four houses on the west side of Cannon Street, Birmingham. There were ancient windows in the houses in respect of which the plaintiffs had become entitled to rights of light over certain lands situate on the eastern side of Cannon Street.

The local authority of the borough of Birmingham, for the purpose of carrying into effect a certain improvement scheme under the provisions of the Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings

Improvement Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 36), had purchased and taken the land on the eastern side of Cannon Street, and pulled down the dwellings existing on that site.

The defendants had obtained a lease of the lands, and proceeded to erect buildings thereon. These buildings were erected in conformity with designs approved by the local authority, but they interfered with the plaintiffs' right of light in such a manner as would under ordinary circumstances have entitled them to damages or an injunction.

The confirming Act authorising the scheme was the Local Government Boards Provisional Orders Confirmation (Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings) Act, 1876, 39 & 40 Vict. c. ccxxxv.

One of the questions submitted for the decision of the Court was whether, assuming the facts to be as stated, the plaintiffs' alleged rights over the land in question had been extinguished by virtue of section 20 of the Act of 1875, subject to the provisions of that section with regard to compensation.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Chubb, for the plaintiffs.—The terms of section 20 do not extend to an easement of light. It is remarkable that this, the most valuable of easements, is not specifically mentioned in the section. The rights and easements specifically mentioned are rights of way or of laying down pipes, sewers or drains "on, through or under" the lands taken —that is, rights affecting the surface soil only; and the general words "all other rights or easements in or relating to such lands" cannot be extended beyond rights or easements ejusdem generis with those specified. Many instances of such rights might be given—for example, the right to resort to a well upon the ground. The section only extends to rights which are capable of being ascertained at the time when the scheme is authorised. The arbitrator appointed under the Act could not allow any compensation for damage to light, and for the best of all reasons, namely, that he had no means of ascertaining that there was any such damage. All the arbitrator has before him are the maps, plans and schedules forming part of the scheme as required by the schedule to the Act of 1875. Thus, he could award compensation for interference with a right of way, or with pipes, sewers or drains, but he could not award compensation for something which would not appear on the plans. It would be impossible to predict to what height future buildings upon the land might reach. The whole scope of the compensation clauses of the Act shews that they do not apply to any compensation arising from building on the lands taken under the scheme.

W. Pearson, Q.C., and R. S. Wright, for the defendants, were not called upon. They pointed out in the course of the argument that under the Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings Act (1868) Amendment Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 64), s. 7. sub-s. 2, and the Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings Improvement Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 63), schedule cl. 4, provision was made for making compensation for all rights affected by improvement schemes such as the present.

HALL, V.C.—I do not see how it is possible to disregard the language of the 20th section of the Act, which seems to me to be very clear. It says that upon the purchase of lands by the local authority "all rights or easements in or relating to such lands or any part thereof" shall be extinguished. For good reasons, no doubt, it was thought by the Legislature that when an area of land was cleared of buildings for the purpose of being devoted to an improved use, or for the erection thereon of improved dwellings, it was desirable that the persons who should use that area for that purpose should not be embarrassed or fettered in erecting their new dwellings by any questions of light, or constrained to lay out the land in a different way from that in which they would otherwise have laid it out by reason of the existence of rights to light or other easements affecting the property. They were left at liberty to frame their plans regardless of the existence of rights of way, or of laying down or continuing pipes, sewers or drains, which are expressly mentioned in the Act, so that the 20th section certainly does expressly take away those rights or easements of sewers or drains. Whether or not in laying out or appropriating the land under the provisions of the Act in given cases, it might be equally well laid out notwithstanding the existence of or without destroying the rights of way and pipes, sewers or drains, is a question which the Legislature does not seem to have taken into consideration; and although it might well be in many cases that the land might be laid out equally well without destroying the easements, yet the Legislature has thought fit to say that in all these cases all these rights should be swept away, and that there should be a clear site given to persons who might take leases of the property for the purpose of securing improved dwellings so that they might lay out and build upon that site in any way they liked. It is said that in working out the compensation clauses of the Act you must only consider the 20th section as applicable to those particular rights specified and not applicable to an easement or right to light, because it is said that the compensation given by that section is necessarily applicable to such things only as are referred to in the schedule, and as will be seen and shewn on the maps or plans setting forth what will take place under the scheme, and not to rights and easements such as rights to light which will not appear on the maps or plans. But I do not find anything which, in my judgment, warrants such a construction of the 20th section. The words are "compensation shall be paid by the local authority to any persons, or bodies of persons, proved to have sustained loss" by the operation of the section. It is a question depending on the particular circumstances in each case what compensation shall be paid, and whether or not loss has been occasioned by interference with any right at the time when the purchase is made by the local authority. It might be that the person entitled to the light would not at that time be able to shew that he had sustained any loss, for non constat that interference with the light would have arisen so as to cause any loss to any person who previously enjoyed it. If he could prove any loss, then would be the time for him to make out his claim; but if he could not do so at that time, he would, in my opinion, have an opportunity of doing so subsequently: for the section goes on to say that "compensation shall be determined in the manner in which compensation for lands is determinable under this Act, or as near thereto as circumstances admit." I am of opinion that those words are sufficiently wide to extend to a case like the present, and to give a right of compensation to a person injured in respect of an easement of light, and that he is not deprived of such right merely because on the laying out of the land it did not appear that there was any such right, and that the existence of the right and the injury done would have to be ascertained afterwards. If that were so, I think he would have a right to a separate enquiry as to the injury done to him in respect of his lights as soon as "circumstances would admit." It is said that by the subsequent Act, the Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings Improvement Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 63), schedule cl. 4, full provision for compensation is made, but I do not think it is necessary to refer to that, because the words of section 20 of the Act of 1875 appear to me to cover the point. Reasons may be put forward sufficient to shew that it might be a very great convenience to persons taking property of this kind to know that they had nothing to do with rights of light, so that they might go on to lay out the lands in the best way they could without regard to them, and when they had so laid them out have only to consider the right of any person injured to compensation. I think that I should be repealing this enactment if I were to hold that when property is purchased or taken by the local authority, having been acquired by them under the provisions of the Act, it is not free from easements of every kind, including rights to light.

In re BODDINGTON. BODDINGTON v. CLARIAT.

Will — Construction — Widowhood — Nullity of Marriage—Misdescription.

A testator gave his wife a legacy of 200*l. and an annuity so long as she should continue his widow, or at her option a legacy of* 2,000*l. in lieu of such annuity. The person described as wife obtained a declaration of nullity of marriage:*—Held, that she was entitled to the legacy of 200*l., but not to the annuity or legacy of* 2,000*l.*

In October, 1879, Thomas Boddington and Emily Caroline Halpen (the plaintiff in this action) went through the ceremony of marriage.

Thomas Boddington, by his will, dated December, 1879, gave his residuary estate to trustees upon trust, in the following words, "to pay to my wife Emily Caroline Boddington, within one month after my decease, a legacy of two hundred pounds; and in addition thereto to pay to my said wife so long as she shall continue my widow and unmarried one annuity of three hundred pounds, by equal quarterly instalments, commencing from the date of my decease, or otherwise in lieu and in substitution of the said annuity at the option of my said wife, if she shall prefer it, a legacy of two thousand pounds; and I direct that the provision hereby made for my said wife shall be in lieu and in satisfaction of any dower or thirds to which she might be entitled out of my said estate."

The plaintiff obtained in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court a decree declaring the marriage null on the ground of the impotency of the testator Thomas Boddington, which was made absolute on the 5th of April, 1881. After the decree had been made absolute he paid the plaintiff a sum of 6,000*l.*, for which she gave a receipt, dated the 10th of April, 1881, which contained the following words: "I have this day received the sum of six thousand pounds deposited by him," Thomas Boddington, "as the provision to be made for me consequent on the said decree being made absolute."

Thomas Boddington died in July, 1881.

In re Boddington.

The plaintiff sued as Emily Caroline Boddington (otherwise Halpen) to obtain payment of the legacy and annuity by means of an administration action, the defendants being the trustees of the will.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Finch, for the plaintiff.—There could be no question that the plaintiff is the person meant in the will, and a mere misdescription of her character cannot prevent her taking the benefits intended for her. The only possible question that could be raised was whether the annuity fails because it is given "so long as she shall continue my widow." Those words are inapplicable to the altered circumstances, and stand on the same footing as a misdescription; and the will must be treated as if they were struck out. The case is in that respect on all fours with Rishton v. Cobb (1). They referred also to Kennell v. Abbott (2) Schloss v. Stiebel (3), Giles v. Giles (4) and Wilkinson v. Joughin (5). In any event the plaintiff is entitled to exercise her option and take the capital sum of 2,000*l.* in lieu of the annuity.

Davey, Q.C., and Langworthy.—Both gifts were satisfied by the gift of 6,000*l.* in the testator's lifetime.

The testator made the gifts for the particular purpose of providing for his widow in discharge of a moral duty, and that purpose having failed the gifts failed also—Pankhurst v. Howell (6), Monk v. Monk (7) and Debèze v. Mann (8).

As to the annuity, that was only given so long as the plaintiff should be the widow of the testator—a period that cannot exist; and the plaintiff can no more take a gift in lieu of what is not given than she can take what is not given.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.

FRY, J.—The plaintiff now claims the legacy of 200*l.* There is no doubt about the identity of the person, and the maxim would apply veritas nominis tollit errorem demonstrationis; and she is prima facie entitled to the legacy of 200*l.*, although described as the testator's wife, which she was not at the time of his death. Then it is said that in the present case the Court can see that the legacy was given for a particular purpose and intention—namely, to discharge the moral obligation which a man owes to his wife; and it is said that the particular purpose is declared by the direction "that the provision hereby made for my said wife shall be in lieu and satisfaction of any dower or thirds to which she might be entitled." In my judgment that is not a declaration of any particular purpose for which the legacy is given, but is only a direction that she shall take nothing but the legacy. It does not really add to the expression of purpose or intent.

Then it is further urged that the effect of an instrument signed by the plaintiff on the 10th of April, 1881, was to satisfy the purpose so declared by the will. By that instrument she referred to certain arrangements which had been come to between the solicitors of herself and her then or late supposed husband, and she declared she received the 6,000*l.* deposited by him as a provision to be made for her consequent on the decree being made absolute.

Now it appears to me that the purpose which a husband has in providing for a widow, and the purpose which a man has who has been declared not to be the husband of a woman by reason of impotence in making a provision for that woman during his lifetime, are very different purposes, and it is impossible to say that the one is a satisfaction or ademption of the other. Further than that, it is to be observed that the cases in which the particular purpose of a legacy being satisfied during the lifetime of the testator prevents the legacy from taking effect are of a very restricted character. The principle only applies to cases in which the Court sees that the legacy is given for that which Lord Justice James has spoken of as a particular specific purpose in the case of Pankhurst v. Howell (6). He illustrates that in this way: he says—"as, for instance, a legacy given to purchase an advowson for a son, and which should be ademed, and perhaps it would be more correct to say satisfied, by the father afterwards purchasing the advowson for him." And the very case of Pankhurst v. Howell (6), in which the Lord Justice made those observations, shews within what narrow limits the Court has confined this principle of satisfaction. There the testator has given the sum of 200*l.* to pay to his wife within ten days after his decease. The Court could have no doubt that the intention was and the result was to provide her with money immediately on her finding herself a widow. The testator had at the request of his wife during his last illness given to her 200*l.*, that she might have a sum of money that she could control immediately on his death without the interference of the executors, and it was held that the one did not satisfy the other. I think that principle does not apply. I think, in short, that the principle which does apply in this case is that which is stated by Lord Cottenham in Rishton v. Cobb (1), where he said: "After looking through all the cases upon the subject, which are but few in number, I do not find that I can better define what circumstances will make the legacy void than by adopting the words of Lord Alvanley in Kennell v. Abbott (2), namely, that when a legacy is given to a person under a particular character which he has falsely assumed, and which alone can be assumed the motive of the bounty, the law will not permit him to avail himself of it, and therefore he cannot demand his legacy." In order that that rule may come into operation there must be two things: there must be the false assumption of the character of the legatee; and, secondly, there must be evidence that that false character was the motive of the bounty, and the evidence, or the presumption or inference, that it was the object of the bounty. In the present case the first element is entirely wanting. There was no false assumption by this lady of the character of wife. Mr. Boddington, the testator, had gone through with her the ceremony of marriage. There was no act or default on her part which rendered that marriage invalid, and the result and the ground of the decree of invalidity was on his part and not on hers. There was not that fundamental fact on which such cases as Kennell v. Abbott (2) proceeded. I hold, therefore, that the lady is entitled to the 200*l.*

Then arises this question, whether she is entitled to the annuity of 300*l.* given to her "so long as she shall continue my widow and unmarried"? It appears to me on principle that is an annuity given to a person for a period which never can come into existence. She never was his widow, and therefore never can remain his widow for any length of time. On principle, therefore, I am unable to see how an annuity for a non-existing period can possibly be claimed.

The only doubt which has arisen in my mind has been from the case which I have referred to of Rishton v. Cobb (1). There the testator gave a particular sum of 2,000*l.* upon trust to invest in a particular manner, and to authorise and empower Lady Fanny Campbell to receive the dividends as they became due "so long as she shall continue single and unmarried," with a gift over, or rather a direction that it should fall into the residue in case she sold, assigned or disposed of such dividends. The Lord Chancellor came to the conclusion that she was absolutely entitled to that annuity. It appears to me, if I rightly follow, although I am not sure that I do, the reasoning of the Lord Chancellor, that he proceeded very much on the grounds of the appropriation of the 2,000*l.* and the direction to pay the dividends of that to the lady, and he came to the conclusion that that was an unlimited direction, and consequently carried with it a gift of the whole fund. He appears to me to have intended to distinguish from such a case as that the present case, because he has said this is different from a gift of dividends during widowhood. I repeat that I am not perfectly clear I apprehend the principle on which the Lord Chancellor proceeded, and therefore I am under some apprehension that in deciding this case as I do I may decide it at variance with the decision of the Court in that particular case. But, looking at the whole of the cases, I think the principles of the decision there do not apply to the present case. The Lord Chancellor intended to distinguish that case from one like the present. I think, therefore, on principle I must hold that the annuity does not arise, because it is given for a period that has no existence.

Then arises this question, whether the plaintiff can take in lieu and in substitution for that annuity the legacy of 2,000*l.*? On principle it appears to me plain that she cannot. She can only take it in lieu of the annuity; she can only take it in substitution of the annuity, and she can only take it if she prefers it to the annuity —I am following the words of the testator—but all those expressions imply the existence of the annuity as a thing which she can take. But the annuity, I hold, is a thing which she cannot take. I think, therefore, if she cannot take the annuity she can take nothing in lieu of it—nothing in substitution of it—nothing in preference to it. The gift must therefore fail.

The plaintiff, therefore, succeeds to the extent of her demand for 200*l.*, and fails for a much greater portion. I shall, therefore, make the declaration without costs.

JERVIS v. LAWRENCE.

Charity—Mortmain—Bonds secured on Rates—Pure Personalty—9 Geo. 2. c. 36 —Interest in Land.

A testator bequeathed ten 100*l. Norland Estate bonds to various charitable institutions. These bonds were securities for money raised for the improvement of the Norland Estate, and by the Norland Estate Act* (6 Vict. c. xxxiii.) were secured by a rate charged upon and leviable by distress, if necessary, on the goods and chattels of the owners or occupiers on the estate:— Held, that the bonds did not create an interest affecting the land, and that the bequest was consequently valid.

Petition.

William Henry Soare, by his will dated the 9th of August, 1861, gave and bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate to trustees for the benefit of the plaintiff Clara Bertha Jervis for life, and after her decease upon trust to sell the said estate and divide the proceeds equally among the six charitable institutions therein named. The testator died in June, 1867, and his will was duly proved. In September, 1867, the plaintiff commenced an action for the administration of the testator's real and personal estate, in which it was certified that a portion of the testator's personal estate consisted of 1,000*l.* due on ten bonds of 100*l.* each from the trustees of the Norland Estate, Kensington; but the question whether such portion of the estate had arisen from or was connected with land was reserved.

On the 20th of September, 1882, the plaintiff died. These bonds were created under the Norland Estate Act (L. & P. 6 Vict. c. 33), which was an Act "for the Improvement of the Norland Estate, in the parish of St. Mary Abbot's, Kensington, in the County of Middlesex," by which the management of all the streets and ways over the Norland Estate was vested in certain commissioners, who were thereby empowered to exercise various powers for the improvement of the estate, and to raise money for carrying the several purposes of the Act into execution, by levying rates and assessments upon the occupiers or owners of all tenements and hereditaments within the limits of the Act; these rates were recoverable by distress, if necessary, on the goods and chattels of the owners or occupiers of the estate. The commissioners were also authorised to borrow money at interest on the credit of the rates, and, for securing repayment thereof with interest, might assign over the said rates and assessments, or any part thereof, to the lender. The mortgage or assignment was to be in the form given in the schedule to the Act. The rates leviable under the Norland Estate Act were not affected by the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855. A petition was now presented, by one of the charities interested, for division and payment out of the estate, when the validity of the bequest was raised, it being alleged on behalf of the next-of-kin that the bonds created an interest in land, and were therefore within the Mortmain Act.

Millar, Q.C., and B. B. Rogers, for the petitioners.—These bonds are secured on rates which are recoverable by distress on the goods and chattels of the owners or occupiers of houses on the estate, and therefore do not savour of realty. Finch v. Squire (1), Ashton v. Lord Langdale (2) and Thornton v. Kempson (3), decisions which are relied on by the next-of-kin, have been practically overruled by Attree v. Hawe (4).

The following authorities are also in our favour—Walker v. Milne (5), In re Mitchell's Estate; Mitchell v. Moberly (6), Gardner v. The London, Chatham and Dover Railway (7) and In re Harris; Jackson v. The Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty (8).

E. Beaumont, Vaughan Hawkins and John Sayer, for other charities, supported the contention of the petitioners.

Hemming, Q.C., and F. W. Maitland, for the trustees, on behalf of the next-of-kin.—In Finch v. Squire (1) the security was precisely similar to these Norland Estate bonds, and on the question as to a mortgage of turnpike tolls being within the Mortmain Act, Ashton v. Lord Langdale (2) has not been overruled or even touched upon by any of the authorities relied on by the petitioners. The mere dicta in Attree v. Hawe (4) cannot be taken as overruling six authorities which have governed the law on this point for eighty years. The question as to the jurisdiction of the Appeal Court to overrule long-standing authorities was considered in Henty v. Wrey (9), Jarmain v. Chatterton (10) and Wheeldon v. Burrows (11). We also rely on Knapp v. Williams (12), Howse v. Chapman (13), The King v. Bates (14) and The King v. Winstanley (15), which are not overruled, and which have settled for years that securities similar to those in the present case were within the Mortmain Act.

Millar, Q.C., replied.

BACON, V.C.—No doubt this case raises a very nice point. I will consider the case first without reference to the authorities, which of course I will not neglect to refer to before I part with the case. Is this a charge or incumbrance affecting the land? The right to levy rates is conferred by the Norland Estate Act, by which authority is given to levy a rate upon the occupiers or owners of this land for the purpose, and for the purpose only, of reimbursing the expenditure permitted by the Act, by which the value of the property was to be increased. Now, what are the means of enforcing that contribution from the owners and occupiers in the shape of rates to be made? Either by bringing an action against an owner or occupier who refuses or neglects to pay, or by issuing a distress-warrant to levy upon his goods and chattels for the amount demanded. How does that affect the land? Not in the slightest degree. The land cannot be sold by the incumbrancers—if the commissioners can be called incumbrancers—and they cannot affect it or touch it. The land remains as it was—easily alienable by the owner, and is not affected in the slightest degree; and even if I were satisfied (and I am not) that the imposition of this rate diminished the value of the land, that would not affect the case in the slightest degree. The policy of the law being plain on the Mortmain Act (9

Geo. 2. c. 36), and the matter in substance being that the commissioners, who then made a rate, have a right to compel payment of it by distress on the goods and chattels of the owner, I ask again, Where is there an interest in the land? It is impossible that it can be said that the land is burdened in the slightest degree, or even, if it is burdened, that the persons who claim the benefit have a right to touch the land for the purpose. I have been referred to a series of decisions, beginning with the case of Finch v. Squire (1), as establishing that a charge, similar in its nature (as indeed it is very similar in its nature) to that which has been imposed by the commissioners under this Act of Parliament, has been held to confer on them an interest in the land which by law would pass to the mortgagee. Now the case so often quoted was no doubt before the Court when Ashton v. Lord Langdale (2) and Walker v. Milne (5) were discussed. In Walker v. Milne (5) the decision is plainly and directly contrary to the notion that the tolls were an interest in the land. Ashton v. Lord Langdale (2) as clearly decides that they are an interest in the land and within the Mortmain Act. That conflict of authorities came before the Court upon two recent occasions in the cases which have been referred to. The Court did not hesitate to prefer the decision of Lord Langdale in Walker v. Milne (5), which is directly at variance with Finch v. Squire (1); and if it stood there only I should be bound to hold that Finch v. Squire (1) was no longer the authority which before it had appeared to be, because a Court of competent jurisdiction had overruled it. But the matter does not rest there at all, for on the two recent occasions which have been referred to in the argument before me, those cases and all the other cases came before the Judges, and were then the subject of a very elaborate and well-considered judgment. In Attree v. Hawe (4) it was not the judgment of Lord Justice James alone, but the judgment of all the Judges who had heard the appeal; and the first thing the Court does is to point out what is the effect and extent, and, incidentally, the policy of the Mortmain Act. I will not read again what has been read to me more than once by the learned counsel on both sides; but in the case of Attree v. Hawe (4) the Act is clearly and distinctly considered. Their Lordships say, "There is nothing really in the Act which has so far gone, or at all gone, beyond its recited object as to preclude the application of the rule of construction, the rule of common sense, that you are to construe the enacting part by the light of the recital of its object." That is a principle of construction which I suppose no one would question the propriety of. The scope and object being to prevent an invasion of the general law of mortmain, it is prevented by the terms of the enactment, and in no other way; and when I find, as I do, in a note to the case of Corbyn v. French (16), this expression by the then Lord Chancellor, in the case of Knapp v. Williams (12)—"Consider what the point of law is from the nature of the interest. It is not at all within the mischief; but the consequences would open a much larger field for charitable donations"—it excites my surprise, as I am reminded it did on a former occasion. That is not a decision at all. It is legislation. "It is not within the mischief of the Act of Parliament." What right has the Court to contemplate its opening a field for wider testamentary dispositions? I believe that there is a fault that has been committed in a great many of these cases. The Court has seen that it was the object of the law to curb and restrict the powers of testators, and if they found something not within the mischief of the Legislature, that decision might be applied and extended so as to cover it. That, in my opinion, is not the law, and it is that which I should not follow, however venerable the authority may be by whom it was enunciated; but I find that in the two cases I have mentioned, the judgments of Vice-Chancellor Knight-Bruce in Ashton v. Lord Langdale (2) and Lord Langdale in Walker v. Milne (5) are directly at variance on this vital point, and I find that the judgment of Lord Langdale is to be preferred to that of Vice-Chancellor Knight-Bruce. It is impossible that Finch v. Squire (1) and Lord Langdale's judgment can both subsist. It is impossible that both of them can be right. Those cases were before the Court in Attree v. Hawe (4), and were well considered at the time, and their Lordships said, "It is impossible not to prefer the decision of Lord Langdale in Walker v. Milne (5) to the decision of Vice-Chancellor Knight-Bruce in Ashton v. Lord Langdale" (2). I consider, therefore, that this case is covered by the decision in Attree v. Hawe (4). Whatever respect, therefore, I may be willing to pay to the earlier decisions (and I am willing to pay unbounded respect to them), I cannot possibly, in the face of the later decision, hold to them and disregard what has been decided almost the other day, and decided, not lightly, but after long argument, and after due deliberation (and it was expressed not viva voce but in a written judgment, written with the sanction of the four learned Judges who heard the case argued before them) on the ground there stated. By no twisting of words, or any contrivance of construction, can it be said that the owners of these rates have any interest whatever in the land. They have a power of distress at the most. If a receiver were appointed (and under certain circumstances the Act provides for the appointment of a receiver), the receiver could only do that which the Act authorises. A man who has a power of distress has no interest in the land. A landlord or lessor while the lease subsists has no interest in the land, but he has a right to go by common law, under the Act relating to distress of William and Mary (2 Will. & M. c. 5), on to the land, and then and there to take all such chattels as can be properly a subject of distress. What interest in the land has he? The object of the old law of mortmain is to prevent the inalienability of land. How does the right which the commissioners, or their assignee or mortgagee, get, to levy by distress on movable chattels, give any interest in the land? If it did, it would be, in my opinion, opposed to the decision in the last case I have referred to. There is also the case of In re Harris; Jacson v. The Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty (8), in which the Master of the Rolls, in the most explicit terms, he having been a party to the judgment which I have just read in Attree v. Hawe (4), says, "I think that, looking at the decision in Attree v. Hawe (4), it is impossible now to say that these bonds are not pure personal estate. It appears to me that Attree v. Hawe (4) decides that, in order to create an interest in land, the land must be affected directly." I am sure that nobody would expect, in the present state of the law, and as it is in the present day administered, that I should decide directly contrary to the words which I find in these two recent authorities, which are deliberate and well considered decisions. It is true it must be observed that the case of In re Harris (8) before the Master of the Rolls was very different from the case before me. There the Master of the Rolls found his way to decide the case upon the facts before him, without any more direct reference than that I have mentioned to the Statute of Mortmain. The Master of the Rolls observes, "The Vice-Chancellor there says, 'It is said that these mortgages are by assignment of the rates when collected, and that the commissioners are the persons to collect them, and must be taken to have them in their hands in the shape of money at the time of the mortgage, and thus the mortgagee cannot have an interest in property in the nature of a charge affecting the land itself, but only affecting the money so in the hands of the commissioners;' but I do not think that view to be correct." The Master of the Rolls had to deal with the case in which the claim was only against a person who had the money, or the means of getting it into his hands, and availed himself of it. He says, "Then the Vice-Chancellor goes into a train of reasoning which shews that if he had thought that view to be correct he would have decided the other way." The Master of the Rolls held that mode of stating the reasoning to be according to the true facts of the case, and upon that his decision is based. Having said that in the face of Attree v. Hawe (4) the former authorities cannot be maintained, and that it was not a case of a gift of pure personalty, the Master of the Rolls goes on: "Now, assuming that the case of Attree v. Hawe (4) went a step further, I must say that it appears to me that that case, overruling as it did Ashton v. Lord Langdale (2), would, upon the same principle, overrule Finch v. Squire (1)," which seems to me to be irresistible. The two cases cannot stand together. The more recent decision must prevail. It is utterly impossible to reconcile them. It is wholly impossible to doubt that the four Judges meant what they said in the case of Attree v. Hawe (4). The Master of the Rolls says, " But it is not necessary for me to go so far as that, because the doctrine of Finch v. Squire (1) was that, inasmuch as the rates were chargeable in respect of the ownership of the land, and could be levied by distress, they were like rent. But of course that does not apply to the case before me, where, however remotely, the persons who are ultimately responsible are so in respect of the land. The parties who charge the rates never can recover anything in respect of the land." In that respect, that case and the present are one. They have nothing whatever to do with the land; they can only call upon the person to pay. I am of opinion, therefore, having paid all possible attention to Mr. Hemming's argument and to the authorities on which he relies, that this case is clearly not within the Mortmain Act; and, if it is not within the statutory enactment of the Act, there is no reason whatever why the gift of the testator should not prevail, or why it should not be treated, as the Master of the Rolls says in the case I have referred to, as pure personalty.

A person liable to pay costs as between party and party is not entitled to a reference for taxation under the third party clause (section 38) of the Attorneys Act, 1843.

This was a motion on the part of Mr. Cowdell, a solicitor, to set aside an order of course that had been obtained by the Clay Lane Local Board (Derbyshire) for taxation of a bill of costs, in respect of an award in which he acted as solicitor for Mary Fox Wilson and Rania Wilson, the representatives of William Henry Wilson (deceased). The award was made by an umpire, under the Public Health Act, 1875, in respect of damage to property occasioned by works of the board, and the umpire awarded that the local board should pay, as well as damages, the costs of the opposite parties. The reference for taxation was obtained on petition of the local board for an order of course, which recited that " the said solicitor had delivered unto the petitioners his bill of fees and disbursements, which the petitioners were liable to pay."

Daniel Jones, for the motion.—The local board are liable only to pay " party and party " costs. Section 38 of the Attorneys Act only enables a third party to obtain a reference for taxation where he is liable to pay the same costs as the solicitor's client is liable for; and so it was held by the Master of the Rolls in In re Grundy (1), notwithstanding the earlier case of In re Hartley (2). The proper mode of getting the costs which the local board are liable to pay determined by taxation is to make the award a rule of Court, and then the costs can be brought before the Taxing Master.

Farwell, contra.—The local board are no doubt strictly liable only to pay party and party costs; but they may waive their right to pay on the lower scale, and then obtain the common order as third parties —In re Hartley (2). A mortgagor is entitled to have his mortgagee's bill of costs taxed under this section—Balme v. Paver (3), Vincent v. Venner (4), In re Wells (5), In re Lees (6) and In re Carew (7)—though his costs are party and party costs.

Daniel Jones, in reply.—Section 38 of the Attorneys Act imposes a liability on the solicitor to pay costs if one-sixth is taxed off the bill, and, without words to bring the case within the section, such liability cannot be put on the solicitor.

FRY, J. (on Jan. 26, after stating the facts), said,—The question is simply one of the regularity or irregularity of the order. It appears to me that question must be answered by reference to the Act. The 37th section clearly deals with taxation as between solicitor and client. The 37th section provides that no solicitor shall sue for his costs till he shall have delivered a bill of costs—that of course being between solicitor and client. Then it provides for reference and taxation of such bill of costs. That means between solicitor and client. The section then goes on to provide that the costs of taxation shall follow the event in this manner: "If such bill when taxed be less by a sixth part than the bill delivered, then such solicitor shall pay such costs." The clause, therefore, taxes the costs of the solicitor in the manner most beneficial to him. At the same time it imposes on the solicitor a statutory obligation to pay the costs of taxation if one-sixth is struck off the bill. The clause is, therefore, partly beneficial and partly adverse to the solicitor. Then section 38 provides "that where any person not chargeable with any such bill within the meaning of the provisions hereinbefore contained, shall be liable to pay or shall have paid such bill," he may obtain a reference for taxation. Now it is plain that "such bill" means a bill as between solicitor and client; it refers back to the bill of costs referred to in the prior section, which, as I have already pointed out, is between solicitor and client. The local board have obtained an order of course, which was made on a suggestion that the local board were liable to pay the same costs as Mary F. Wilson and Rania Wilson were liable to pay. Now, is that suggestion true? In my view it is not. The bill sent by Mr. Cowdell was one which his clients were liable to pay, not the bill which the local board are liable to pay. That bill must be either a different bill or a portion only of the larger bill his clients are liable for. It is not, therefore, true to say that the local board are liable to pay that bill of costs. Then it is suggested that, although it is not true that they were originally bound, the local board may elect to pay on the higher scale, and may by that means obtain the benefit of taxation under this clause of the Act. It is conceivable that that might be so if the effect of the Act were merely to give a benefit to the solicitor; but the effect of the Act is also to cast a burden on his back, because it imposes on him a liability to pay costs in a certain event. It appears to me, therefore, that the order was irregular; an order which, as a matter of course, goes on to direct "that if such bill when taxed be less by a sixth part than the said bill as delivered, the said Master do tax the petitioners their costs of such reference," a direction which the board had no right to obtain against the solicitor. I hold, therefore, that the order was irregular, and the same must be set aside with costs.

I have only to add that the result I have arrived at from the consideration of the statute is in exact accordance with the decision of the Master of the Rolls in In re Grundy (1).

A mortgagor attorned tenant to a first mortgagee at a yearly rent equal to the amount of interest. The first mortgagee took no proceedings under the attornment clause. In a foreclosure action against a second mortgagee, — Held, that the first mortgagee was not to be treated as mortgagee in possession.

This was a foreclosure action.

In 1866 E. Corbett mortgaged certain freehold property to Kidd, and attorned tenant to Kidd at a yearly rent equal to the amount of the interest. By an indenture, dated the 13th of October, 1869, and made between Kidd of the first part, Corbett of the second part and J. Kershaw of the third part, the mortgage was transferred to J. Kershaw, and the amount of the interest being altered, a new attornment clause was entered into, so as to make the yearly rent equal to the amount of the interest. The clause was in the following terms: "And this indenture also witnesseth that for the consideration aforesaid the said E. Corbett doth hereby attorn and become tenant from year to year to the said J. Kershaw, his heirs and assigns, for and in respect of all and singular the hereditaments and premises hereby granted and now occupied by him the said E. Corbett, at the yearly rent of 80*l.*, clear of all deductions, to be paid by equal half-yearly payments on the 13th day of April and 13th day of October; the first half-yearly payment to be made on the 13th day of April next. Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared, that it shall be lawful for the said J. Kershaw, his heirs and assigns, at any time, without any previous notice of his or their intention so to do, to enter upon and take possession of the said hereditaments and premises whereof the said E. Corbett hath attorned tenant as aforesaid, and to determine the said tenancy created by the aforesaid attornment."

By an indenture, dated the 30th of August, 1881, this mortgage was duly transferred to the plaintiffs.

This action was brought by the plaintiffs against Grundy, who was second mortgagee, and Corbett. Corbett did not appear.

The defendant Grundy, by his statement of defence, submitted that the accounts as against him ought to be taken on the footing of the plaintiffs and their predecessors in title having been mortgagees in possession, and as such chargeable with the rent reserved by the aforesaid attornment clause.

The plaintiffs and their predecessors in title had never entered or taken any proceedings under the attornment clauses.

The clause is a mode of securing his interest to the mortgagee; but he is not obliged to resort to it. There is a covenant to pay interest as well. There must be two parties to the transaction. The mortgagee must take advantage of the attornment clause before he can be said to go into possession. I am not going to be the first to decide that every mortgagee who has an attornment clause in his deed is thereupon to be

SPENCER v. THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

Special Act—Lands Clauses Act, 1845, s. 18—Conditions Precedent—"Take."

By the Metropolitan Street Improvements Act, 1877, incorporating the Lands Clauses Act, the Board of Works were empowered to "enter upon, take, use and hold" lands specified in the deposited plans. By section 33 it was provided that before the Board should, without certain consents, "take for the purposes of the Act" more than fifteen houses in one parish occupied wholly or partially by persons of the labouring classes, they should satisfy one of the Secretaries of State that they had provided accommodation elsewhere for the same number of persons as had occupied the houses to be taken.

The Board, without obtaining the requisite consent, and before providing such accommodation, served the plaintiff with notice to treat for the purchase of more than fifteen houses of his, occupied by the labouring classes, and also served notice of their intention to summon a jury. The plaintiff thereupon claimed an injunction to restrain the Board from proceeding with their notices until they had complied with the conditions:—

Held, by CHITTY, J., that the word "take" used in section 33 included purchasing and acquiring a title to, and was not to be confined to taking possession.

Held (on appeal), by JESSEL, M.R., and BOWEN, L.J. (dissentiente COTTON, L.J.), that the land in question was land which the Board were authorised to purchase or take within section 18 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and that the conditions in section 33, being such as the Board were able and could be compelled to perform, did not prohibit the Board from proceeding with all necessary steps preliminary to acquiring a title, and that they were therefore entitled to serve a notice to treat and summon a jury.

BOWEN, L.J.—The word "take" could not be confined to the mere taking possession of.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of Chitty, J., granting an injunction to restrain them from taking certain houses of the plaintiff before performing certain conditions contained in a Special Act.

The Metropolitan Street Improvements Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. ccxxxv.), after reciting that it was expedient that the Board of Works should be authorised to make new streets and street improvements and other works mentioned, enacted as follows:—

By section 2, the Lands Clauses Acts, 1845, 1860 and 1869, except section 133 of the first Act and such of the provisions of those Acts as were varied by or excepted from or inconsistent with the Special Act, were to be incorporated with and form part of the Special Act.

Section 4 empowered the board, subject to the provisions of the Act, upon the land to be acquired by them under the powers of the Act and shewn upon the deposited plans, to make and execute all the new streets and street improvements mentioned in that section.

Section 5: "Subject to the provisions of this Act the improvements shall be made only in or upon the lands delineated on the deposited plans and described in the deposited books of reference; and the board may enter upon, take, use and hold and acquire easements over such of the said lands as they may deem necessary for the purposes of the improvements and for providing space for the erection of houses and buildings adjoining and near thereto; but nothing in this Act contained shall authorise or empower the board to enter upon, take, use or acquire easements over any lands shewn upon the deposited plans lying between" certain limits.

Section 6: Nothing in the Act was to authorise the board to "enter upon, take or use" any part of the portico or steps of the church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, although they were numbered in the deposited plans.

Section 20 empowered the board to sell the materials of the houses and buildings which might be purchased or taken by them under the powers of the Act.

Section 21 empowered the board, upon giving certain notices, "to enter into and upon the lands authorised to be taken and used as aforesaid or any of them" for surveying and valuation purposes.

Section 24 provided that if the board should become "possessed by virtue of this Act" of any premises charged with land tax, they should be liable to make good any deficiency arising within the parish by reason of any lands "having been taken or used for the purposes of the Act."

Section 31 fixed seven years as the limit for the exercise by the board of their powers "for the compulsory purchase or taking" of the lands authorised to be taken.

Section 32: "The board shall, not less than eight weeks before they take in any parish fifteen houses or more occupied either wholly or partially by persons belonging to the labouring classes as tenants or lodgers, make known their intention to take the same by placards, handbills or other general notice placed in public view upon or within a reasonable distance from such houses, and the board shall not take any such houses until they have obtained the certificate of a Justice that it has been proved to his satisfaction that they have so made known their intention."

Section 33: "And whereas the making of the street improvements referred to in this Act involves the removal of many houses referred to in the immediately preceding enactment, and it is expedient that provision be made for the accommodation of such of the labouring classes as will be displaced by such removal, therefore the board in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, from time to time for the purpose of providing such accommodation as aforesaid, acquire or appropriate so much of the lands coloured blue on a copy of the deposited plans signed by, &c., or such other lands as one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State shall from time to time deem sufficient, and the board may, for the purpose of procuring such accommodation, appropriate any lands for the time being belonging to them, or which they have power to acquire, and not required for any other purpose, and may purchase by agreement such further lands as may be necessary for such purpose. The board shall, as soon as may be after the acquisition or appropriation of any such lands, sell or let the same upon building lease for the purpose of the erection or adaptation or continuance thereupon of suitable dwelling-houses or lodging-houses for persons of the labouring classes."

Then, after some further provisions with regard to the selling and letting of the lands, comes the proviso following:—

"Provided always, that before the board shall, without the consent of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, take for the purposes of this Act fifteen houses or more occupied either wholly or partially by persons belonging to the labouring classes as tenants or lodgers, the board shall prove to the satisfaction of such Secretary of State that sufficient accommodation in suitable dwellings has been provided elsewhere upon the before-mentioned lands coloured blue or upon such other lands as may be approved by such Secretary of State for the same number of persons, having regard to the number set forth in the schedule to this Act and to the details relating thereto proved before the said committee and deposited at the Home Office. Provided further, that one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State may, if he think fit, after or even before the board has acquired any of the said lands so coloured blue, release the board from the obligations imposed upon them by this enactment with respect to such lands or any part thereof, provided the board substitute in lieu thereof other lands equally available for the purposes described in this enactment."

Section 34 prohibited the board from taking, using or interfering with any lands vested in the Queen for public purposes or in the Commissioners of Works; and Section 35, from taking Crown lands under the management of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests.

The Board of Works, acting under this Act, on the 6th of February, 1882, served the plaintiff with the usual notice to treat for 63 houses of his in the parish of St. Giles-in-the-Fields which were specified in the plans. Most of these were at the time of the passing of the Act occupied either wholly or partially by persons of the labouring class as tenants or lodgers.

On the 11th of March the plaintiff delivered his claim for purchase-money and compensation, sending at the same time a declaration that it was without prejudice to the question as to the obligation of the board to fulfil the conditions precedent contained in the 33rd section. It was admitted that none of the steps required in that section had been yet taken.

The board, on the 11th of August, 1882, served the plaintiff with a notice of their intention to summon a jury to assess the compensation.

The plaintiff instituted the present action, claiming an injunction to restrain the board from proceeding to take all or any of the houses until they had complied with the requirements of the section, and from in the meantime taking any further proceedings under the above notices.

Chitty, J., on the 3rd of November, granted the injunction, and the board appealed.

Sir H. James (Attorney-General), Ince, Q.C., and Methold, for the appellants.—The board are not prevented by the proviso in section 33, as Chitty, J., has held them to be, from taking the necessary steps, such as summoning the jury, &c., preliminary to taking possession; the condition is satisfied if before displacing the tenants the board procure other accommodation. The word "take" does not include the preliminary steps—it must be construed in the more confined sense of "taking possession." The meaning of a word used in the special Act must be gathered from the Act itself and not from the incorporated Act; and, so far as can be gathered from the special Act, the meaning suggested by the board is the correct one. [They referred to the sections given above to shew the use of the word "take."]

The object of the section was to protect the occupier, and not the landowner. The reason for giving the eight weeks' notice under section 32 was to enable the occupier to find accommodation elsewhere. The landowner is only entitled to the notice provided in the Lands Clauses Act.

Harding v. Preece (1) shews the canons of construction in the case of an Act of Parliament.

[They also proposed to refer to the use of the word in a similar section in the Artisans' Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 36), upon the authority of The Metropolitan Railway Company v. Sharpe (2); but the Court held that that Act could not be referred to for the purpose of construing another statute.]

Then the word "take" in the Lands Clauses Act has not always the meaning given it by Chitty, J. The clauses relating to the compulsory taking of land are sections 16–68, and section 68 so uses the word "taken" as to shew that "taking possession" is intended. From Burkinshaw v. The Birmingham and Oxford Junction Railway Company (3) and Barker v. The Metropolitan Railway Company (4) it appears that "taken" there meant "taken into the company's possession." Notice to treat does not form a step in the compulsory taking of land—is not itself an exercise of the compulsory powers—see judgment of Willes, J., in Guest v. The Poole and Bournemouth Railway Company (5); and in The Queen v. Stone (6) the Court held that it had nothing to do with taking possession. The plaintiff has really no interest.

Romer, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the plaintiff.—If the word "take" has the narrow meaning suggested by the board they can complete a purchase and yet never be able to enter into possession, and the landowner would have been deprived of his land for no purpose. It is not satisfactorily shewn that any ampler protection is given to the labouring classes by adopting the appellant's construction of the word. The person really able to protect the lodgers is the landowner.

On the special Act we contend that the word is used in the general sense of the word, including the acquisition of title. The board have no power to put in force the provisions of the Act against the plaintiff except for lands which they are authorised to take for the purposes of the Act, and they are not authorised to take his property without fulfilling certain conditions precedent. The case of a railway company not authorised to take lands unless its capital is subscribed for is analogous—section 16 of the Lands Clauses Act. See Theobald on Railways, p. 604.

The Lands Clauses Act being incorporated with and forming part of this Act, the meaning of the word in the Lands Clauses Act will be a guide in finding out the meaning to be attached to it in the special Act; and the word is there clearly not confined to a taking possession or an actual physical taking, but includes the acquisition of title too, —see sections 16, 18, 58, 63, 69, 73.

Section 96, referring to physical possession, uses the words "enter upon or make use of," whereas section 98, which does not refer to such possession, uses "take" alone, so that looking at the Lands Clauses Act as a whole it supports the plaintiff's contention that the word "take" is to be used in its largest signification. The case of Guest v. The Poole and Bournemouth Railway Company (5) is not really to the point, and Burkinshaw v. The Birmingham and Oxford Railway Company (3) turns upon a special section (section 68) which has received a special interpretation. Grey v. Pearson (7) shews that statutes are to be construed in the same way as other documents—that is, according to the ordinary meaning of the words used, unless such a construction would lead to an absurdity.

Ince, Q.C., in reply.

(7) 6 H.L. Cas. 61.

JESSEL, M.R.—I must say that whoever is responsible for the drafting of clauses 32 and 33 in this Act of Parliament has taken a great deal of trouble to raise a very difficult question, when he might with the greatest ease, by using appropriate and well-known terms, have avoided any question whatever. Nothing could have been easier than to have said, "shall not enter upon," if that was what the Legislature intended—or "shall not exercise the power of compulsory purchase," if that was the meaning of it. Instead of this he has used a term raising a question which, having before me the judgment of Mr. Justice Chitty and knowing the opinion of one of the Lords Justices upon the subject, I cannot but admit to be one of very great doubt and difficulty, and although I have arrived at a conclusion on the subject it would be wrong for me to say that any one who arrives at a different conclusion is in error.

The first observation to be made on section 33 is that we ought to find out its meaning, if we can, from the section itself. If we can do that we need not have recourse to the use of the word "take" in the other sections of the Act. If we cannot, then I agree with the principle which was laid down by Mr. Justice Chitty, that as a general rule a word is to be considered as used throughout an Act of Parliament in the same sense, and that therefore we may look through the other sections to see in what sense the word is there used.

The section in question involves three things. There is, first of all, a recital to shew what is intended to be provided for, which in substance may be read thus: "Whereas the making of the street improvements in this Act referred to involves the removal of many houses occupied by the labouring classes, and it is expedient that provisions be made for the accommodation of such of the labouring classes as will be displaced by such removal"—that is, not for the accommodation of the individuals displaced, but of the class—"if houses inhabited by the labouring classes are taken away an equivalent amount of accommodation for the labouring classes is to be provided." That points out the object of the section.

But how is that object to be attained? The section goes on to enact that the board shall from time to time for the purpose of providing such accommodation acquire and appropriate certain lands. No time is fixed, and it no doubt would be implied that it must be done within a reasonable time, and it is to be done from time to time so as to enable the board to supply accommodation equivalent to that of which the labouring classes will be deprived by the removal of the houses in which they dwell. Then, as soon as the board acquire these lands, they are to let them for building purposes so as to get suitable dwelling-houses or lodging-houses for persons of the labouring classes. Then, after some other provisions, which I need not notice, there is a proviso that if they do not sell or let the land for this purpose within three years after acquiring or appropriating it, the Secretary of State may interfere and order the land to be let or sold. Therefore, having acquired the land within a reasonable time, they have three years to let or sell it and get the houses built; and if they do not, then the Secretary of State is to intervene.

Now we come to the proviso in question. [His Lordship read the proviso down to the words "deposited at the Home Office."] Then it is provided that one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State may, if he think fit, dispense with the restriction. The words of this proviso simply prohibit the board from "taking." The plaintiff's contention is that it prohibits them from exercising any of their compulsory powers and from taking any proceedings to acquire the houses until the condition has been complied with. That is not the natural meaning of the words of the proviso, and if we are to construe them in that way we must find something in the other parts of the Act to authorise that construction. Now if we look at the 31st section of the Act we see that the draftsman knew perfectly well the difference between exercising powers and taking, for that section provides that the powers of the board for the compulsory purchase or taking of lands authorised to be taken by the Act shall not be exercised after seven years from its passing. Those are not the words with which we have to deal. The proviso in section 33 simply says "before the board shall take." Now what does "take" mean? I agree that it may be used in two senses; it may mean actual taking—that is, "taking possession of"—or it may mean "acquiring a title." In the Lands Clauses Act, which is incorporated in this Act, it is generally used in the latter sense of acquiring title—that is, a complete title; though it is occasionally there used in the former sense. There is nothing in the word "take" which makes an enactment that the board shall not "take" extend to prohibit it from proceeding with all the necessary steps for thereafter acquiring a title. Every possible meaning of the word is satisfied by holding the proviso to mean that the board shall not acquire a complete title. I do not think it necessary for the present purpose to decide whether it means that they shall not get conveyances, or that they shall not get possession, for, whichever of those meanings is given to the word "take," I can find no prohibition as regards any proceeding prior to the completion of the title—that is, to the conveyance. I may remark, though the observation is not of any great importance, that the 34th and 35th sections shew that the draftsman knew how to express himself sometimes very clearly. The 34th section says "that nothing contained in the Act shall authorise the board to take, use or in any manner interfere with" any of the lands therein mentioned, and the 35th section is expressed in the same way.

We have not, then, any express words in the Act itself to prohibit what the board are now doing. What do we find in the Lands Clauses Act, which is incorporated with it? An authority to serve a notice to treat is given by section 18 of the Lands Clauses Act, which provides that "when the promoters of the undertaking shall require to purchase or take any of the lands which by this or the special Act or any Act incorporated therewith they are authorised to purchase or take," they are to give certain notices. The question then comes to this—Are they authorised by the special Act to purchase or take the houses in question? If they are, then the 18th section enables them to give the notices and to proceed under them. It appears to me that on the terms of the special Act there is no doubt that they are authorised to take these houses. [His Lordship read the 5th section.]

Then the 6th section says that nothing in the Act shall authorise the board to enter upon, take or use any part of the portico or steps of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, though they were numbered on the deposited plans, so that the authority is taken away as regards certain property. The houses in question are delineated on the plans and described in the books of reference, and are not within the exceptions mentioned in sections 5 and 6; and it appears to me to be plain that, unless we find something to take away the authority given by the 5th section, the board are authorised to take these houses. If this authority is taken away at all it must be taken away by the proviso in section 33. I have already said that they are not in express terms prohibited from proceeding with a view to taking the houses; if, therefore, they are so prohibited at all it must be by implication. But why should such an implication be made? A proviso that you shall not take does not prevent your proceeding with all the steps preliminary to taking. It seems to me that it is a fallacy to say that the board are not authorised to take the houses because a condition precedent to completing their title has not been complied with, where the condition depends on an act which the board themselves can do. As regards any lands which the board are entitled to purchase, they cannot under the Act of Parliament enter upon them or use them without paying or depositing the purchase-money, or making a deposit and giving a bond under the 84th section of the Lands Clauses Act. The enactment that they cannot be entered upon or used without performance of the preliminary condition does not prevent the board from being authorised to take them within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Act. The board cannot obtain a conveyance, nor, except in the case provided for by section 84, enter upon or use them without payment or deposit of the purchase-money. It does not appear to me that the existence of a condition precedent to obtaining a conveyance of, or entering upon and using, prevents the lands from being correctly described as lands which the board are entitled to take under the special Act, where the condition is one which the board can always comply with. The case is very different where the promoter cannot himself remove the difficulty. Here the appropriation of land to provide accommodation for the labouring classes is within the power of the board, and the same consideration applies to such a condition as applies to a condition precedent of paying or depositing the purchase-money.

It seems to me that this condition precedent does not prevent these houses from being considered as houses which the board are authorised to take.

There is one more consideration, which I think makes the case stronger. In the case of an ordinary company the power of taking lands depends on the payment of the purchase-money, but there is nothing to oblige the company to give a notice to treat. Here it is compulsory on the board to acquire these lands and get the houses built—they have no option. This seems to me to shew that the Legislature could not have considered that they were not to go on with all their steps at the same time. There is, I have no doubt, a mode of compelling them to perform the obligation laid upon them; but, independently of that consideration, it must be recollected with what sort of a body we are dealing. It is a body which is directed to do certain works. Can it be supposed that the Legislature contemplated that that body would disobey its express enactment and refuse to do those works, even supposing that there was a doubt as to there being any legal power of compelling them to do so—a doubt which I for my part do not entertain. That being so, it appears to me to be a very strong thing to say that the board are not authorised to take the lands, because before they take them they must do something else which the Act orders them to do.

There are some other considerations which have had some weight with me, although they are not so decisive as those which I have mentioned. The first is a question of time. If the construction contended for by the respondent is adopted, not only must the blue and other land be acquired, but the houses for the accommodation of the labouring classes must be built before the board can take any steps towards the purchase of the plaintiff's houses. Now it is obvious that it will take a long time to acquire the land, then to let it, and then to get the houses built. I should say that three years would be a very moderate time. Three years is the limit for the letting of the lands, and the whole time given for compulsory purchase is seven years. It does not appear to me to be probable that the Legislature in giving the seven years intended to cut off so large a proportion as this by means of the condition precedent. This consideration has some weight with me.

It was urged that the respondent's construction enables the landlord to give protection to the labouring classes. But if the landlord keeps his houses until accommodation is provided he can protect them most effectually by letting lodgings to them. It does not appear to me, therefore, that the labouring classes are better protected by adopting the construction contended for by the respondent. But I cannot imagine that this proviso was put in for the purpose of enabling the house-owner to protect the labouring classes. It seems to me that it was put in to protect those classes, and not to enable the house-owners to protect them. This, however, is a minor point, and I do not think we ought to give weight to such considerations in construing the Act, more especially as a dispensing power is given to Her Majesty's Secretary of State, so that any extreme or unusual hardship or any inconvenience can be obviated. I mention, them, however, because they have had some influence with me in considering the argument as to convenience, but of course that argument ought not to prevail unless as a last resource.

For these reasons it appears to me that the injunction granted by the Court below must be dissolved.

COTTON, L.J.—I have the misfortune in this case to differ from one if not both of the other members of the Court of Appeal. But I have formed a decided opinion on the question, and therefore I do not hesitate to express it.

The question is, whether the defendants are authorised by their special Act and by the Lands Clauses Act to take the proceedings which they are now adopting for the compulsory acquisition of houses and lands belonging to the plaintiff. Under section 18 of the Lands Clauses Act the land as to which they can give notice to treat is described as land which they are authorised to purchase or take. We must then look to the special Act, because it is the special Act which authorises them to purchase or take. Section 5 of the special Act is the first section which refers to the taking of lands, and undoubtedly if we look to that section alone the defendants can say that these are lands which they are authorised to purchase or take. But we must not look to that section alone. When we have to enquire whether under the circumstances authority is given to a public body to take a man's land against his will, we must look to the whole of the Act of Parliament under which they are purporting to act. The section which raises a difficulty in their way, and, in my opinion, an insuperable difficulty, is the 33rd section of the special Act, the proviso in which has been so often referred to. [His Lordship read the proviso.] The object of this proviso is to provide an equivalent amount of accommodation, not for the occupiers of the houses which are taken, but for labourers of the same class, in order that there may not be a deficiency in the metropolis of accommodation for that class. I quite agree that if one construction would be effectual for obtaining that object, while the other would not, the words ought to be construed as far as possible in the way which would carry into effect the purposes of the section. But I can see nothing whatever in the view taken by the Judge of the Court below which is inconsistent with the purpose and objects of the section. That object, as it appears to me, may be attained as effectually (and possibly more effectually) by the construction which has been put upon the section by Mr. Justice Chitty as by that which is contended for by the appellants. It is very true that if before they take possession other houses are built with equivalent accommodation that will effect the object. But is the object less effected by saying that before they can put in force their compulsory powers to take the land and acquire it they shall acquire the same accommodation?

Probably it is more effectually provided by the later interpretation. But I do not go upon the effect or consequences; I only say that there is nothing in the view taken by Mr. Justice Chitty which is inconsistent with the object of the section which we have to construe.

Before I go into the construction of the section I will deal with one objection which was urged by the Attorney-General, that the plaintiff here has no interest in the matter provided for by the section. I do not consider it necessary to say that the landowner was intended to protect the labouring classes, or that the proviso was intended to protect the landowner; but, in my opinion, every one has this interest—that he is entitled to come to this Court, if he is unwilling to part with his land, and to say, I will not be compelled to part with my property unless the body which is trying to take my land has at this very time Parliamentary authority to take my land from me; and if it is the fact that on the true construction of the proviso it takes the land out of the category of lands authorised to be taken, the plaintiff can say that his land shall not be taken from him against his will, unless the provisions of the section are complied with.

Can it be said that taking the landlord's title is not taking for the purposes of the Act? Taking possession no doubt it is not, but it is taking. If there is nothing in the rest of the Act inconsistent with this view, I think that "taking" is not confined to taking possession, but extends to any taking, including the taking the landlord's title.

Then, if that be so, is the land within the compulsory clauses of the Act as "lands authorised to be taken?" It is conceded that this land cannot at the present moment be used without the consent of the Secretary of State for the purpose of constructing these improvements until houses have been built providing equivalent accommodation for the labouring classes. How then can we say that it is at the present moment land authorised to be taken by the 5th section, when we find in that section the words together, "enter upon, take, use and hold"? Can it be said that the board are authorised to take the land when at this moment they cannot use it? It has been decided that when the power to use lands has expired the power of taking compulsorily cannot be exercised. In my opinion, the same rule ought to be applied when the power to use has not arisen. It is said that it is like the case of purchase-money, and that no railway or other body can enter upon lands which their special Act authorises them to take until they have paid the purchase-money; and that if this injunction is to be supported, then in all cases before the purchase-money is paid a railway company or other public body could be prevented from using their compulsory powers for the purpose of ascertaining the value. In my opinion, that is not a parallel case. The very object of those proceedings, although they are compulsory, is to ascertain the amount of the purchase-money, and to enable that not only to be ascertained, but to be paid. Whether the lands are authorised to be taken or used must, in my opinion, depend upon whether there is or is not at the time of the attempt on the part of the body to exercise this power any condition precedent against their taking the land which has not been performed independently of doing that which must always be done before the purchase is completed—namely, the payment of the purchase-money and those compulsory steps which must be necessarily gone through before the purchase-money can be ascertained. To say that the non-payment of the purchase-money would prevent the company from taking any proceedings towards acquiring the land authorised to be taken, used and held for the purposes of the Act would of course bring the operations of the company to a deadlock, and we could not possibly adopt that construction.

It was hinted that probably the board could not completely take away the title of the landowner till the condition has been complied with. If that is so (and I should say that it would not be right to allow them to do so unless they were in a position to use the land or enter into possession), is it right that they should go on and ascertain the purchase-money before the condition has been complied with? Consider the consequences of holding them entitled to do so. Are we to say that the purchase is to remain in suspense, and that the board are not in a position to get a conveyance? The landowner would have the right of obtaining by action payment to him of the purchase-money which has been assessed by a jury, or has been found by arbitration. The board are a public body, spending not their own money, but the money of the ratepayers. Would it be right to put such a construction on the Act, that, although the title could not be acquired from the landowner, they yet should be obliged to pay the purchase-money?

Assuming, then, that this is within the proviso in section 33 a taking of land within the meaning of that section, what ought we to do? In my opinion, we ought to prevent the board from going on to exercise their compulsory powers when they are not in a position at the present moment to say, "If we pay the purchase-money, these are lands which we can use." They cannot use these lands at the present moment, for they have to perform a condition precedent. They can only interfere with the rights of the landowner for the purposes of the Act; and, in my opinion, although there is an obligation on them at some future time to perform this condition precedent, still as they have not yet performed it we ought at the instance of the landowner (who does not wish to be compelled to go before a jury and state the price which he requires for his land at the risk of having to pay the costs if he set too high a value on it) to restrain the board from going on to exercise their compulsory powers.

I will say one word as to the inconvenience which it is suggested will arise from the construction adopted by Mr. Justice Chitty. Power is given in the 33rd section to the Secretary of State to exempt the board from this condition precedent. Of course it never could be suggested that any Secretary of State would, the moment after the passing of the Act, or without good grounds, exercise that power, and, as was said, put an end to the Act of Parliament. But if the board had acted reasonably in the execution of the powers given to them by the Act, and could shew that they were not able to make the improvements within the limited time by reason of the check imposed by this condition on the exercise of their compulsory powers, I think that Parliament, if appealed to, would probably give them extended time. But no one, in my opinion, would say that the Secretary of State was acting wrongly if under those circumstances he exercised the power given to him by the Act of Parliament of exempting the board from this condition precedent, when if full effect were given to it they would be prevented from executing the improvements. I do not therefore feel pressed by the suggested inconvenience of construing this Act of Parliament in the way I do.

In my opinion, therefore, Mr. Justice Chitty was right, and this injunction ought to be maintained.

BOWEN, L.J.—The question arises under the Metropolitan Street Improvement Act, 1877, by which the Metropolitan Board of Works are entrusted with the power and the duty of making certain street improvements. Towards the end of the Act come two sections, which are introduced for the protection, first, of certain individuals of the working classes, and, secondly, of the working classes generally. The plaintiff had a notice served upon him to treat for more than fifteen of his houses on the 6th of February, 1882, and on the 11th of August, 1882, notice of the intention of the board to summon a jury was also served upon him. The complaint of the plaintiff is that the board in serving notice of their intention of summoning a jury have done what they are not authorised to do under the latter clause introduced for the benefit of the working classes generally. The provision which the plaintiff relies upon is as follows: [His Lordship read the proviso to section 33.]

It is admitted that the board are about to take fifteen houses or more occupied at the time of the passing of the Act either wholly or partially by the labouring classes, and that the consent of the Secretary of State has not been obtained for the taking them, and that as yet the board have not proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State that sufficient accommodation in suitable dwellings has been provided elsewhere.

The plaintiff insists that the board in giving notice of their intention to summon a jury have done something which they are not authorised to do, and which the Court will enjoin them from proceeding with. Now in order to make good that position, the plaintiff, it seems to me, must shew one of two things—either that service of the notice of the intention of the board to summon a jury is a taking of houses within the meaning of this prohibition or proviso in the special Act, and that the board, therefore, are actually taking something which they are forbidden to take; or he must shew that the board are acting outside the powers of the Lands Clauses Act and of their special Act, and that in serving notice of their intention to summons a jury they are doing that which is ultra vires and unauthorised. The Attorney-General argued that the word "take" in section 33 meant simply to take possession of. I do not at present accede to that view of the section, but to say that seems to me by no means to get rid of the difficulties of the case. I think it the sounder view that the word "take" in sections 32 and 33 has an extended meaning, and that it means either take from the landlord that which the landlord has got—namely, his title—or take from the person who is in possession what he has—namely, possession. I will assume for the purpose of this case that "take" has that extended meaning, and not merely the narrow meaning sought to be put on it by the Attorney-General. The words in this Act no doubt have light reflected upon them by the Lands Clauses Act. That Act is incorporated, and although it does not follow from that incorporation that every word in this Act is to be read in the same sense in which it is used in the Lands Clauses Act, nevertheless I think that some light (I agree that it is a distant light) may be thrown by the provision of the Lands Clauses Act upon the provisions of this special Act in which it is incorporated.

Now I think it will be found that in the Lands Clauses Act the word "take" is used in more than one sense. In the 1st section the word seems to be used in a general sense. That section says that the Act shall apply to every undertaking authorised by an Act which shall hereafter be passed, and which shall authorise the purchase or taking of lands for such undertaking. In the preambles to sections 6 and 16 a distinction is drawn between "purchase of lands by agreement" and "the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement." In section 68 the word "taking" occurs, and it is clear, from Burkinshaw v. The Birmingham and Oxford Junction Railway Company (3), that in that section "take" means actually take, as distinct from serving a notice to treat or any other kind of constructive taking. Looking at the Lands Clauses Act as a whole, and looking at common parlance and at the language of most Acts which give compulsory powers to public bodies, I think we may say that the word "take" ought not to be confined to taking of actual possession. When we turn to the Metropolitan Street Improvements Act, 1877, and compare the preamble in which the use of the word "take" is general, with section 5, and especially with section 31, where the word "take" is obviously used in a larger sense, I think the safer construction is that "take" means either take from the landlord what the landlord has got, or take from the tenant and occupier what the tenant and occupier has got, namely, possession. When, however, we come to sections 32 and 33, I think that the difficulty of the case is not surmounted by adopting this larger construction.

The first question is, whether what the board have done or are now doing is a taking within the meaning of section 33 of the special Act. Is the notice to treat a taking at all, whatever sense be placed on the word "taking"? Serving a notice to treat certainly is one of the necessary steps towards a compulsory taking, but I cannot see that it is an actual taking. Then, is the service of notice of the intention to summon a jury a taking? That, again, seems to me to be a step under the compulsory powers of the Act; but it does not amount to depriving the landlord of his title. The landlord will be deprived of his title, if at all, at a later stage of the proceedings. Nor is it an acquiring of actual possession. In no sense, therefore, of the word is this a taking.

Then we come to the second point, which is one of great difficulty. Assuming that the board are not actually taking, still it is said they are moving in the direction of a taking, and are putting in force a compulsory power which they are not entitled to exercise because they are not yet in a position to take. Whether that argument is to prevail or not seems to me to depend entirely on the answer to be given to one short question, whether these are houses which the board are authorised to take. If so, they may proceed as far as they think fit in the direction of taking, subject only to this, that before actually taking they must comply with the condition. The board are acting under section 18 and the following sections of the Lands Clauses Act. Section 18 provides that, "When the promoters of the undertaking shall require to purchase or take any of the lands which by this or the special Act or any Act incorporated therewith they are authorised to purchase or take," they are to serve a notice to treat. After this they are to take other steps, among which is a notice to summon a jury. The short question then is, Are these houses at this moment lands authorised to be taken? It is said that they are not lands authorised to be taken, because before they are ultimately taken something further has to be done. But it seems to me that although before a title to them can be finally acquired, or possession or entry can be actually effected upon them, something further has to be done, nevertheless they are at this moment lands authorised to be taken by the special Act. The 5th section of that Act is expressed in the most general terms, and empowers the board to "enter upon, take, use and hold and acquire easements over such of the said lands" (that is, lands delineated on the deposited plans and described in the books of reference) "as they may deem necessary for the purpose of the improvements, and for providing space for the erection of houses and buildings adjoining and near thereto." The lands to which this action relates are lands delineated on the deposited plans and described in the books of reference. Why, then, are they not lands authorised to be taken? If in the remainder of the Act we could find that there was some exception or fetter imposed which the board could not themselves remove, then I should agree that very probably these lands would not be lands authorised to be taken. The Act itself presents salient instances of exception of particular property from the general power. The portico and steps of St. Martin's Church are on the deposited plans, and I suppose within the description in the books of reference, yet section 6 enacts that nothing in the Act shall authorise the board to enter upon, take or use any part of them. Therefore the portico and steps of St. Martin's Church are not land authorised to be taken, because, although they would be otherwise within the general terms of section 5, there is a special exception of them in section 6. Again, in section 5 itself there is an express exception of certain lands shewn on the deposited plans. Then sections 34 and 35 prohibit the taking of certain Crown lands, which no doubt are described upon the deposited plans and in the books of reference, without the consent of the commissioners mentioned in those sections. Therefore there are instances of lands which the board are not authorised to take, although the general section, but for the subsequent provisions, would appear to entitle them to do so.

But when we come to section 33 we find that the proviso to that section does not except these particular lands from the authority to take, but only says that before they are taken something else is to be done which the board can do, and which the board can be compelled to do, because I do not doubt that a mandamus could be obtained against the board if they failed to fulfil this obligation. It is not, therefore, the case of the board not being able to take these lands, because they are not only authorised to take them, but they are authorised to do everything that is necessary to acquire a good title to them. And if these are lands authorised to be taken, all the compulsory machinery of the Lands Clauses Act is applicable—subject to the proviso introduced by the 33rd section of the special Act—namely, that before actual taking is effected something further will have to be done.

The illustration has been urged upon us, in argument of the case, where the capital of a company has not been subscribed. It is said that as the Court would interfere to prevent a company in that case from putting in force its compulsory powers, so here it ought to prevent these lands being taken, because something has not yet been done before they are taken. The answer is obvious—section 16 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, which prevents a company from proceeding until the capital is subscribed, is a section which says in so many words that no steps shall be taken until the capital is subscribed. There are no such words here, for the proviso in section 33, as I read it, simply says that the taking shall not be complete or effective until a certain condition has been complied with.

Now is there anything in this construction to lessen the protection which the Legislature must be supposed to have intended to give to the labouring classes? for I agree that if there were, that would be a very good reason for pausing before adopting this construction. But I can see nothing of that kind. If, indeed, we were to adopt the learned Attorney-General's narrower construction, and to say that the board might do everything down to actually taking possession of the lands in question, I think that the protection which the Legislature may be supposed to have intended to give to the individuals of the labouring classes who are sought to be protected by section 32, and the class itself which is protected by section 33, would be materially lessened, for they would lose at all events the barrier of the landlord's title. But, adopting the construction which I put on the proviso, and giving the wider meaning to the word "take," it seems to me that the labouring classes have as full protection under these two sections as it can be contended that they ought to have. They have the landlord's title so long as the landlord chooses to enforce it. If the landlord ceases to wish to enforce it they have a right at all events to protect their own possession, and get it protected if necessary by the Secretary of State or the Attorney-General.

It has been said that the board, if this construction be adopted, might go on to the very last and then be placed in embarrassment, because they would have served their notices and had the cases tried and the amount of compensation decided by a jury, and then find themselves unable to complete. It seems to me that it would be the fair construction of this Act to hold that the board have the time down to the very perfecting of their title given them for obtaining the consent of the Secretary of State. I cannot think that a public body like the Metropolitan Board of Works ought to be assumed to be likely to place themselves in pecuniary embarrassment so as to be unable to complete their works.

For these reasons I think that the injunction ought to be dissolved.

[IN THE COURT OF APPEAL.]

SELBORNE, L.C.
JESSEL, M.R.
COTTON, L.J.
1882.
Nov. 6, 7.

LOOSEMORE v. THE TIVERTON AND NORTH DEVON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway Company—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, ss. 21, 23, 38, 39, 68 and 85—Notice to Treat—Expiration of Powers—Entry under section 85—Rights of Landowner.

Where a railway company give the usual notice to treat to an unwilling landowner, and he takes no steps whatever to ascertain the purchase-money to be paid, the company can follow up their notice and obtain a complete title to the land under sections 21, 23, 38 and 39 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, provided they do so before the expiration of their powers to complete the line.

For a company to enter, under the 85*th*

section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, on the eve of the expiration of all their general powers applicable to the land on which they so enter, not for the purpose of making any statutory works, but for that of acquiring a possessory title to the land against the landowner, and then making a railway over it, not under the Act, but as under an ordinary landowner's title, is an abuse of the Act which can confer no right upon the company after the expiration of their powers which they would not otherwise have possessed; and this rule applies whether the entry of the company is, in the first instance, wrongful or not.

Decision of FRY, J., reversed.

This was an appeal from so much of the decision of Fry, J. (reported 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 570), as held — First, that where a railway company have given notice to take lands within the period limited for the exercise of their compulsory powers, their right to the land is not defeated by the expiration (before the completion of the purchase) of the period limited by their special Act for the completion of their works; secondly, that where a railway company have given notice to take lands, and the time for the completion of their works has nearly expired without the landowner having taken any steps to ascertain the purchase-money to be paid, the company are justified in entering, under the 85th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845; thirdly, that a railway company may enter peaceably under the 85th section, although the landowner has refused to give up possession.

For the appellant—plaintiff in person.—The notice to treat did not constitute a contract, and before there is an enforceable contract the purchase-money must be ascertained—Haynes v. Haynes (1), Wing v. The Tottenham and Hampstead Junction Railway Company (2) and Adams v. The London and Blackwall Railway Company (3). Although the company could have gone on under their notice and made themselves owners of the land after the expiration of their compulsory powers, yet, as they did not do so before the expiration of the time limited for the completion of their works, they acquired no estate in the land. They must complete their title within the time limited for the completion of their works. They could not by entry a few days before that time, when it was impossible to ascertain the price or complete the railway within the time, acquire the right to complete their title afterwards—Baker v. The Metropolitan Railway Company (4), Richmond v. The North London Railway Company (5), Lamb v. The North London Railway Company (6), Rangeley v. The Midland Railway Company (7) and Kemp v. The South Eastern Railway Company (8). Further, it is an illegal act for the company to go on making a railway on the land after the time limited for the completion of their works, which will be restrained at the instance of the Attorney-General or of the shareholders, or of a private individual if he can shew special damage is being done to him—The Attorney-General v. The Shrewsbury Bridge Company (9), Cohen v. Wilkinson (10), Astley v. The Manchester, &c., Railway Company (11) and Betts v. The Great Eastern Railway Company (12).

Lastly, a company cannot enter under section 85 except in a case of urgency—Field v. The Carnarvon and Llanberis Railway Company (13). It is a fraudulent user of the section to take possession of land under it for purposes which have become incapable of being carried into effect—The Shrewsbury and Birmingham Railway Company v. The London and North Western Railway Company (14). The section was only intended to enable a company to proceed with necessary works before they had obtained a complete title in the usual way.

Davey, Q.C., and Farwell, for the company.—There was no abandonment of our notice to treat. Our entry and possession under the 85th section were legal, and we do not want the powers of the Act to make the railway on the land. The cases shew that the initiative lies with the landowner under section 68 of the Act to ascertain the compensation to be paid. Until he proceeds the company are powerless—Adams v. The London and Blackwall Railway Company (3) and Doe v. The North Staffordshire Railway Company (15).

[LORD SELBORNE, L.C.—No. You could have proceeded, under sections 21, 23, 38 and 39 of the Lands Clauses Act, to summon a jury to assess the value.]

The summoning of a jury would be the discharge of a duty or obligation, not the exercise of a power—The Queen v. The Birmingham and Oxford Junction Railway Company (16). We contend that the plaintiff comes under the 68th and 85th sections of the Act, or not at all.

[LORD SELBORNE, L.C.—No. He comes under the normal clauses of the Act, which are those I have referred to. The 68th and 85th sections provide for a casus omissus, and are not normal clauses.]

If the summoning a jury is the exercise of a power it is the exercise of a power of compulsory purchase; but that cannot be, because it has been held that a jury can be summoned after the compulsory powers have expired. If nothing can be done after the expiration of the time limited for the completion of the works, then the powers must expire so soon as it appears that the railway cannot be made within the prescribed period; so that after the five years have expired the company cannot do anything on its land. But we contend that, when possession is taken under the 85th section, the company are entitled to hold, subject only to making compensation under section 68.

They also referred to Richmond v. The North London Railway Company (5), The Ystalyfera Iron Company v. The Neath and Brecon Railway Company (17), Kemp v. The South Eastern Railway Company (8), The Marquis of Salisbury v. The Great Northern Railway Company (18) and Hooper v. Bourne (19).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD SELBORNE).—The facts which need be stated for the purpose of determining this appeal are few. The compulsory powers of the company expired on the 19th of July, 1878, and a week before that time the company gave the appellant notice to take the land which is now in question, and the possession and use of which by them was necessary for the completion of their railway. According to authorities cited at the bar, and not disputed by the appellant, they might, notwithstanding the expiry of their compulsory powers, have taken steps at any time during the interval between the 12th of July, 1878, and the 19th of July, 1880, to follow up their notice and obtain a complete title to the land; but they never took any such step. There was no impediment to their so doing, under sections 21, 23, 38 and 39 of the Lands Clauses Act, for although the appellant, on the 2nd of August, 1878, had given them a counter-notice requiring them to take more land if they took any, that counter-notice was never assented to or acted upon by the company, and Mr. Justice Fry has held (as far as I can judge rightly) that they were entitled to disregard it, as going, at all events, beyond the appellant's rights. The company's powers "for making or completing the railways or otherwise in relation thereto" came to an end, or (in the terms of section 40 of their special Act) were to "cease to be exercised" on the 19th of July, 1880, except as to so much of the line as was then completed. Just thirteen days before that time, on the 6th of July, 1880, they entered on this land, under the 85th section of the Lands Clauses Act, having taken the first step necessary to enable them to do so nearly seven months before, and having, for some reason which does not appear, allowed about three months to elapse between the surveyor's valuation and the payment of its amount into Court, and about two months more between that payment into Court and the delivery of the necessary bond. The appellant never consented to the taking of his land under the company's notice, he did nothing on the footing of the validity of that notice—indeed there was nothing which he could have done (unless he had desired an arbitration) before the 6th of July, 1880, when the company entered. The railway, of course, was not made upon this land when the company's powers (except as to the completed part of the line) expired on the 19th of July, 1880, and when they entered under the 85th section it must have been manifest that this could not possibly be done, and this was land without the use of which for the purpose of the line the railways were not, and could not be, completed. The question, in my view, is, whether under these circumstances the company's notice could be enforced by them adversely to the appellant, and followed up by the steps necessary to transfer the title to his land to the company under the Act of Parliament without his consent, when the present action was commenced on the 24th of July, 1880. Mr. Justice Fry decided this question in the company's favour; but with that decision I am unable to agree. If the question had been untouched by authority, I should have thought it reasonably plain that the use of land of which possession had been taken under the 85th section of the Act, and also every step necessary to be taken by the company against an unwilling landowner who had entered into no agreement with them to transfer his title to themselves by virtue and in consequence of notice given by them under the Act to take that land, would be an exercise of powers which, whether technically distinguishable from the compulsory powers or not, were granted to the company by their special Act "for making or completing the railways or otherwise in relation thereto," and the special Act has said that all these powers "shall cease to be exercised," which must at all events mean that they shall no longer be exercised by the company at its own will and for its own benefit after the 19th of July, 1880.

The authorities seem to me to confirm this conclusion. Lord Hatherley, in Kemp v. The South-Eastern Railway Company (8), said: "A notice to treat given by a company is perfectly good as long as the company are empowered to carry into effect their works under the Act of Parliament, and no longer. It may be given the day before the compulsory powers to take the land expire, and then it will last until the time for which that land is wanted—namely, the time for making the works has also expired—but not longer." He considered that the same limit of time ought to be implied in an agreement, indefinite in its terms, as to the price at which the company might take from a landowner such lands as might be required for the purpose of their works; as Lord Cairns had also previously decided in Rangeley v. The Midland Railway Company (7). In Richmond v. The North London Railway Company (5), Lord Romilly, having to determine the question for what length of time a notice duly given under the Lands Clauses Act would continue in force, said: "The only principle that I can discover which can have any fixity about it is to limit the time within which, after giving the notice to treat, the railway company must come to an agreement with the landowner, or must ascertain the price to be paid to him, to the period fixed by the Legislature for the completion of the line." That case was carried to the Court of Appeal, where Lord Cairns (though thinking it unnecessary to decide, and not deciding the point) said: "It might be a very beneficial rule to lay down, and I do not say that I differ from the Master of the Rolls as to what should be the rule—that where a railway company is limited in time for taking land by compulsion, and is also limited in time for completing their works, then, if they sleep upon their works, when the time for completion of them has come they should be held disabled from going on with any compulsory purchase."

To distinguish the present case from these authorities it was insisted that the entry by the company upon the land before the expiration of the time limited for the completion of the works was sufficient to give it a title to possession under the Act, and to exclude any inference that the notice was abandoned. None of the authorities, however, have treated the question as depending upon any mere intention on the part of the company to keep or not to keep the notice alive; and in my opinion it is immaterial whether the company did or did not mean to abandon their notice. The power of entry given to the company by section 85 of the Lands Clauses Act under the conditions there mentioned is given as ancillary to and for the purposes of the other statutory powers. It confers no right to possession except for the purpose of making the statutory works under the Act; it does not divest the landowner's title, or, in this case, relieve the company from the necessity of proceeding under the powers given to them "for making and completing the railways, or otherwise in relation thereto," in order to transfer that title to themselves in the same manner as if they had not entered. It is true that after such entry the landowner, if he wishes to compel the company to take the steps necessary for that purpose, may proceed under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act; but in the present case the appellant preferred to stand upon his own title to the land, which in my opinion he had a right to do. For a company to enter, under the 85th section, on the eve of the expiration of all their general powers applicable to the land on which it so enters, not for the purpose of making any statutory works, but for that of acquiring a possessory title to the land against the landowner, and then making a railway over it, not under the Act, but as under an ordinary landowner's title, is, in my opinion, an abuse of the Act which can confer no right upon the company after the expiration of their powers which they would not otherwise have possessed. I think, therefore, that the order under appeal ought to be reversed, and the relief asked by his statement of claim given to the appellant, with the costs of the action and of this appeal. If, however, he chooses to take an enquiry as to damages, I should be disposed to reserve the costs of that enquiry till it is seen whether he has suffered any substantial damage, unless the Lords Justices should in that respect be of a different opinion.

JESSEL, M.R.—The appeal in this case is brought from a decison of Mr. Justice Fry, in effect deciding that the plaintiff, who was owner both at law and in equity of land of which he was in quiet possession, has lost his ordinary rights of ownership. If that is so, it can only be by virtue of the powers conferred by statute on the respondents the railway company. If the railway company have not become owners, it appears to me that, according to English law, their right to retain possession of the land must be by virtue of some power conferred upon them. The first question, then, to be decided is whether, under the circumstances stated by the Lord Chancellor in his judgment, and which I will not repeat, the railway company have become owners or entitled to the rights of an owner. If the company have not become so entitled, but claim the right to retain possession of the land by virtue only of a power conferred by the Legislature, then it appears to me that they have no such right, the power having ceased because the railway has not been completed within the period of five years prescribed by the Special Act of Parliament. The 5th section of the Act, which contains nothing very special or peculiar, is this: "Subject to the provision of this Act the company may make and maintain, &c., the railways hereinafter described, and may enter upon, take and use such of the land delineated upon the said plans and described in the deposited books of reference as may be required for that purpose." Their right to take lands is only a right to take lands "required for that purpose"—that is, for the purpose of making and maintaining the railway. The 40th section points out that if the railways are not completed within five years from the passing of the Act, then on the expiration of that period "the powers by this Act granted to the company for making and completing the railways or otherwise in relation thereto, shall cease to be exercised, except as to so much thereof as is then completed." As I read the section, the word "thereto," as well as the word "thereof," refers to the railways; and the enactment means this, that after that period the company may exercise all their powers as regards the completed part of the railways, but may not exercise them as regards the non-completed parts. Has, then, anything taken place which deprives the plaintiff of his ownership? First of all, we have nothing whatever except a notice to treat and an entry under the 85th section. As regards the notice to treat, it was admitted in argument, and in fact it could not be disputed, that the mere giving the notice to treat did not change the ownership; no doubt it affected the position of the landowner most seriously. It enabled the company to obtain the ownership of his land on taking the proper steps, and if the company took possession of the land, then, no doubt, the landowner also could compel them to pay for it according to the value to be ascertained by a jury. But it did not make the company owners of the land. Now if that peculiar relation, which no doubt is formed or created by the giving of the notice, does not operate as a change of ownership—which unquestionably it does not—how could the entry under the 85th section effect such change? That section belongs to a totally different class of sections, and is not intended to affect anything more than the occupation of the land. It is one of that group of sections coming under the heading, "And with respect to the entry upon lands by the promoters of the undertaking," and it enacts that if the promoters of the undertaking shall be desirous of entering upon and using lands before an agreement is made, or an award, or a verdict is taken —that is, if they want them earlier than the period fixed for ascertaining the price —then they may enter and use on certain terms. But for what purposes? They can only use for the purposes of the Act—that is, for making the railway. This entry and user does not deprive the landowner of his ownership of the land, though they for a time deprive him of the right to the possession of it. As regards the operation of the 85th section I entirely concur with what the Lord Chancellor has said, though perhaps I go a little further. I entirely agree that the power given by it, like every other power conferred on a public body, must be fairly used, or, as it has been called, bona fide, and with a view to carrying out the objects of the Act. It is not a proper user of it to make an entry on the land, not for the purpose of constructing works within the period limited by the powers of the Act, but with a view of acquiring a right of ownership, or a right equivalent to a right of ownership, with the idea of constructing the works under that right or quasi right, after the period limited by the Act for the construction of the works has expired. I should say that an entry made under such circumstances was not rightly made, and could confer no further title on the company than the company had before, which, as I have already said, was not, in my opinion, a right of ownership. If that be so, there is nothing more that need be considered for the decision of this case. But there is a point to which the Lord Chancellor did not refer, and as to which I desire to express my opinion—namely, supposing the entry had been rightfully made, what would have happened after the thirteen days? It appears to me that then the right of retaining possession of the land would have come to an end. There is no right to enter and use except for the purpose of the Act. It is not merely entering that is authorised, it is entering and using. If the company cannot use, it seems to me that they cannot retain possession against the landowner. Before the expiration of the thirteen days their answer to the landowner, assuming their entry to have been lawful until the expiration of the five years, would have been, "We are going to use the land, and we shall make the railway in time—wait and see." But when the time limited for making the line has expired, he says, "You cannot do that for which alone you had a right to take my land, and for which alone you had a right to deprive me of the possession of my land; and your right to retain possession has therefore ceased." It seems to me that both at law and in equity that would be an answer to any claim set up by the company to retain possession of the land after the powers had ceased.

That being so, it seems to me that there is no defence whatever against the plaintiff's claim; that the powers of the company, whatever they were, had come to an end before he brought his action, and that he is entitled to the relief which has been mentioned by the Lord Chancellor.

COTTON, L.J.—In this case the railway company claim to retain the plaintiff's land without any contract or agreement with him, and to use it for the purpose of making their railway.

Before the writ in this action was issued, the five years had expired, as to which the 40th section provided that if the railways were not completed within that time the powers granted to the company for making and completing the railway should no longer be exercised. Before that time notice to treat had been given, but nothing more had been done before the expiration of the five years except to enter under the 85th section of the Act.

It is not necessary in this case to decide what is the effect of section 40, as regards the right of the company when they are owners of the land to go on and make and complete works on that land, if they are not interfering with any rights of the public or of individuals in a way which they cannot do without Parliamentary authority. I do not say that where they are owners of land and can complete their railway upon it without interfering with public rights or with the rights of individuals, anybody, except perhaps the shareholders or the Attorney-General, could stop them from going on and as landowners completing their works on the land which they have already acquired under the powers of their Act. But here, in my opinion, they have not made themselves owners of the land under the powers of their Act (I shall deal presently with the argument that they have done so); and if that is so, then undoubtedly they cannot go on completing their railway or holding land for that purpose without the exercise of the powers granted by their Act, and under section 40 those powers have expired.

It was argued by Mr. Davey that, having regard to what had occurred, the railway company had put themselves into possession as owners or with the rights of owners of this property. It was not contended, and could not be successfully contended, that the notice to treat had that effect; but it was said that the notice to treat, followed as it was by entry under the 85th section of the Lands Clauses Act, within the period of five years, had put them in the position of being entitled to hold the land, with no right whatever on behalf of the plaintiff, except a right to have a sum paid to him for the price of the land, with possibly a lien upon it till that was paid; and reliance was placed on section 68 of the same Act.

Now, undoubtedly, land which is taken under section 85 has been decided to be —and I think rightly—land taken within the meaning of section 68, so as to give the landowner who has not been settled with as to compensation and price a right under section 68 to make his demand, and get the sum which he demands, if the company do not go to a jury. But one must see how the word "take" is used here: "If any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any land, or any interest therein, which shall have been taken for or injuriously affected by the execution of the works." There lies the contrast—a contrast between land that is actually taken posssession of by the company and intended to be permanently used, and land of which no possession is taken by the company, but which is injuriously affected by the works of the company on other land. Undoubtedly, if here the plaintiff had said, "You have taken this land, intending to use it for the purposes of your railway and permanently occupy it for that purpose," and had gone on under section 68, I am far from saying that he would not have been entitled, even after the expiration of the five years, to insist on and get the price paid to him which he demanded or which might be settled. But that does not decide that as against him the railway company are entitled to say, "We have by what we have done made ourselves owners of this land, so that, subject to the payment of the price, we can do upon it whatever as owners of land we can do without interfering with the rights of others." For the purpose of seeing whether they have or have not made themselves owners, we must look at section 85.

I assume for the purpose of my judgment that the entry upon the land at the time when it was made may be considered as bona fide. I do not in any way differ from what was said by the Lord Chancellor, that where entry is made nominally for the purpose of exercising statutory powers, but really without any such intention, such an entry could not be held to be lawful. But, assuming the entry to have been lawful, does the possession of the company continue lawful after the expiration of the five years? If it does not, can it be said that the railway company have by that entry, although lawful in the first instance, a right to be considered either as entitled to possession of the land, or as owners of the land, under this Act of Parliament?

I should say here that it cannot possibly be contended (for there is nothing in the Act upon which such an argument can be founded) that, by entry under section 85, the property in the land has gone from the owner and vested in the company. The utmost that can be said is, that under this section they have a right to retain possession, and to get out of the landowner, under some of the other clauses of the Act, the legal estate which still remains in him. Now for what purpose can the entry be made? The Master of the Rolls has very much anticipated what I proposed to say upon that. The right of entry is given for the purpose of enabling the company to exercise more rapidly than they could otherwise do their statutory powers of making and completing their railway. Section 85 undoubtedly speaks of using the land, but section 85 and section 84 go together, and we find in section 84 the express words, "enter upon any land which shall require to be purchased or permanently used for the purposes and under the powers of this or the special Act," and whenever user of the land is referred to, either in sections 84 or 85, that must be introduced. The user for which they can take possession under section 85 is user for the purposes of and under the powers given by the Act, and as against the will of the landowner they cannot in any way exercise that right of entry under section 85, in my opinion, except for the purpose of taking the land in order to use it under the exercise of the powers given by the statute under which they are acting. When these statutory powers are at an end (and it is clear under section 40 that they are at an end as far as power and not ownership enables them to go on) then there is no right given by section 85 in any way to use the land. It is not indeed said expressly that they are to give it up, but where they are acting, not as owners, but as persons having taken possession of the land against the will of the owner, as soon as the purposes for which they are authorised to take possession are at an end and have become impossible, then, in my opinion, there is no restriction whatever on the right of the owner to demand his land, and to apply to any proper Court, in order to prevent the company from continuing there, and to have himself revested in possession of it. That, in my opinion, is the short answer to the arguments on section 85.

Assuming that if the railway had been completed, the company could have made themselves absolute owners of the land by following out the notice to treat, it is clear that at the time when the five years expired the railway was not in any way completed, and in my opinion they had no right to retain this land—not theirs, but that of the plaintiff—for the purpose of making their railway when they had no statutory power enabling them to make their railway.

In my opinion, therefore, even assuming that their entry upon the land was lawful, and justified under the Act, yet when the purposes for which they had that right of entry and possession came to an end, then the right of the landowner to obtain possession of his land, and to restrain them from going on with any of their works, became absolute.

In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to a decree. I agree with what the Lord Chancellor has intimated—that if there is to be an enquiry as to damages, the costs of that must be reserved.

Lands belonging to the president and scholars of St. John Baptist College, Oxford, were taken by the Metropolitan and District Railway Companies under the powers of their Act, which incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the sum of 5,544*l.*, representing the purchase-money, was paid into Court.

A petition having been presented by the president and scholars of the College asking for the investment of the 5,544*l.* in East India Three and a half per Cent. stock or in East India Four per Cent. stock, the petition came on to be heard before Hall, V.C., on the 27th of April, 1882; and he, holding in accordance with his former decision in the case of Ex parte The Rector of Kirksmeaton (1) that money which has been paid into Court under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, is not cash under the control of the Court within the Law of Property Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 38), s. 10, directed, inter alia, that the 5,544*l.* should be invested in the manner pointed out by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, that is to say, in Consolidated Three per Cent. Annuities, at the same time expressing a wish that the matter should be brought before the Court of Appeal.

The College accordingly now appealed.

Wintle, for the appellants.—The decisions on this matter have been very contradictory, but the balance of authority is greatly in my favour. By the order of the 1st of February, 1861, which was made under the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, it was provided that cash under the control of the Court might be invested in East India stock. It has constantly been held that money paid into Court under the Settled Estates Act is cash under the control of the Court—Wall v. Hall (2), In re Thorold's Settled Estates (3), In re Foy's Trusts (4) and In re Cook's Settled Estates (5). In In re Shaw's Settled Estates (6) Lord Romilly, however, decided contrary to his decision in In re Cook's Estates (5); and in In re Boyd's Settled Estates (7), Lord Selborne, L.C., thinking that he was following Lord Romilly's last decision, decided that money paid into Court under the Settled Estates Act was not cash under control of the Court. But he was not really following Lord Romilly's latest decision—see the report of Ex parte The Rector of Kirksmeaton (1), where Hall, V.C., followed In re Boyd's Settled Estates (7), but said that he was not at all convinced of the soundness of the decision. LINDLEY, L.J.
BOWEN, L.J.

WILSON v. TURNER.

Maintenance—Trust for, or Power of—Marriage Settlement—Contract—Ability of Father.

There is no distinction upon principle between a provision in a marriage settlement and that in a will as to the application of income, to which children are entitled for their maintenance, irrespective of the father's ability to maintain them.

Where the words gave a discretion to the trustees, and there was no evidence of want of ability of the father or of the exercise of any discretion, the payments were disallowed.

Ransome v. Burgess (36 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 84; Law Rep. 3 Eq. 773) not followed.

The principle of the cases founded upon Mundy v. Earl Howe (4 Bro. C.C. 223) is not to be extended.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Bacon, V.C., ordering certain accounts to be taken. The action was brought by the plaintiff against the executors of his deceased father, W. Wilson, asking for the administration of his estate.

Various questions arose in the course of the action, and the plaintiff claimed an account to be taken of the income received by his father since the death of his (the plaintiff's) mother, under the following circumstances:—

By the settlement made upon the marriage of W. Wilson with the mother of the plaintiff certain personal property was settled on trust for Mrs. Wilson for life for her separate use, and after her death for her children as she should appoint, and in default of appointment for her children in equal shares. The settlement contained the following clause: "It is hereby declared that the trustees or trustee shall, after the death of the wife, apply the whole, or such part as the said trustees or trustee shall think fit, of the annual income of the share or fortune to which any child shall for the time being be entitled in expectancy under the trusts hereinbefore declared for or towards the maintenance or education of such child either directly or to his guardian or guardians without seeing to the application thereof."

Mrs. Wilson died in 1865, leaving the plaintiff the only child of the marriage, and who attained twenty-one in February, 1877.

After the death of Mrs. Wilson the whole of the income of the trust fund was paid by the trustees to W. Wilson till his death in 1880. The trustees did not exercise any discretion in making these payments, nor in pursuance of any request by W. Wilson that the income should be paid for the maintenance of his son, but on the ground of the income being the father's own property. The father meantime maintained and supported the plaintiff, who lived with him.

Various questions arose in the action which are not material to be reported.

The plaintiff also claimed to have an account taken of the income received by W. Wilson since the death of Mrs. Wilson, and Bacon, V.C., ordered the account to be taken.

The defendants appealed.

Davey, Q.C., and Mulligan, for the appellants, contended that the provision for maintenance being comprised in a marriage settlement, which was a contract to which the father was a party, rendered it obligatory upon the trustees to apply the income for the maintenance of the plaintiff independently of the question of the capacity of the father to maintain his child, it being part of the contract that a portion of the income should go to the father for his child's maintenance. It was not the case of a discretionary power in the trustees.

They cited and relied on Mundy v. Earl Howe (1), Meacher v. Young (2), Stocken v. Stocken (3) and Ransome v. Burgess (4), where the provision was indentical with that in the present case.

In In re Kerrison's Trusts (5), Malins, V.C., made a distinction between an antenuptial and post-nuptial settlement. In re Weaver (6) was also referred to.

Marten, Q.C., and Owen, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R. (after dealing with the first point, which related to the construction of a settlement, proceeded:)—The second point relied upon is as to maintenance, which was not raised in the argument before the Vice-Chancellor, and which, were it not for the decided cases, would, in my opinion, be wholly unarguable. There is a trust, after the death of the lady, the husband taking no life interest, that the trustees shall "apply the whole, or such part or parts as the trustees shall think fit, of the annual income of the share or fortune to which any child shall for the time being be entitled in expectancy under the trusts hereinbefore declared for or towards the maintenance or education, &c." The ordinary form adopted in modern settlements is a power and not a trust. This is a trust for what? To apply the whole or such parts as they think fit for or towards the maintenance. It is said that this settlement constitutes a contract with the father, and it has been so decided, although a decision was not wanted for that; but the decision referred to went farther, and said not only is there a contract with the father, but a contract of such a kind as to enable the father to get rid of the rule of equity which says that a provision or trust for maintenance is to be exercised for the benefit of the child and not of the father, and that therefore the father is not to be exonerated from his legal duty to maintain his child if he be of sufficient ability to do so. That was held, no doubt, in the first case under a will. The benefit intended by the testator was held to be a benefit to the child; but on principle it is difficult to see how the construction of a marriage settlement is different from that of a will. Under a marriage settlement not only the father but the children of the marriage take interests, and indeed the children are as a general rule the primary objects. There is generally a trust for them in the first instance, and then, as a rule, a superadded power or trust for maintenance. That is as much for the benefit of the children under a settlement as under a will. The whole theory of the thing is to secure the maintenance of the children. I cannot see why because the father is a party to the instrument which creates such a kind of trust for the children, he should be able to alter the construction of the trust (because that is the result of a former case) by saying that there is an absolute trust for maintenance irrespective of the father's capacity.

This difficulty has been felt and discussed several times, not only by Vice-Chancellor Kindersley in Ransome v. Burgess (4), but also by Vice-Chancellor Malins in In re Kerrison's Trusts (5), and I think his criticisms in that case are well founded. On the other hand, considering how frequently it has been recognised in this Court, it is impossible for this Court to say that the case of Mundy v. Earl Howe (1) is not law and is not binding upon it. It does appear to me, having regard to what is the principle, which is obvious, and considering the effect of that decision, that it is no part of our duty to carry it any further.

When you come to look at the decision, it is a decision that a trust contained in a marriage settlement, to which the father is a party, to apply the whole or part as the trustees may think fit of the income for the maintenance of the children, is an obligatory trust, and compels the trustees to maintain the children, although the father may be able to maintain them. It goes no further. But where we have, as here, not only a choice on the part of trustees to apply the whole or such part as they may think fit, but "for or towards the maintenance," we have what I may call a double option: they are not bound to apply any part for maintenance. The result therefore is, in my opinion, that the trust is one of that class of trusts which are equivalent to powers. There is nothing that you can compel the trustees to do; and, that being so, it seems to me on principle that we are not bound by the authorities to put a different construction upon the words; that there is no compulsion upon the trustees to apply a sufficient sum to maintain the infants, because they are not bound to maintain them at all. This distinguishes the present case from Stocken v. Stocken (3), Meacher v. Young (2) and In re Weaver (6), because in all those cases there was a trust to apply the whole of the income for or towards the maintenance of the infants. Where there is a trust to apply the whole of the income, whether it is for the maintenance, or towards the maintenance, that is a trust to apply the whole of the income, and consequently the whole income can be taken for one purpose or the other. Therefore it appears to me that those cases are no authorities for the decision of the present case.

But there is one case which appears to be in point—namely, Ransome v. Burgess (4). The words in that case are undistinguishable from those in the present case. It is true that it is not a decision of a Court that is binding on this, or which is of equal authority with this. It is the decision of a Vice-Chancellor; but on the other hand it is the decision of a very careful and eminent Judge, and is entitled to great attention. It was decided so far back as the year 1866, and if it had affected the course and practice of conveyancing by altering some settled point of law I should have had great difficulty in saying that I disagreed with it. But that is not the case. As far as I know, this case is not referred to in the text-books as an authority for what is other than law. Then there is another observation to be made on the case, as appears from the reports. There are two reports, and it appears that this point was not argued and was not decided by the Judge; and indeed, when he sums up the case (at page 780) he says, "if the language of the settlement is so framed as to express a trust to apply the income or any part of the income in maintaining the children, although the quantum of income to be so applied is left to the discretion of the trustees, the father is entitled to have whatever is proper and necessary for that purpose without reference to his ability to maintain them; but if the language of the settlement expresses merely a power so to apply the income or any part thereof to the maintenance of the children, then the father is not so entitled." So that as he states it he takes it to be clear in the case before him to be a trust, as he had already stated it, exactly like the case of Mundy v. Earl Howe (1). Having regard, therefore, to the fact of this point having escaped notice, and to the actual decision of the Court, and to the other facts which I have mentioned, I think we are not bound to follow the decision of Ransome v. Burgess (4); and that decision is not really supported by the authority of Mundy v. Earl Howe (1), and is not supported on any independent principle. That being so, it appears to me that the conclusion of the Vice-Chancellor in this case is right.

As regards the facts of the case, it is admitted that the father had the whole income without any regard to the question of maintenance, and there is no evidence of any want of means on the part of the father to maintain his children. The father, therefore, cannot establish a claim against the trust fund in respect of the maintenance of the child, and therefore the decision of the Vice-Chancellor must be affirmed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—On the first point I do not desire to add anything. Upon the second point—the claim for an allowance of maintenance—I confess that if I had been a Judge of first instance I should not have thought it right to depart from the case of Ransome v. Burgess (4). The question which arises is to be looked at from two points of view. First, What is the principle? Secondly, How it has been applied. I understand the principle of the matter to be this—that we must look at every clause that comes before us to see whether there is a trust for the maintenance of children of such a kind that the father can insist on the application of the trust fund for the maintenance of the children although able to maintain them. If there is such a trust, he is entitled to have the children maintained out of the fund. If there is no trust, then he is not. Therefore the preliminary question is, What is the language of the clause which is said to create a trust for the maintenance of the children? Upon looking at this clause, quite apart from authority, I confess that neither I nor any one could say that there is here a clear trust. [Reads the clause.] How under those words, apart from authority, could it be said that it was the duty of the trustee to apply any part of the fund to maintain the children? It would be doing violence to the words to say that there was any trust, and if it were not for authority I should be content to stop there and say I cannot so read this clause. The authorities which have been cited do not present any difficulty, with the exception of Ransome v. Burgess (4). The first case, Mundy v. Earl Howe (1), was a peculiar case, a case of a second marriage, and the husband had already six children by his former marriage. On the settlement made upon his second marriage the clause which Lord Loughborough had to construe was inserted, and, having regard to the facts under which the second settlement was made, he decided that the clause constituted a trust for the maintenance of the children.

The two following cases of Meacher v. Young (2) and Stocken v. Stocken (3) present no difficulty. They were clear cases of trust.

When we come to the case of Ransome v. Burgess (4) I confess I cannot distinguish it from this case; but, in my opinion, the Vice-Chancellor extended, and in my opinion erroneously extended, the former decisions. Taking the principles correctly, and enunciating them correctly, he put a construction upon the clause which I do not think the words warrant. At any rate I decline to be a party to extending that construction. In order to shew that I am right in saying that the previous cases had gone far enough, or too far, I will refer to what Lord Cottenham said in the case of Thompson v. Griffin (7)—that the distinction between the two classes of cases (namely, the cases in which the property was derived from the bounty of a stranger and those in which the children were entitled under the marriage settlements of their parents) had been carried quite as far as could be justified upon principle. And I may also, to indicate the general opinion of the profession, refer to Mr. Lewin's book on Trusts. He says at p. 491, "The decisions in this respect have gone as far as can be justified upon principle;" and further, the case of In re Kerrison's Trusts (5), before Vice-Chancellor Malins, where the clause was worded almost if not exactly like the clause in Ransome v. Burgess (4). The Vice-Chancellor laid hold of this as a distinction—namely, that Ransome v. Burgess (4) was the case of an ante-nuptial settlement, while in the case then before him the settlement was post-nuptial, thus shewing in substance that with regard to the construction of such a clause he did not think the case should be governed by an authority which did not strictly cover the point. It is in fact another instance of the disposition of the Courts to restrict decisions which have gone too far in one direction, and I will not draw any minute distinction between this case and Ransome v. Burgess (4). I think that the Judge went too far, and I decline to follow him. I accept the principle and apply the principle. Considering that this point was never raised by the pleadings nor by argument before the Vice-Chancellor we shall not be wrong in declining to give effect to the ingenious argument which has been addressed to us.

WHEELWRIGHT v. WALKER.

Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 2 (sub-ss. 1, 8), 38, 45—Power of Tenant-for-Life to sell—Sale of Interest in remainder prior to the Act—Trustees to whom Notice can be given—Settled Land Act Rules, 1882, rule 6.

The effect of the Settled Land Act, 1882, is to give to a tenant-for-life of settled land, subject to his complying with the provisions of the Act, absolute power at his own pleasure to take the land out of settlement and convert it into money.

And this statutory power is not affected by the circumstance that prior to the commencement of the Act the estate or interest in remainder was sold to a bona fide purchaser for value.

But under section 2, sub-s. 8, and section 45 of the Act, in order that the power may be exercised, it is necessary that there should be in existence trustees of the settlement either expressly appointed for the purposes of the Act, or else having, at the time of the sale, a present and immediate power to sell the settled land, or to consent to or approve of the exercise of a power of sale thereof, and that notice of the intended sale should be given by the tenant-for-life to such trustees.

Where, therefore, lands were limited to trustees upon trust for A for life, and after his death upon trust to sell and divide the proceeds amongst his children,—

Held, that A could not sell the lands under the powers of the Act unless and until trustees had been appointed under section 38, and notice given to them as required by section 45.

Upon an ex parte application the Court made an order that A should serve the assignee of the only child of A with notice of any application by A for the appointment of such trustees.

John Walker the elder, who died in 1836, by his will, dated the 2nd of December, 1834, devised a freehold property, consisting of a public-house, buildings and lands known as Goat House, in the parish of Rishworth, near Halifax, to trustees upon trust after the death of an annuitant (who died in 1853) to raise a sum of 500*l.*, and subject thereto to permit the defendant John Walker to receive the rents and profits during his life, and after his decease upon trust to sell and divide the proceeds amongst all and every the child and children of the defendant J. Walker, who being sons should attain the age of twenty-one, or being daughters should attain that age or marry, as tenants-in-common.

The defendant J. Walker had one child only, a daughter, Mrs. France, who was married and had several children.

The original trustees of the will of J. Walker the elder having died, by an order of the Court of Chancery dated the 14th of July, 1863, new trustees of the will were appointed and the trust estate vested in them. The defendants Chambers and R. Walker were the devisees of trust estates of the last survivor of the trustees so appointed.

By a deed dated the 20th of July, 1880, duly acknowledged by Mrs. France, Mr. and Mrs. France covenanted and agreed to sell the Goat House estate to the plaintiff in fee-simple, subject to the life estate of the defendant J. Walker, for the sum of 3,350*l.*, of which 1,350*l.* was to be paid as a deposit, and the remaining 2,000*l.* was to be retained by the plaintiff until the death of the defendant J. Walker, but the plaintiff was to pay interest thereon to the vendors at the rate of 4*l.* 10*s.* per cent. per annum, and in the event of the defendant J. Walker dying without other issue, a proper conveyance was to be executed and the balance of the purchase-money paid; in the event of his having any other child the contract was to be void, and the moneys paid under it were to be repaid. Notice of this agreement was given to the defendant J. Walker and the trustees of the will.

The Settled Land Act, 1882, having come into operation on the 1st of January, 1883, the defendant J. Walker, on or about the 27th of January, 1883, proceeded to advertise the Goat House estate for sale under the powers of that Act.

Thereupon the plaintiff brought this action, and now moved the Court for an injunction to restrain the defendant J. Walker, his auctioneers, solicitors and agents, from selling, or contracting to sell, or advertising, or otherwise offering for sale, the premises known as the Goat House estate, and to restrain the defendants Chambers and R. Walker from executing any assurance of the said estate or any part thereof, or dealing in any way with their estate therein, or with any of the muniments of title relating thereto, except to, or according to, the directions of the plaintiff.

From the evidence given in support of the plaintiff's motion, it appeared that the defendant J. Walker was upwards of seventy years of age; that the total rental of the property was only 84*l.*, subject to a deduction of 20*l.* in respect of interest on a mortgage for a sum of 500*l.*, charged on the property, pursuant to the direction in the will of J. Walker the elder: that this 64*l.* a year was the whole income which the defendant J. Walker had to live upon; and that his object in selling was to increase his income.

The following are the most material provisions of the Settled Land Act, 1882:—

Section 2, sub-s. 1: "Any deed, will, agreement for a settlement, or other agreement, covenant to surrender, copy of court roll, Act of Parliament, or other instrument, or any number of instruments, whether made or passed before or after, or partly before and partly after, the commencement of this Act, under or by virtue of which instrument or instruments any land, or any estate or interest in land, stands for the time being limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession, creates, or is, for the purposes of this Act, a settlement, and is in this Act referred to as a settlement, or as the settlement, as the case requires."

Section 2, sub-s. 8: "The persons, if any, who are for the time being under a settlement trustees with power of sale of settled land, or with power of consent to or approval of the exercise of such a power of sale, or if under a settlement there are no such trustees, then the persons, if any, for the time being, who are by the settlement declared to be trustees thereof for the purposes of this Act, are for purposes of this Act trustees of the settlement."

Section 45: "A tenant-for-life, when intending to make a sale, exchange, partition, lease, mortgage or charge, shall give notice of his intention in that behalf to each of the trustees of the settlement, by posting registered letters. . . ."

"(2.) Provided that at the date of notice the number of trustees shall not be less than two, unless a contrary intention is expressed in the settlement."

"(3.) A person dealing in good faith with the tenant-for-life is not concerned to enquire respecting the giving of any such notice as is required by this section."

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Rawlins, for the plaintiff.—The first objection to the proposed sale is, that there are no trustees to whom notice can be given by the tenant-for-life as required by section 45 of the Act. The definition of trustees is contained in section 2 (sub-s. 8); they must be either persons expressly made trustees for the purposes of the Act, or else "persons who are, for the time being, trustees with power of sale of settled land, or with power of consent to, or approval of, the exercise of such a power of sale." This must mean persons who have, at the time when the sale is to take place, a present and immediate power to sell or to consent to or approve of a sale. What was contemplated by the section evidently was the ordinary case of a strict settlement where there is a power of sale in trustees. In the present case there is only a future trust for sale, not arising until the death of the tenant-for-life. The tenant-for life, therefore, cannot give the notices required by section 45.

[PEARSON, J.—The object of the Act rather seems to have been, where trustees had a power of sale with consent of the tenant-for-life, to make the tenant-for-life instead of the trustees the prime mover in the matter of a sale.]

The result is that the tenant-for-life has not complied and cannot comply with the provisions of the Act, and therefore he cannot sell under the powers of it.

Secondly, it would be a clear fraud on the intention and spirit of the Act if a tenant-for-life, after he had notice of a sale by a remainderman effected before the commencement of the Act, were to be permitted to sell over the head of the purchaser from the remainderman. By section 53 a tenant-for-life in exercising the powers of the Act is to have regard to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement, and is to be deemed to be in the position and to have the duties and liabilities of a trustee for these parties. This tenant-for-life is upwards of seventy years old, so that his interest is very small compared with that of the plaintiff, and in proposing to sell against the plaintiff's wish he is not having due regard to the interests of all parties. By section 50 the powers of the tenant-for-life are incapable of assignment, manifestly because his position, in exercising the powers, is a fiduciary one.

Section 44 gives the Court full power to act in all cases where differences arise between a tenant-for-life and the trustees of the settlement respecting the exercise of any of the powers of the Act; and under this section, as well as under its general jurisdiction, the Court ought to restrain the present sale.

W. Pearson, Q.C., and Byrne, for the defendants.

[PEARSON, J.—The first question I should like you to consider is this. This equitable interest in remainder was sold to the plaintiff prior to the commencement of the Act. He thereby acquired, as the law then stood, a title to the land in remainder. Does the Act have the effect of setting aside the sale made before it came into operation?]

The assign of the remainderman cannot be in any better position than the remainderman himself. The definition of a settlement in section 2, sub-section 1, of the Act extends to instruments made before as well as after the Act. If it is clear (as it is submitted it is) that the tenant-for-life could sell regardless of the interest of the remainderman he can also sell regardless of the interests of those claiming under the remainderman.

From section 2, sub-section 5, and section 58, it is plain that the defendant J. Walker, being equitable tenant-for-life, is a person empowered by the Act to sell. The object of the Legislature, as shewn particularly by sections 20, 21 and 31 of the Act, was to partially remove the evils attending the settlement of land, and, so far as it could consistently with the interests of all parties under existing settlements, to bring the land under the dominion of those in possession, protecting the interests of those in remainder by preserving the purchase-money; and it therefore gives the tenant-for-life full and absolute power to sell the land, subject only to the provisions for retaining the purchase-money for the benefit of persons interested in remainder.

Section 45 only requires that the tenant-for-life should give notice to the trustees where there are in fact trustees. Where there are no trustees there is nothing whatever in the Act to prevent the tenant-for-life from selling.

But the trustees of this will are trustees within the definition in section 2, sub-section 8. That section does not require that the power of the trustees shall be immediate. It is sufficient if there is a power to arise at a future time. The only reason for requiring notice to be given to the trustees with power of sale is because theirs would be the hands to receive the purchase-money. The Act does not give them any control whatever over the power of the tenant-for-life to sell, and the words "power of sale" were inserted merely to indicate the particular class of trustees meant. The circumstance that this is a trust and not a power cannot make any difference.

Nor does section 53 in any way affect the power of the tenant-for-life to sell. It merely places him in the position of a fiduciary vendor, and as such liable for any breach of trust.

Secondly, it is said that the proposed sale is a fraud upon the Act. That must mean that the tenant-for-life in selling would be committing a breach of trust under section 53. But there is no allegation whatever of any misconduct on his part: all that is said is that he is upwards of seventy years old.

Further, even if the tenant-for-life has no power to sell there would be no jurisdiction in the Court to restrain him from so doing. That would be a question of title affecting the purchaser only—Benson v. Lamb (1). If there is no power to sell

Cur. adv. vult.

ON, J.—This case is one of the elieve, which has arisen under ed Land Act, 1882, and it raises very important questions as re- matter at the present moment , and opens also very many con- as with regard to the Act of a ous character. I have taken the ity of reading the Act through fully since I had the advantage g the arguments of counsel, and r about to determine, so far as I t appears to me to be the mani- ling and the plain construction of

The case on the present occa- s in this way. Mr. Wheelwright, tiff, seeks to restrain Mr. Walker, tenant-for-life of the property in in this case, from selling the pro- der the Act. Mr. Walker con- at he is entitled to sell the property under the Act. The question I have to determine is, whether under the circumstances in which the property is situated Mr. Walker is right in his contention, or Mr. Wheelwright in his. Mr. Walker takes this property, which is a public-house, under the will of his grandfather, John Walker, under which will he is equitable tenant-for-life, and subject to his tenancy-for-life the property is devised to trustees upon trust to sell and divide the proceeds amongst all and every the child and children of Mr. Walker. Mr. Walker has one child, a daughter, a married lady with several children. Years ago this lady, Mrs. France, attained a vested interest in the property, subject only to being divested as to more or less of that interest if her father should have other children. Her father is now upwards of seventy years of age, and the probability of his having any more children is very small, and for the purpose of what I am going to say I treat the case as if Mrs. France was really entitled in fee-simple in remainder subject to the life estate of her father, and I do so because in that way I shall try this case much better than if I imagined that her share was liable to diminution by reason of her father having other children. That being the state of things, on the 20th of July, 1880, Mrs. France and her husband sold the remainder in fee to Mr. Wheelwright, and as the law then stood Mr. Walker had no power to sell the property, and the trustees had no power to sell the property over Mr. Wheelwright's head, but Mrs. France and her husband had power to sell Mrs. France's interest in the property as real estate (subject to the prior life interest), and Mr. Wheelwright obtained a title to it as landed property. He was entitled at that time to expect that at the death of Mr. Walker he would succeed to it as real property without the possibility of its being sold over his head by the tenant-for-life or the trustees. On the 1st of January, 1883, there came into operation the Settled Land Act, 1882, which had received the royal assent on the 10th of August, 1882, and under the third section of that Act, a tenant-for-life "may sell the settled land or any part thereof."

So far as I can see there is no restriction whatever in the Act on the power of the tenant-for-life to sell. There is nothing that I can see in the Act which enables the Court to restrain him from selling, whether he sells because he is in debt and wishes to increase his income, or whether without being in debt he thinks he can increase his income by selling, or whether he sells from mere unwillingness to take the trouble involved in the management of landed property, or whether he acts from worse motives, as from mere caprice or whim, or because he is desirous of doing that which he knows would be very disagreeable to those who expect to succeed him at his death; there is not, so far as I can see, any power either in the Court or in the trustees to interfere with his power to sell. But the first question to be considered—the powers of the Act being so large—is, whether or not this property, so situated as it is, there having been a sale to Mr. Wheelwright at a time when Mr. Wheelwright thereby acquired a title to the land, is or is not settled property within the meaning of the Act so as to entitle the tenant-for-life of the estate to exercise his power of sale under the statute. In order to determine that, it is necessary to look at the definition of the word settlement, which is to be found in section 2, sub-section 1, and is as follows: [His Lordship read the sub-section.] Now, first of all, let me assume that the deeds which I am going to mention were executed after the Act, so that there could be no question whatever of the Act applying to them. And I will take this instance: a testator by his will gives property to A for life, with remainder to B in fee-simple, and B after that is minded to make a settlement of the reversion which is to come to him, and accordingly settles it on himself for life with remainder to his son for life, and then in the event of his son's marriage it is settled on his son's children in the usual form in which settlements of real estate are made. I have then two instruments—a will and a marriage settlement—under which the property is limited "in trust for any persons by way of succession." I conceive that, inasmuch as the Act says any number of instruments form a settlement, these two instruments which I have assumed as existing together form a settlement, and that settlement being comprised in those two instruments, the tenant-for-life will have power to sell the settled property over the heads of all those in remainder. I think it almost impossible to say that that is not the true construction of the Act, and I say so for this, amongst other reasons: First of all, it seems to me that the words themselves import that; but if not, then I may observe that the Act provides for the exercise of other powers given to the tenant-for-life by the Act, and amongst other powers given to him are powers as to the improvement of the land—very large powers indeed, and powers which I shall refer to presently, because they relate to the question as to the trustees under the settlement who are to be served with notice. Those powers are to be found in the 25th section, and if you go on to the 28th section you will find this: "The tenant-for-life and each of his successors in title having, under the settlement, a limited estate or interest only in the settled land, shall . . . . maintain and repair, at his own expense, every improvement executed under the foregoing provisions of this Act," and so forth.

It is quite plain, therefore, that what is referred to in this Act and intended to be comprised in it was in many cases a succession of tenants-for-life having limited interests, all of whom were to be benefited by and bound by the acts of the first tenant-for-life; and seeing that the result would be, in the case which I have supposed, that you would create a succession of life estates in the land, and seeing that any number of instruments taken together form a settlement, I cannot help coming to the conclusion that in that case the tenant-for-life under the will would be the tenant-for-life under the Act; and, as tenant-for-life under the Act, no power of sale in the will and no power of sale in the settlement would affect him, but he would nevertheless have power to sell under the Act. If that is so, it will make no difference whether the instruments are executed before or after the Act, because the definition expressly applies to all instruments whether made "before or after, or partly before and partly after, the commencement of this Act."

Now if Mrs. France, instead of selling the property to Mr. Wheelwright, had simply settled it on her marriage on herself as tenant-for-life with remainder to her children, I am of opinion that this Act would have applied, and her father, as tenant-for-life under the will, could have exercised the power of sale as tenant-for-life under the Act. I think, therefore, it makes no difference that Mrs. France simply sold to Mr. Wheelwright instead of settling her interest. I find nothing whatever in the Act which gives any person entitled in remainder any power of any sort or description to interfere with the right of the tenant-for-life to sell. So far as I can see, the object of the Act is to enable the tenant-for-life to take the property out of settlement, and to substitute for the real estate comprised in the settlement, ex mero motu, the value of it in pounds, shillings and pence.

I come now to the next question, which is raised in this way. It is said, "You, the tenant-for-life, may have a power to sell; but there are no trustees here, and there are trustees required to be in existence under the Act, and you cannot sell unless there are those trustees under the Act, because you are required to give them notice." Well, now, the question as regards notice turns first on section 2, sub-section 8, and the trustees are there described thus: [His Lordship read the sub-section.] Then section 45 provides as follows: [His Lordship read it.] Now there can be no doubt whatever, from the terms of the present instrument, that there are no trustees here with power to sell the settled land, or power to consent to or approve the exercise of such a power of sale, because I must construe the words, "persons who are for the time being trustees with power of sale," &c., as meaning with power of sale at the present time. I do not think they can mean merely a power to sell at some future period. I think they mean a present power of sale, or of consent to or approval of the exercise of a power of sale. It is not immaterial to observe that the duty of the trustees under the Act is in some respects decidedly of very great importance: they may consent to improvements, and if they consent the tenant-for-life may make them: they may consent to the cutting of trees, and if they consent the tenant-for-life is entitled to cut them down; and altogether, although I do not see exactly what power or control they have over the tenant-for-life in regard to selling, it is quite plain from the whole scope of the Act that the trustees are considered as persons having an important duty to perform; and, at all events, I think it clear that even with regard to a sale they have this important duty to perform—that if the tenant-for-life attempts to commit what may be called a fraud, and proposes to sell the property for something infinitely below its real value, it is the duty of the trustees to come to the Court to restrain the sale. I do not think it would be right for them to leave the remaindermen to take the objection at some remote period when the evidence might be very conflicting as to the circumstances under which the sale was made and as to the value of the property, but I think it would be the trustees' duty to bring the matter before the Court, and that the Court would have power in that case of controlling the sale, and the more so because under the 53rd section the tenant-for-life is said to be a trustee for the remaindermen; and I assent to Mr. W. Pearson's argument, that, in selling under the Act, he must sell as fairly as a trustee must sell for the tenant-for-life and those in remainder. Now I had great difficulty at one time in seeing why any direction should be given by section 44 to enable persons to come to the Court if differences arose, but I see that there are questions as to which differences may arise—for the cutting of timber and the improvement of the land require either the consent of the trustees or the sanction of the Court; consequently, if there should arise disputes between the tenant-for-life and the trustees as to the improvements of the estate or the cutting of timber, the Court could intervene and decide whether the objection of the trustees was sound, or whether the tenant-for-life ought to be allowed to do what he contemplated doing. Now there are certainly no trustees here who come within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. But under the 38th section there is power to the tenant-for-life to come to the Court; and when he comes to the Court, the Court can, if it thinks it right so to do appoint fit persons trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Act. I think, therefore, that although Mr. Walker as tenant-for-life has the power to sell the fee-simple and inheritance of this property, if he complies with the conditions of the Act, yet he is proceeding at the present moment precipitately, because there are no trustees to whom he can give notice; and I think, therefore, I must restrain him from selling until such time as there have been appointed trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Act to whom notice can be given, and due notice given to them of an intention to sell.

Graham Hastings, Q.C. (on Feb. 21), applied to the Court ex parte to make an order directing the defendant J. Walker to serve the plaintiff with notice of any application which might be made to the Court for the appointment of trustees under section 38 of the Act. He stated that the plaintiff's solicitors had asked the defendants' solicitors to undertake not to make the application without serving the plaintiff, but that the defendants' solicitors refused, upon the ground that under rule 6 of the Settled Land Act Rules, 1882, it would not be proper to serve him unless the Judge so directed.

PEARSON, J., observed that the proper time to make such an application would appear to be after the summons for the appointment had issued.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., pointed out that the summons would be disposed of and the order made in chambers without the plaintiff having any opportunity of being heard.

PEARSON, J., made the order.

ROSS v. GUTTERIDGE.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 49—Debt incurred by Fraud or Breach of Trust—Debtor an undischarged Bankrupt or Insolvent—Jurisdiction of Chancery Division—Enforcement of Judgment for the debt suspended.

The Court has jurisdiction, during the bankruptcy or insolvency of a debtor, and before he has obtained his discharge, to give judgment against him for a debt which he has incurred by fraud or breach of trust, but the judgment cannot be enforced until after discharge obtained.

In a case of this description judgment for the debt and interest was given against a liquidating debtor, but it was ordered not to be enforced until after discharge obtained, or until further order, liberty being given to the plaintiff to apply in case of the debtor unduly delaying to apply for his discharge.

Cobham v. Dalton (44 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 702; Law Rep. 10 Chanc. 655) and Ex parte Hemming; in re Chatterton (49 Law J. Rep. Bankr. 17; Law Rep. 13 Ch. D. 163) explained.

Action.

In or about the month of June, 1868, the defendant, Richard Gutteridge, who was a medical man at Leicester, persuaded the plaintiff, Catherine Ross, a single lady living in the same town, to sell four houses which she owned, and to pay over to him the proceeds, amounting to 570*l.*, for the purpose of investment, as he represented, in a local building society, of which he was chairman. She had previously entrusted to him another smaller sum for the same purpose, which was also a subject of litigation in the present action, but it is unnecessary for the purposes of this report to make further reference to it. The defendant never invested the 570*l.* in the building society, but paid it into his own banking account, and applied it to his own purposes. Being threatened with criminal proceedings, the defendant gave the plaintiff a cheque for the amount she had entrusted to him; but the cheque was not honoured, and in May, 1870, after negotiations, the defendant gave the plaintiff a promissory note for 570*l.*, and on various occasions between that date and 1879 he acknowledged the debt and paid the plaintiff sums of money on account of interest. The defendant, however, never repaid the principal, nor rendered accounts, though requested so to do, and on the 26th of January, 1882, the plaintiff commenced the present action, by which she alleged fraud, and claimed an account, and an order on the defendant to pay the sum found due.

The defendant, among other defences to the action, denied fraud, and pleaded that he was an undischarged bankrupt and insolvent. The facts with regard to this were that in November, 1869, the defendant presented a petition for an adjudication of bankruptcy against himself, which adjudication was made in due course. In May, 1870, the formal order for his discharge was drawn up and delivered to him. In May, 1879, the defendant presented a petition for a liquidation of his affairs by arrangement; and in July, 1879, a resolution was registered, and a trustee of his estate was appointed in due course. This liquidation was still pending and not wound up at the date of the action.

This was the hearing of the action, with witnesses.

Higgins, Q.C., and R. Neville, for the plaintiff.—The question arises, whether the plaintiff's claim to relief is barred by the 49th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869; but cases of fraud or breach of trust are excepted from the release given by that section, and this is an instance of both—The Emma Silver Mining Company v. Grant (1). That, the defendant having been an agent, there was a breach of trust also appears from Burdick v. Garrick (2).

T. Ribton, for the defendant. — The claim should be proved for in the liquidation under section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869; and, as that is not done, it is barred by section 49. In the first place, there was no fiduciary relation, and therefore no breach of trust—Knox v. Gye (3). In the second place, no fraud has been proved; and fraud must be proved, and not inferred from mere suspicion—Palmer v. Locke (4). The plaintiff's claim is, therefore, not within the exception in section 49. If, however, it is held that there was a fraud, then the plaintiff cannot succeed, for there is a pending liquidation, and until his order of discharge has been obtained the defendant cannot be sued otherwise than in bankruptcy, even in respect of a debt founded on a fraud—Ex parte Hemming; in re Chatterton (5).

[PEARSON, J., referred to Cobham v. Dalton (6).]

Clarke v. Bradlaugh (7) shews that a plaintiff who might otherwise have succeeded may fail by suing at a wrong time. The action should be dismissed, leaving it to the plaintiff to commence a fresh one, if so advised, after the order of discharge has been obtained.

Higgins, Q.C., in reply.—The insolvent's discharge would be no defence to the plaintiff's claim, and the Court of Bankruptcy does not interfere with proceedings on such a claim, even pending the liquidation—Ex parte Coker; in re Blake (8). The relief sought should, therefore, be granted at once.

[PEARSON, J., referred to Lewes v. Barnett (9).]

PEARSON, J. (after stating the facts and dealing with a part of the case), proceeded as follows:—The question which I have now to decide arises in this way: In the year 1869 or 1870 the defendant became bankrupt, but in the course of the latter year he was discharged, so that any question arising out of that bankruptcy is gone. But in May, 1879, he presented a petition for liquidation, and a trustee of his estate was appointed. It is not clear whether any dividend has been paid out of the estate, but that liquidation is still pending, and it is said that it is a bar to this action, for this reason—the 49th section of the Bankruptcy Act says that "an order of discharge shall not release the bankrupt from any debt or liability incurred by means of any fraud or breach of trust, nor from any debt or liability whereof he has obtained forbearance by any fraud, but it shall release the bankrupt from all other debts provable under the bankruptcy," with certain exceptions, among which this case is not included. The result is that, for the plaintiff to succeed, she must prove some fraud or breach of trust by Gutteridge. Either will be sufficient, so that if I come to the conclusion that there has been fraud, it will not be necessary to go into the question as to the breach of trust. Now, I come to the conclusion that there was fraud from beginning to end of this transaction. Gutteridge persuaded the plaintiff to sell the houses for the purpose of investing the purchase money of 570*l.* in the building society; but it is clear that when he took the money from Miss Ross, he had no intention whatever of investing it in the building society, but that he intended to do as he did, namely, to pay it into his own account at the bank and to appropriate it to his own purposes. I am of opinion that this was in its inception a fraudulent debt, created by Gutteridge with the intention of committing a fraud on this lady (though it may be that he had some intention of making the matter right at some future time if he were in a position to do so), and that nothing which has since occurred has had the effect of purifying it or rendering it less fraudulent than at first. But it was contended that, although the debt was fraudulent in its inception, yet, as the defendant is in liquidation and undischarged, the plaintiff is not in a position to sue until his discharge has been obtained. Mr. Ribton pressed me very much with the case of Ex parte Hemming; in re Chatterton (5). But the judgments of the Lords Justices in that case, and in the earlier case of Cobham v. Dalton (6), shew clearly that, though proceedings cannot be taken against the person, or for the purpose of attaching the property of a debtor, until he has obtained his discharge in his bankruptcy or insolvency, yet there is no ground for saying that a fraudulent debt is barred by the Bankruptcy Act, or that anything more is done by the Act than to impose a restraint upon proceedings affecting the person or property of the bankrupt or insolvent until his discharge has been obtained. In short, the debt is not affected, though any judgment based upon it cannot be enforced otherwise than in bankruptcy until after discharge obtained. After discharge, the judgment can be enforced against the person or property of the insolvent. The Judges do not say that the 49th section puts an end to the fraudulent debt, and creates a new debt on which the insolvent can be sued after his discharge; they only say that the remedy of the creditor is suspended. No part of the 570*l.* has been repaid, and I must therefore give judgment for the 570*l.*, with interest since 1879 (when the defendant ceased to pay interest), at 4*l.* per cent. per annum, and the costs of the action; prefacing the order (as was done in The Emma Silver Mining Company v. Grant (1)) with a declaration that this was a debt incurred by fraud. The judgment must not be enforced until the defendant has obtained his order of discharge, or (to guard against the possibility of the defendant's unduly delaying to obtain it) until further order, the plaintiff having liberty to apply.

"Yours truly,

the 30th of October the company served with a formal notice of appeal the whole of the order of the 3rd of st, which also stated "this notice is given as supplemental to the notice of appeal contained in the letter of the 10th of August, 1882, written by the appellant's solicitors to the solicitor of the company, and to avoid any question whether the said letter of the 10th of August was a formal notice of appeal."

The formal notice of appeal was not served on the shareholders who had successfully opposed the petition in the Court below.

On the appeal coming on to be heard—

Crossley, Q.C., and Bonsor, for the company, objected that the appeal was out of time—In re Blyth and Young (1).

Whitehorne, Q.C., and Seward Brice, for the appellant.—There has been a bona fide intention to appeal from the first, and the company have not in any way been misled. Moreover, they have by their own conduct raised an equity against themselves. They got the appeal advanced and set it down for hearing, and have, therefore, by their conduct induced us to believe that they considered it a good and valid notice of appeal—McAndrew v. Barker (2). Further, the letter of the 10th of August is a sufficient notice, although only addressed to the solicitor of the company. It is an informal notice of appeal which can be cured by amendment. There has been a misapprehension as to the effect of it, and if it is invalid, then we ask that, under the circumstances, the time for appealing may be extended—Blyth and Young's Case (1), Little's Case (3) and Taylor's Case (4).

JESSEL, M.R.—It appears to me that this appeal is clearly out of time, and that there really was no notice to appeal at all. First of all, let us see what Order LVIII. says of appeal. Rule 2 of that Order says this, "All appeals to the Court of Appeal shall be by way of rehearing, and shall be brought by notice of motion in a summary way." Therefore a notice of appeal must be a notice of motion. Then rule 3 is, "The notice of appeal shall be served upon all parties directly affected by the appeal."

(4) 47 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 696; Law Rep. 8 Ch. D. 643.

In re The New Callao Co., App.

Consequently it is a notice of motion to be served on all the parties to the action or matter. Then rule 4 says, "Notice of appeal from any judgment, whether final or interlocutory, shall be a fourteen-days' notice, and notice of appeal from an interlocutory order shall be a four-days' notice." Now I come to the document which is supposed to be the notice. It is a letter from one solicitor to another. [His Lordship read the letter, and continued:] That letter is open to this observation. In the first place, every solicitor knows, or ought to know, that a letter is not a notice of motion. In the second place, every solicitor knows that a letter addressed to the other solicitor is not a notice of motion addressed to the party to be affected by the appeal. Thirdly, every solicitor knows that in a notice of motion, being a fourteen-days' notice, as this is, there must be some time specified in the notice, and there is none here. Lastly, every solicitor knows that notice of an appeal is one thing, and notice of the intention to give notice of appeal another. They can change their intention; and can anybody suppose that if on receipt of this letter Mr. Davis, to whom it is addressed, had briefed counsel, and the appellant had never really appealed, he could have got the costs of it as an abandoned motion? The answer would have been that he had been in too great a hurry, they only told him they intended to give him notice, he ought to have waited till he got the notice. On all these grounds, it appears to me manifest that there has been no notice of appeal whatever, and therefore nothing to set down. As regards the supplementary notice, that was abandoned. The only other point that was urged upon us was this. It was said that if there has been no notice to appeal, the appellant is entitled to indulgence. I do not think that appellant is entitled to any indulgence. In the first place, I think it right to say that I agree with the observations of the other two Judges who were sitting with me in the case of McAndrew v. Barker (2) (the late Lord Justice James and Lord Justice Baggallay), as to the meaning of that decision—I mean the observations they made in Blyth and Young's Case (1) (at pp. 419-20), that it was not intended in McAndrew v. Barker (2) to say that the equity arising from accident or mistake with which the respondent had nothing to do did not remain. The words of my judgment are very short, "unless there has been on the part of the respondent some conduct raising an equity against him"; and Lord Justice Baggallay says, "This language, though applicable to the case under consideration, must, I think, admit of some modification where there are reasons of some special character"; and Lord Justice James says, with regard to the same judgment, "I wish to say that I think it was a little too strong to say that the Court has no discretionary power to enlarge the time for appealing unless there has been conduct on the part of the respondent raising an equity against him." The Court did not lay down a positive rule for every case. It was not intended, for instance, to apply to the case of "inevitable accident." Therefore, I concur with them as to the meaning of the language used in McAndrew v. Barker (2).

That being so, what is the ground upon which this appellant asks for indulgence? I cannot see any. There is no accident, no mistake. I cannot see any ground for mistake. The solicitor knows the difference between a notice of appeal (as appears from his letter) and an intention to appeal; and it does appear to me that there has been neither accident nor mistake, nor has there been any misconduct on the part of the respondents. But there is this additional circumstance: in winding-up petitions the refusal of an appeal has not, if I may say so, the same final effect as a refusal of leave to appeal has in the case of an action, because you may present another petition on different grounds by the same petitioner, and any other petitioner can present a petition if he thinks fit; whereas in an action an appeal once dismissed is final. Therefore there is less ground for the indulgence in this case than there is in the ordinary case of an action. Then it is said that the letter itself was an informal notice of appeal, and Little's Case (3) was relied on. Now, as regards Little's Case (3), of course it is binding on this Court whenever you get the identical circumstances, but it is not binding further if you consider it is a case of construction.

because nothing is better settled than that the construction put upon an instrument by a Court of law or equity is not binding on another Court of law or equity, even of inferior jurisdiction, as regards the construction of an instrument couched in somewhat similar language. Therefore if you take Little's Case (3) to be a case of construction, which I think is the correct view of it, it is not binding on us as an authority.

If, on the other hand, you take the other view of it, which is a possible view, but I think not the true view, that it was an application for indulgence, it could only have been granted in the event of mistake. It was an informal notice of motion by mistake. But I do not think that is what was decided. We have some light thrown upon it in In re Blyth and Young (1). It happened that the same three Judges who decided Little's Case (3) sat in the case of Blyth and Young (1). Lord Justice James said that a notice for the respondent sent to his solicitor that they intended to appeal would not do, and that was in 1880. I do not see that the word "correspondence" differs from a single letter, and when a Judge says a correspondence between solicitors stating they intended to appeal would not do, of course he includes a single letter saying they intended to appeal; and, therefore, after Blyth and Young (1), all solicitors ought to have known that a statement by letter of an intention to appeal would not be sufficient. That puts an end to any notion of mistake. But the ground on which Lord Justice James put the case was this. In Little's Case (3) he says the notice was intended as an actual notice of appeal, but it was informal—that is to say, looking at the circumstances of the case, seeing it was in substance a formal notice, that it was served in the regular way and set down in the regular way, the Court came to the conclusion that the word "intention" was put in by mistake. It meant an actual prosecution of the appeal. That is the way he puts it. Then Lord Justice Baggallay says, "Little's Case (3) was relied on; but in that case the circumstances were special, and the Court was of opinion that the notice, although informal, was a sufficient compliance with the order;" and the Lord Justice Cotton said, "It was quite different from what was done in Little's Case (3), where there was an actual notice of appeal, although an informal one." So they all take the same view, that whatever the wording was, it amounted to an actual notice of appeal; and they all agreed that a letter stating an intention to appeal does not amount to an actual notice of appeal. After that it is impossible to say that Little's Case (3) can be prayed in aid by the present applicant.

It seems to me, therefore, that there is no ground whatever for indulgence, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In a case like this it is of the very utmost importance that a petition shall not be hanging over a company for any greater length of time than is allowed strictly by the rules of the Court; and the question which really we have to consider here is, whether that letter of the 10th of August which has been so often referred to can be looked upon as a notice of motion of appeal. Now, I will not read again the rules which were referred to by the Master of the Rolls. They define in the most particular way what is to be considered a notice of appeal; and the question we have really to decide is this—Is this a notice of motion by way of appeal? I find if one looks only at the first paragraph of the letter it is clear, as a matter of construction, to my mind, that it is not intended to be a notice of motion by way of appeal, but simply notice of an intention hereafter to present such a notice, because it asks when the order will be drawn up, as if it were necessary that the order should be drawn up before notice of motion by way of appeal could be given. "Because we are anxious about this matter, as we are advised and intend to give notice of appeal." The mere fact to which they call attention that no order had been drawn up and that they were anxious about it, is entirely inconsistent with that being considered as a notice of motion by way of appeal, or anything else but what it purports to be—namely, notice of an intention to give notice of appeal. When we come to look at the remainder of the letter, that is not all. No one looking at the letter, without reference to what the consequence may be, could say that that was intended in any way to be a notice of motion by way of appeal, because they go on to ask for certain other things which they think may be material if they give notice of motion of appeal; and then they add, "We shall use this letter, together with Mr. Attwood's evidence, on the appeal." Was it ever thought necessary to give notice that you would use on appeal the notice of motion for that appeal? It is said that it let the other parties know that they intended to appeal. That is not the question I am now dealing with. It may be a notice to the parties of what the solicitor thought best for the interest of his client—that his intention was to prosecute an appeal; but that in no way bound him. It would have been impossible for the other side to say, "We received this notice, and if it is abandoned we claim to have it set down and get our costs." It is said that Little's Case (3) is a decision of this Court in favour of the appellant here. I took part in that case, and I have said nothing about it in the course of the argument; but it is clear, not only when one looks at that case, but at the subsequent case, where the point was very similar, of In re Blyth and Young (1), that what the Judges who decided that case meant to say, having regard to the surrounding circumstances and the terms of the letter, was that it was a notice of motion by way of appeal, which might properly be set down by the Registrar as such. That case cannot certainly be considered as an authority in favour of this letter being a notice of motion by way of appeal, because the letter in In re Blyth and Young (1) was very like the present, and I see in one report of that case I am reported to have said in the course of the argument, though I did not use the words in my judgment, "Here you gave notice of your intention, but you did not give notice of your appeal"; and that really, as regards the first question, concludes the present case. It is exactly applicable to it.

That being so, ought we in such a case as this to grant liberty, notwithstanding the time to appeal has elapsed? What I said with reference to this being a winding-up petition weighs very strongly upon my mind. That even if there were something of a case for allowing an extension of time, in the case of a winding-up petition I should not grant leave to appeal after the time had expired without a very strong case was made indeed, because a winding-up petition paralyses the acts of the directors and those who manage the company; and, in my opinion, the Court ought not, without the very strongest case, to grant an extension of time. In the case of In re Blyth and Young (1) I said nothing about the circumstances under which the Court would grant an extension, because I thought it better to leave that until the case should arise. But I think I may say that I quite agree with the Master of the Rolls that that expression of his, "Unless there is something raising an equity against the party," may be misunderstood. It is not necessary that there should be something in the conduct of the respondent which raises an equity against him; but it is necessary that there should be some equity which raises a case for the proposing appellant to gain an extension of time. There must be an equity in his favour, either from the act of the other party or from something else recognised as a ground of equity.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There are two things which it seems to me ought to be kept distinct. On the one side there are a number of rules which prescribe the machinery for carrying out the different steps towards an appeal, and the Court has to construe these rules. On the other side there is a power contained in other rules for the Court to prevent injustice being wrought by slips or misadventures; and in dealing with slips or misadventures, and in extending its indulgence, the Court ought of course to be liberal, when it sees it is necessary to be liberal in order to do justice. But the liberality which the Court shews in extending its indulgence, where justice requires indulgence to be extended, ought not to become laxity in construing the rules which define the machinery which the parties have to pursue. And in construing these rules about the notice of appeal it seems to me we must keep clear the two points—first, what the rules mean; and, secondly, if there has been a slip that the Court will interfere to mend it. Now, as regards the notice of appeal as being given within the rules, it seems to be almost too plain for argument that the first step has not been taken towards an appeal. The rules prescribe that there is to be a notice of motion, and state what the notice of motion is to contain. The notice of motion is to state whether the whole or any part of the judgment or order is appealed from, and is to specify, in the latter case, what part is intended to be appealed from. When we turn to this letter we find that, so far from any definite step having been taken in the matter, all that has been done is that the solicitor on one side writes to the solicitor on the other to say that when something else is done he intends to prosecute that step. I should not think there was a solicitor practising in the Supreme Court or a clerk of any experience to a solicitor who would not distinguish the difference between a notice of appeal and a letter like that which has been put before us. Then it is said Little's Case (3) is an authority for shewing that the informality will not be treated as a departure from the rule. I do not think Little's Case (3) shews anything of the sort. We are bound by the case whatever it is, but it seems to me that it is simply a decision upon the construction of a particular document. If Little's Case (3) is more—if it is an illustration of the way in which the Court will extend its indulgence to cure slips—that has nothing to do with the question I am immediately considering, which is the construction of the rules and whether this document is a compliance with them. If Little's Case (3) is a decision of construction of the document used, it is no authority whatever as to the proper construction to be put on the document here.

The second question which we have to consider is, whether, assuming this document to be bad as a notice of appeal, which I think it is, the Court will extend its indulgence to rectify any slip or mistake. I would not here myself, especially as I have not yet had the experience or anything like it of my brother members of this Court, try to define the exact measure or limits of the discretion which a Court of Appeal ought to exercise in rectifying a blunder. I should be quite prepared to be liberal when justice had to be done. But here it seems to me that there is no sort of ground whatever for rectifying this document or for putting the parties who wrote it in a better position on the ground of a slip or mistake, for the best of all reasons—I do not think there has been any slip, mistake or accident. I believe that the gentlemen who wrote this document did not, at the time they wrote it, for a moment think that it was equivalent to a notice of appeal. I therefore fail to see that there has been any mistake or misadventure or accident of any kind whatever.

Grosvenor Woods, for the shareholders who had opposed the petition in the Court below, and who had been allowed their costs, asked for his costs of the appeal.

Whitehorne, Q.C.—It has been decided that there was no notice of appeal, so there was nothing for them to come here for. They were not served with our notice of appeal, and are not parties to this application.

JESSEL, M.R.—I am quite clear that the appellant cannot take advantage of his own irregularity in this way. In strictness he was bound to serve everybody affected by the appeal. Supposing there were two persons claiming under a will adversely to a third, and the third person appealed and only served one of the others; if that appellant got a decision in his favour, which might be collusive, in the absence of the other respondent, would anybody say that the decision did not affect the other respondent? It is quite plain that the other respondent would have a right to appear, without being served, and claim to argue his case. This appellant now says, "I did not give notice of motion of appeal." The argument just now was that he did. It is true we decided against him, but he cannot take the benefit of that. His intention was to get the order below discharged, and he said so. But besides that he asked for leave to appeal. Leave for what? To appeal against the whole of the order of the Court below. He could not ask for or get that indulgence, except in the presence of all the parties to the order who would be affected by the appeal. The order below gave Mr. Woods' clients their costs, and the appellant asked to discharge that order with costs. Mr. Woods' clients are entitled to be heard on that. The appellant could not have brought on his appeal in the absence of Mr. Woods' clients, and, in my opinion, he cannot be better off because Mr. Woods' clients have appeared gratis without being served. If the appellant had given a limited notice of appeal, that might have made a difference. The appellant's notice of appeal was utterly irregular, and under the circumstances it appears to me that Mr. Woods' clients are entitled to appear gratis, and the appellant must pay their costs of appearance.

COTTON, L.J., and BOWEN, L.J., concurred.

THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY v. LOOG.

Practice—Shorthand Notes of Evidence and Judgment—Printed Copies—Rules of the Supreme Court, 1875, Order VI., Schedule (Costs)—Agreement to share Printer's Bill.

Under the common order of the Court of Appeal giving the costs of the appeal and of the shorthand-writer's notes of the evidence and of the judgment in the Court below, the solicitor of the successful party, when the shorthand notes have been printed in the first instance, is entitled on taxation of the costs to be allowed, in addition to the printer's bill, 3d. per folio for one printed copy of the shorthand notes of the evidence supplied to each of his counsel on the appeal, and 3d. per folio for one printed copy of the shorthand notes of the judgment supplied for the use of each Judge of the Court of Appeal.

On the 14th of December, 1880, the order made by Bacon, V.C., in this action was, on the appeal of the defendant, discharged with costs, including "the costs of the shorthand-writer's notes of the evidence and judgment." The order as drawn up directed the defendant's costs of the action and of the appeal, "and of taking and transcribing and printing the shorthand notes of the evidence," to be taxed and set off against certain taxed costs of the plaintiffs'.

By arrangement between the solicitors of the plaintiffs and of the defendant, the shorthand notes of the evidence on the trial before Pacon, V.C., and of his judgment were taken, transcribed and printed, the plaintiffs paying five-eighths of the printer's bill, and the defendant paying the remaining three-eighths, which amounted to 198*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.*, and receiving twenty printed copies.

On the taxation under the order of the Court of Appeal, the plaintiffs' solicitors repaid the defendant's solicitors the 198*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.*; but they claimed in addition to be allowed and paid the profit charges (higher scale) allowed by the schedule to the Rules of the Supreme Court (Costs), under the title "Copies," for the printed copies of the evidence and judgment supplied to their counsel and the Judge of the Court of Appeal.

The following are the material portions of the Rules in question:—

"Where pursuant to Rules of Court any . . . . evidence is printed, the solicitor of the party printing shall be allowed for a copy for the printer . . . . at 4*d.* per folio.

"And for examining the proof print at 2*d.* per folio.

"And for printing, the amount actually and properly paid to the printer, not exceeding 1*s.* per folio.

"The solicitor for a party entitled to take printed copies shall be allowed for such number of copies as he shall necesor properly take, the amount he pay therefor.

n addition to the allowances for print-nd taking printed copies, there shall owed for such printed copies as may ecessary or proper for the following no other purposes (inter alia):—Of . . . evidence for the use of counsel urt . . . . at 3*d.* per folio.
uch additional allowances for printed s for the Court or Judge, and for el, are not to be made where written s have been made previously to print-nd are not in any case to be made than once in the progress of the ."

bster, Q.C., for the motion.—Under rder made by the Court of Appeal he rules, the defendant's solicitors are led to this allowance. Nothing turns be particular wording of the order . It was made in the common form. oubt it was expanded, but not suffi-ly, when it was drawn up; but it was ght at the time that it would include costs. The point is covered by the ion of the Court of Appeal in Henry zard (unreported). There the order e Court of Appeal gave the appellant costs of the shorthand-writer's notes mming-up, judgment and documents;" n taxation the same point arose—the hand notes had been printed—and a ar motion to the present was made in that case, and the Court of Appeal gave directions to the Taxing Master to allow the costs of the copies supplied to counsel and to the Court at the prescribed rate.

Rigby, Q.C., and Candy, for the respondents.—The question is, what does "costs of the shorthand-writer's notes of the evidence" mean? As a rule the costs of the shorthand notes are not allowed, but when necessary the Court allows them, but they must be asked for at the time. Here they ask, in addition to the printer's bill, to be paid 3*d.* a folio for each copy of the shorthand notes of the evidence and judgment given to their three counsel and to the three Judges, in all six copies—that amounts to nearly 500*l.*, as the shorthand notes were very bulky. It was never intended that they should under the order make a profit of this kind out of the copies furnished to them. They are not entitled to more than the three-eighths of the printer's bill, which we have repaid to them. The rule does not apply where the solicitor has not paid for the printing; and even if he has, he is only entitled to one copy. They have paid nothing for the printing. If there has been a slip in drawing up the order, it is their own slip, and will at any rate affect the costs of this application.

Webster, Q.C., in reply.—It is not a question of printing. But if it were, we also printed, because we paid three-eighths of the printer's bill originally. For convenience they did all the printing. They printed for us. The real question is, whether under the rules the defendant's solicitors are entitled to this particular remuneration. I submit they are solicitors of a "party entitled to take printed copies," and, if so, they come under the rules in question.

JESSEL, M.R.—I think, in the first place, there has been a slip in drawing up the order, and I have no doubt the slip occurred in this way—that the clerk who drew up the order thought he would expand it and get a better order than the common order, whereas he has made it worse. If he had stuck to the words of the order as made by the Court of Appeal, this difficulty would not have arisen. I propose, therefore, to put the slip right.

The order will be in the common form, and the common form should be, costs of the appeal and of the shorthand notes of the evidence and judgment.

Then we direct the Taxing Master to allow the costs at 3*d.* per folio (that is, the higher scale) for the evidence supplied for the use of counsel, but none for the Judges.

Then the last point is as to the costs of this application. On the one hand I am satisfied that this slip was caused originally by the over-anxiety of Mr. Webster's clients to get all the costs they could, and they have improved the order so as to get less than they were entitled to. On the other hand this application was resisted altogether by the respondents, and I think they have failed on the merits to a very great extent, and that the fair order to make on this application will be, no costs on either side.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think that will be right. I will only add this to what the Master of the Rolls has said. When the parties agreed that the shorthand-writer's notes should be taken and paid for between them in certain proportions, the object of that was that they should be taken for the use of both parties in the litigation; but that agreement did not extend to the subsequent user of the copies. It did not provide for that either one way or the other. They are outside that agreement altogether. The moment the Court ordered that the costs of the shorthand notes should be allowed, it appears to me that Mr. Webster's clients brought themselves within the words of the rules relating to costs which have been referred to. Those rules are divided in this way. First of all, they talk about the allowances made to the solicitor for the party entitled to take printed copies, and then come some provisions applicable to the solicitors of both parties, both for printing and taking and using copies; and I think these costs come under the last head.

It appears to me, therefore, that unless something passed which would exclude the charges which are contended for by Mr. Webster, the order ought to be so worded as to include them; and I think the common order giving costs of the shorthand notes of the evidence means the costs of "taking, transcribing, printing and using" them. The order as drawn up has been amplified, and has been made to express unnecessarily, probably, the costs of taking and transcribing and printing the notes, but has left out "using." Of course if the word "using" had been put in, it would have been all right; but it is because some words have been put in and others left out that the difficulty has arisen, and the right way will be to modify it in the way suggested by the Master of the Rolls. The amount will be, of course, for the Taxing Master.

BOWEN, L.J. — I am of the same opinion.

Webster, Q.C.—By the direction to the Taxing Master to allow the copies for counsel, does your Lordship mean the copies in the Court below—not in the Court of Appeal?

JESSEL, M.R.—Only one set, and as to the judgment only one set. We give the costs of the shorthand notes of the evidence as regards counsel, and the costs of the judgment as regards the Court; but only one set.

Webster, Q.C.—I quite follow your Lordship.

Rigby, Q.C.—I do not think I misunderstand what is intended by "one set"—your Lordship means that as there were three counsel there would be three copies?

JESSEL, M.R.—Yes; and three copies of the judgment for the Judges; so that they will be allowed for three copies of the evidence and three copies of the judgment.

Solicitors—Michael Abrahams, Son & Co., for appellant; G. D. Wansborough, for respondents.

Francis v. Hayward, App.

and so far they ought to be held included. Then it is described as bounded on the east by (inter alia) the defendant's property. But this general description of the boundaries does not cut down the effect of the prior description. When, after a description of a property, it is stated that on one side it is bounded by a certain other property, and it appears that it is not so bounded for every inch, there is an inaccuracy in the statement of the boundary; but this is not enough to exclude what is not so bounded if it appears from the evidence to have been part of the property dealt with, and the previous description of that property is sufficient to include it.

Practice—Discovery—Patent Action—Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 83), s. 41.

The ordinary rules of discovery apply to patent actions.

Therefore, where in an action for the infringement of a patent the defendants had delivered particulars of objections, including a statement that the inventions claimed by the plaintiff had, prior to the date of the letters patent, been used at places named, and the plaintiff desired to obtain the names and addresses of the persons using at those places the inventions,—

Held, that the plaintiff was not bound to apply for further particulars, but could apply for leave to administer interrogatories.

Held, also, following Finnegan v. James (44 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 185; Law Rep. 19 Eq. 72) and Crossley v. Tomey (Law Rep. 2 Ch. D. 533), that the plaintiff was, notwithstanding the language of the Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852, s. 41, entitled to the information as to names and addresses.

This was an action brought in the District Registry of Manchester in respect of alleged infringements by the defendants of the plaintiff's patent. The defendants had delivered their statement of defence, and with it particulars of objections, including a statement that the invention claimed by the plaintiff had been used prior to the date of the letters patent at certain places named. The pleadings having been closed, leave was obtained by the plaintiff from the District Registrar to administer interrogatories asking for the names and addresses of the persons who had been alleged to have used the invention at the places referred to in the particulars.

The defendants appealed from the order.

Clement Higgins, for the defendants.—The Court has no jurisdiction in a patent action to give leave to administer interrogatories directed to matters specified in the particulars of objections. The proper course for the plaintiff was to have applied under the Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852, s. 41, for an order for the delivery of further and better particulars—Bovill v. Smith (1) and Daw v. Eley (2). The plaintiff, moreover, is not entitled to discovery as to the names and addresses of the persons who have used the inventions—Flower v. Lloyd (3).

Chadwyck Healey, for the plaintiff.—Neither the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, nor the Judicature Acts except patent actions from the ordinary rules as to discovery; nor can the plaintiff's rights in this respect be said to be limited by an Act passed prior to those Acts. The old rule of the Court of Chancery that a plaintiff has a right to the discovery of the case on which the defendant relies has by the Judicature Acts been extended to all actions, and the practice has been assimilated—Saunders v. Jones (4) and Eade v. Jacob (5). That the names and addresses of the persons using the inventions must be given has already been decided—Finnegan v. James (6) and Crossley v. Tomey (7).

A further report of Flower v. Lloyd (3) occurs in the Solicitors' Journal in 1876, vol. xx. p. 860, where it appears that the defendants having, in accordance with the order made by the Appeal Court, delivered better particulars, Field, J., sitting as vacation Judge, directed the defendants to answer the interrogatories as to names and addresses.

Clement Higgins, in reply.

CHITTY, J.—The first objection by the defendant to the order made by the District Registrar is that there is no jurisdiction to order the defendant in a patent action to answer interrogatories, and that the right course is to proceed by particulars only. Now the Patent Law Amendment Act was passed in 1852, at a time when there was no power at common law to interrogate parties. The 41st section of that Act gives directions as to the delivery of particulars. That Act refers to a common law action. Then comes the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which confers a right of discovery in common law actions. But the Judicature Acts again have further extended discovery and assimilated the practice throughout the Divisions of the High Court without excepting any action. I must, therefore, hold on general principles that the plaintiff in a patent action is entitled to interrogate the defendant, and, vice versa, that the defendant can interrogate the plaintiff with reference to matters which are or ought to be covered by the particulars delivered.

With reference to the second objection of the defendants, that the plaintiff is entitled to have set out in the particulars only the places where the inventions have been used. The case upon which they chiefly rely as supporting their contention is Flower v. Lloyd (3). The Court of Appeal in that case struck out from an order of Vice-Chancellor Bacon words containing a direction to defendants to furnish the plaintiffs with the names and addresses of the persons by whom the prior user had been alleged, and limited the order to a direction that the defendants should furnish further and better particulars as to the places at or in which and in what manner the plaintiffs' patent was known or publicly practised in England prior to a certain date. The Court said that under that order as varied the defendants would still be required to furnish full and sufficient particulars.

The same case again came on before Mr. Justice Field, sitting as vacation Judge; and it is stated in the Solicitors' Journal, 1876, vol. xx. p. 860, that the defendants having, in pursuance of the order of the Appeal Court, delivered an amended notice of objections, stating therein that the process patented had before the date of the patent been used by three persons, whose names and addresses they gave, "and by other persons in Birmingham and London," Mr. Justice Field said that if the defendants knew that the process had been used by other persons in London and Birmingham besides those specified, they must have known the persons by whom it had been used, and must give more specific information. He did not decide that they need give the names and addresses, but that they must give fair information. The result was that he ordered the defendants to furnish as further and better particulars the names and addresses of the persons by whom the prior user was charged to have been made. Therefore I am of opinion that the plaintiff may in a proper case obtain the names and addresses of the persons who are alleged by the defendant to have made prior user. Moreover, the very question has twice come before the Court. In Finnegan v. James (6), before the Master of the Rolls, interrogatories had been filed requiring the defendants to set forth full particulars specifying the names and addresses of persons by whom, as well as the places where, the invention was alleged to have been used; and the defendant declined to set forth the particulars, on the ground that the matters enquired after related exclusively to the defence. When the case came on it was pointed out that the plaintiff had not furnished particulars of breaches. The Master of the Rolls allowed the objection, and made an order directing the plaintiff to deliver particulars of the breaches com plained of; but also directing the defendant to put in a better answer to the interrogatories within fourteen days from the delivery of the breaches. In Crossley v. Tomey (7) Vice-Chancellor Malins compelled a further answer to an interrogatory enquiring the names and addresses of persons by whom the prior user was made. It seems to me that these two decisions are binding on me. I may state, further, that in both these cases the defendants were required to answer interrogatories, notwithstanding the existence of the right, which, as was conceded in one of them, namely, Finnegan v. James (6), enables either party to require particulars of breaches or objections.

(7) Law Rep. 2 Ch. D. 533.

It seems to me that the order of the Registrar was right. The case, however, is a peculiar one, and I shall therefore order the costs of the summons to be costs in the cause.

Covenant running with the Land.

Semble—A covenant to build on request does not run with the land; but the liability to allow others to enter and fulfil such covenant does.

The plaintiff, as vendor, claimed specific performance of a contract for the sale of the fee-simple of a plot of ground and dwelling-house thereon, subject to a yearly rent-charge of 84*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.*, reserved by a deed, dated in 1863, made between Sir J. Anson of the one part and C. J. Samuels of the other part, and to the provisoes and covenants therein contained. The plaintiff, in the alternative, claimed damages. The defendant set up the defence of misrepresentation, and by counter-claim sought rescission.

One of the alleged misrepresentations was to the effect that the deed of 1863 contained no unusually restrictive covenants. The Court held that plaintiff's solicitors had made a representation to such effect.

The deed contained the following covenant:—"That the grantee, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, will at his own expense, at the request of the grantor, his heirs or assigns, to the satisfaction of the surveyor of the grantor, his heirs or assigns, erect and build on the plot of land one or more good and substantial house or houses, which with the buildings at the date of the deed erected thereon should be of the clear yearly tenantable value of 40*l.* or upwards." There was evidence that it was usual for similar deeds relating to property in the district of Manchester, where the property in question was situated, to contain a covenant to build within a limited time, generally two years.

Everitt, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the plaintiff.—The covenant was not unusually restrictive, it was the kind of covenant to be expected in such a deed. But if it were, the defendant was not affected by it, for it was not enforceable against an assignee—Haywood v. The Brunswick Permanent Building Society (1) and The London and South Western Railway Company v. Gomm (2).

[FRY, J.—Might not the purchaser, though he was not forced to fulfil the covenant, be compelled to allow the covenantor to fulfil it, and enter for that purpose—Tulk v. Moxhay (3).]

Glasse, Q.C., Cookson, Q.C., and G. A. Watson, for the defendant.—The covenant is unusually restrictive, for not only does the evidence shew that in the district such covenants are usually limited to two years, but the forms in the precedent books for such deeds limit the period to that time. The covenant is one that runs with the land—Cook v. Chilcott (4). The Court will not in such a doubtful case force the title on the purchaser.

Andrew v. Aitken.

FRY, J. said,—With regard to the covenant to build an additional house or buildings at any time, at the request of Sir John Anson, the evidence of the defendant goes into particulars, and it tends to shew that the ordinary covenant with regard to building where a ground rent is reserved is, that the grantee shall build within a definite period of no long duration, generally two years at the most; and I have come to the conclusion that this covenant, which was indefinite in point of duration, was not a usual covenant. If it was not usual was it unusually restrictive? It appears to me that it was. If the usual covenant had been there the result would have been that the person who bought the house, subject to the rent-charge reserved in 1863, would have been able to use all the land not occupied by the house in any manner which he might think convenient, whereas persons buying under the covenant actually contained in this deed of 1863 took it subject to an obligation that it should become the foundation of another house and other buildings at any time Sir J. Anson might require. Therefore I think the user of the land was restricted in a manner which was not common with regard to houses which had been erected under grants seventeen years old.

But then the plaintiff says, even if that were so the defendant is not hurt, because, under the law of the Court, especially as recently expounded by the Court of Appeal, it is plain that he could not be called upon to put his hand into his pocket and lay money out on building a house. That may well be. It is a point which I am not called on to determine. I do not express the least doubt that the plaintiff is right in that contention; but that does not, in my judgment, determine the matter. It may well be that, although the plaintiff could not well be called upon to build the house, he might be called upon to allow the house to be built, and the difficult question might arise with regard to the extent to which that liability existed. He might be harassed with an action founded on Spencer's Case (6); he might be harassed with an action founded on Cook v. Chilcott (4), which, though undoubtedly more or less infringed upon by the recent decision in the Court of Appeal, was not expressly overruled by it. He might be harassed with an action founded on the fact that he had agreed to take subject to the covenant, and it might be that, taking subject to the covenant, he might be liable to allow the house to be built if the covenantor in the original contract preferred to build rather than pay damages to Sir J. Anson. Those appear to me to be questions of some nicety, and therefore questions from which the defendant might fairly desire to protect himself. I hold, therefore, that in the particular case there has been misrepresentation. The plaintiff, therefore, in my judgment fails; and I think the defendant is entitled, on the ground of mistake induced by the plaintiff, to the rescission of the contract, and therefore the plaintiff fails not only as regards specific performance but also as regards damages.

In re HONE'S TRUSTS.

Will—Construction—Gift to Daughter—Gift to Child—Direction to settle—Death of Child in Lifetime of Testator, leaving Children—Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 33.

A testator gave his residue to trustees in trust for his eight children in equal shares, and directed that the share of his daughter, Mrs. B., if she should survive him, should be deemed to be part of the funds comprised in her marriage settlement and subject to the trusts thereof. Mrs. B. died in the lifetime of the testator, leaving children who survived him:—Held, that, as by the operation of the 33*rd section of the Wills Act Mrs. B. must be taken to have survived the testator, her share must be paid to the trustees of her settlement.*

The Rev. R. B. Hone, by his will dated the 9th of April, 1871, gave his residuary estate to trustees upon trust for his eight children therein named in equal shares; and he directed that the share of his daughter, Mrs. Bathurst, in case she should survive him, should be deemed and taken to be part of the funds comprised in her marriage settlement, dated the 27th of February, 1867, and be subject to the trusts thereof or to such of the said trusts as at the time of the testator's decease should be subsisting or capable of taking effect, and that the receipt of the trustees or trustee for the time being of that settlement to whom the share should in that event be transferred and paid should be a good discharge.

Mrs. Bathurst died in April, 1876, leaving children who were alive at the death of the testator, which took place in May, 1881. The trustees of the will paid Mrs. Bathurst's share into Court, and this was a petition presented by her husband, who had taken out administration to her estate, for payment of the fund to him as his wife's legal personal representative.

Maclean, for the petitioner.

[PEARSON, J.—If the husband had died in the testator's lifetime, and the wife had survived the testator, must not her share have been settled?]

Yes, I think so.

[PEARSON, J.—Under section 33 of the Wills Act the bequest is to take effect as if she survived the testator. Must not she then be taken for all the purposes of the will to have survived him so as to make the directions for settlement apply?]

In Pearce v. Pearce (1), Kindersley, V.C., said: "The effect of the 33rd section of the Wills Act was simply to prolong her life by a fiction for a particular purpose, namely, that the legacy might not lapse; but certainly not for any other purpose."

[PEARSON, J.—But the Vice-Chancellor there held that the covenant on which this question arose applied to an actual coverture, and that even if the Act had prolonged the coverture it would have been a fictitious one only, and not within the covenant. Here, the life being prolonged in order that the legacy may not lapse, the trust attached to the legacy goes with it.]

(1) 32 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 359.

I submit not. The testator must be presumed to know the effect of section 33, and he might have provided that if the legacy took effect under that section it should be settled, but he has not done so. His words ought to be taken in their proper natural sense as applying to an actual survival, and not to a survival by fiction of law; and as a matter of fact Mrs. B. did not survive the testator. Winter v. Winter (2) explains the policy and operation of the section, and that operation should not be extended.

W. Pearson, Q.C., and Cadman Jones, for the trustees, were not called upon.

PEARSON, J.—The 33rd section of the Wills Act enacts that if any person, being a child or other issue of the testator, to whom any property shall be devised or bequeathed shall die in the lifetime of the testator, leaving issue living at his death, "such devise or bequest shall not lapse, but shall take effect as if the death of such person had happened immediately after the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will." No one contends that such contrary intention does appear in this will. I must, therefore, read it as if Mrs. Bathurst had survived the testator; and it contains a provision that in case she survives him her share is to be brought into and to be subject to the trusts of her settlement. I am, however, in effect asked to say that, although she is to be taken to have survived the testator, she is entitled to her share for her own absolute use instead of its being subject to the trusts of her settlement. I think, however, that I should be defeating both the object and intention of the testator were I thus to hold. I am here to consider Mrs. Bathurst as having survived, and in that case the clause in the will comes into immediate and most beneficial operation. The money must therefore be paid to the trustees of the settlement.

BACON, V.C. 1883. Feb. 14, 15. } GENERAL DISCOUNT AND CREDIT COMPANY v. GLEGG.

Mortgage — Commission—Higher Rate of Interest—Penalty.

Railway contractors applied to the plaintiffs for advances, which the plaintiffs agreed to make by instalments repayable six months after the date of advance, at a rate of interest varying with the bank rate, with a further provision that the contractors should pay commission at the rate of one per cent. for every month or part of a month that might elapse between the due date and the date of the repayment of such instalment upon the whole amount of such instalment: —Held, that the stipulation for commission was an independent valid contract, and could not be relieved against as being in the nature of a penalty for non-punctual payment.

This was a foreclosure action brought by the plaintiffs as first mortgagees. The statement of claim stated that E. Clark and W. H. Punchard, being under a contract with the Buenos Ayres and Campana Railway Company to construct a railway for them, applied to the plaintiffs to advance sums of money from time to time, and in the first instance 400,000*l.*, which the plaintiffs agreed to do by the instalments and at the times mutually agreed upon, upon condition that the repayment of such instalments should be secured by the promissory notes or acceptances of the said E. Clark and W. H. Punchard, and that the said E. Clark and W. H. Punchard should pay to the plaintiffs interest at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum upon each and every of such instalments during such time as the bank rate for the time being should not exceed 4*l.* per cent., but that if the bank rate should at any time during the pendency of the loan rise above 4*l.* per cent. that then the said E. Clark and W. H. Punchard should pay to the plaintiffs additional interest at a rate, over and in addition to the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum, equal to the excess of the bank rate over 4*l.* per cent. for each and every portion of the time during which the said excess should continue, and that the plaintiffs should retain the said interest at 6*l.* per cent. per annum on each instalment, out of such instalments, and that the additional interest, if any, on each instalment should be paid to the plaintiffs when such instalments should become repayable—namely, six months from the date when the same should be advanced; and that if any instalment should not be repaid at the time it should become due the same should bear interest at the said rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum, and additional interest as therein set forth in the event of the said rise during the period of the said rise, until the same should be repaid, and also a commission of one per cent. for every month or part of a month that might elapse between the due date and the date of the repayment of such instalment upon the whole amount of such instalment; and by virtue of an indenture dated the 29th of September, 1874, made between the plaintiffs of the first part and the said E. Clark and W. H. Punchard of the second part, certain securities were transferred to the plaintiffs by way of collateral security for the repayment of 400,000*l.* and further advances. Further advances were made and further securities transferred to the plaintiffs. Messrs. Robartes, Lubbock & Co. and the Anglo-Italian Bank were second and third mortgagees. Messrs. Clark & Punchard became liquidating debtors, and Glegg was their trustee. Default had been made in the payment of the instalments due to the plaintiffs, and, in addition to principal and interest, it was stated that a sum of about 100,000*l.* was due to the plaintiffs as commission. The second and third mortgagees objected to the stipulation for commission as illegal.

Hemming, Q.C., and F. C. Norton, for the plaintiffs.—The stipulation is a distinct independent contract for payment of an increased rate of interest on the happening of a certain event, and is perfectly valid—Burton v. Slattery (1) and Herbert v. The Salisbury and Yeovil Railway Company (2). It makes no difference whether the increased rate is called "interest" or "commission." The cases in which a higher rate of interest has been relieved against as in the nature of a penalty are cases in which the provision was retrospective, not prospective.

Millar, Q.C., and McLaren, for Robartes, Lubbock & Co.—The stipulation is in the nature of a penalty. If there is default in payment of an instalment for one day, the commission would become payable for an entire month. That is not a covenant for payment of interest, but a penalty for non-punctual payment, irrespective of the time during which the instalment remains unpaid, and will be relieved against—Strode v. Parker (3), Hollis v. Wise (4) and Nicholls v. Maynard (5).

The authority of the old cases on this point is admitted by Jessel, M.R., in Wallis v. Smith (6). They also cited Thompson v. Hudson (7).

Hemming, Q.C., replied.

BACON, V.C.—It has been said in the course of the argument that this is the first time this point has been presented in its present shape, and I think that is quite accurate. I do not recollect having seen it before; but in its essence and in substance it is not a contract for paying additional interest, but it is a contract to protect the lenders against this, which might very well happen. The lender lends his money to enable a contractor to perform work at Buenos Ayres, for which he is to be paid from time to time as the work is completed. I do not say that is proved, but I assume that is so, the consequence of which would be that every month, or some other time, upon surveyors' certificates, the contractor would be in possession of money, and then his first duty would be to pay it. Suppose it suited his convenience to keep it in his pocket or to lend it at such a rate of interest as would be the interest obtainable at Buenos Ayres—twenty per cent. or twenty-five per cent. for aught I know; if he prefers to obtain that large rate of interest he runs the risk of not paying to the lender what he has promised to pay. It would be unjust and inequitable if there were any law that justified that procedure. I do not say that existed; but I mention it for the purpose of trying the real contract between the parties. In my opinion, the payment of the commission is a thing wholly separate from the original contract of lending and paying interest—I mean the interest at the rate stipulated. The rate was 6*l.* per cent., but if the fluctuation in the bank rate should bring the current interest above 4*l.* per cent., then they were to pay in addition to the 6*l.* per cent. such increase as should so happen. The contract to pay the commission is wholly separate from the interest; it is called by a separate name—whether an accurate name or not, it is the name the parties have adopted for themselves. It is said in effect—"If I do not pay the interest I shall then owe you, I will pay you one per cent. upon what I ought to have paid you until I do pay you." It does not come within any of the cases which have been mentioned. It is not within the reach of the cases in Vernon, nor within that rule which is recognised by the Master of the Rolls in the recent case, because it is a plain, distinct, separate, substantive undertaking to pay something in case he makes a certain default. That is not in the nature of a penalty; it is a separate independent agreement to pay one per cent. in a particular event which has happened, which it was in the power of the contractors to permit to happen or not. If I impute to the plaintiffs in this suit perfect knowledge of the law as it stood in the old cases, and by the Master of the Rolls recognised as existing law—if they had known that perfectly well they might have said, "I will not stipuwhere, whether existing at the time of his death or afterwards to be created, or otherwise for such objects of a charitable nature, and in such proportions and manner as his said wife and daughter or the survivor of them in their or her absolute and uncontrolled discretion should think fit. Nevertheless he thereby declared that the recommendation thereinbefore contained as to the disposition of his said net residuary personal estate was and should be precatory only, not imposing on his said wife and daughter Anna Brassey, or either of them, any legal or equitable obligation, condition, trust or election whatsoever, or interfering with their or her full and absolute right of property in relation thereto. And he declared that such recommendation was inserted inasmuch as he considered he had already amply provided for his said wife and daughter.

On the 5th of May, 1881, the testator died, and it became necessary to obtain the decision of the Court upon the question above stated, as well as upon certain other points which are immaterial for the present purpose.

It was agreed between the testator's widow and Lady Brassey that they should each be considered entitled to a moiety of the testator's estate. Such moiety was largely over 500*l.* in value.

Macnaghten, Q.C., and C. C. Tucker, for the trustees of the marriage settlement.—Whatever may have been the testator's intention, it is clear that in law the precatory trust leaves Lady Brassey in the same position as if the gift had been to her absolutely without any recommendation attached to it. And if Lady Brassey relies on the words "separate use" as taking the gift out of the operation of the covenant in her marriage settlement to settle after-acquired property, her advisers must cite In re Mainwaring's Settlement (1) in support of their contention. But that case is not usually considered good law—see Davidson's Conveyancing Precedents (2); and the better opinion is that those words leave the property subject to the covenant.

Ince, Q.C., and E. Hume, for Sir Thomas and Lady Brassey.—Our clients wish, if possible, to give effect to the testator's wishes, which will obviously be defeated if this property is to be settled. The whole scheme of the will supports our contention when taken in connection with words of separate use. In re Mainwaring's Settlement (1) is a decision in our favour, and has stood for many years; Brooke v. Keith (3) and Coventry v. Coventry (4) are in our favour.

Prior, for Mrs. Alnutt.

Romer, Q.C., and F. C. Norton, for the trustees of the will.

CHITTY, J., said that upon the will it was clear that the testator's recommendation amounted merely to an expression of wish; and continued—

The result is that there is an expression of wish on the testator's part which has no binding effect in any Court of law or equity. The property is therefore the property of Lady Brassey. Has she entered into any obligation with regard to property of this amount? She has. She has done so by a covenant in her marriage settlement. Upon the construction of the will it is clear the testator's intention is only to make a gift to the person; and then comes the covenant by that person, which is the obligation she has entered into with regard to the property comprised in that gift.

The question is, whether there is any authority contrary to that view. In re Mainwaring's Settlement (1) has been referred to in support of the view placed before the Court on behalf of Lady Brassey.

I should say that Lady Brassey herself appears to be desirous of giving effect, if she has power to do so, to the wishes which are expressed, though in no legally binding manner, in the testator's will.

In In re Mainwaring's Settlement (1) there was an assignment of the after-acquired property by the wife, and Vice-Chancellor Sir William Page Wood held that that was equivalent to a contract on her part. In his judgment he examines the will and codicils, and he says that he finds (at least that is the way I understand the judgment) they had been so framed that the covenant would not apply to the property given by the will. With reference to the second codicil, whereby the testatrix directed her trustees to pay such part of the legacy to her daughter as she might require "for her separate use independent of her husband, and to be free in all respects from his debts, control and engagements," the Vice-Chancellor says this, "She therefore means to say, 'I do not intend this portion of my daughter's property to be comprised in her settlement; I intend that she shall take it upon this express condition, that it shall not be settled.'" I respectfully dissent from that proposition; and I think I ought on principle to dissent from it, if it is meant that I am to regard the testator's intention when it is expressed in some manner which is not legally binding. Taking the whole judgment together, I think the Vice-Chancellor intended to decide, as a question of construction of the will, that the gift was such that it did not fall within the scope of the covenant—in other words, that it did not fit the covenant. That may be treated as a question simply of construction of the will; and, if so, of course the decision does not bind me in any way. I am unable to appreciate, sitting here judicially, the grounds of the judgment as stated, and they seem to me to be not consistent with the true principle on which cases of this kind ought to be decided.

Another case which has been mentioned is that of Brooks v. Keith (3), where the question had reference to certain property which was given in such a manner as to render it, according to Vice-Chancellor Kindersley's judgment, doubtful whether, if the property were held to be included in the covenant, it would not be forfeited under the terms of the will. He says, "If the Court in this suit were to direct an assignment, the question would arise whether such an assignment would come within the meaning of this clause—'sell, assign, &c.' I should be inclined to think that it would not; and that by the clause was meant such an alienation as would deprive the parties of the property."

The Vice-Chancellor does not act upon that view; on the contrary, he seems to have grounded his decision upon the view that the assignment would create a forfeiture. I may say that I should have no doubt that if the will is so framed that the covenant cannot operate upon the property, it does not operate upon it. If the only effect of the covenant would be to say that if there is an alienation by the covenant within the meaning of the term used in the will, that is a forfeiture of the legacy, the Court would probably hold that the covenant did not apply, because to attempt to make it apply would only be doing an idle thing. The property could not fall within the settlement, because the covenant would create a forfeiture. If that is the ground, as I rather think it was, of the Vice-Chancellor's decision, I think it is a decision entirely consistent with principle. There is another ground which is not noticed in the judgment, though it is noticed in the text-books with reference to this question—namely, that the covenant there was so framed as to make it apply only as far as the husband was interested in the property. I take it that, upon that ground alone, although not referred to in the judgment, the decision might be supported. At any rate, I do not consider there is any principle enunciated by either of the two decisions to which I have referred that is opposed to the conclusion at which I have arrived; and I therefore hold that Lady Brassey's moiety of the residue is included in the covenant contained in her marriage settlement.

Jones v. Green (37 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 603; Law Rep. 5 Eq. 555) observed upon.

Further consideration.

R. Freer died on the 20th of January, 1881, having by his will, made in October, 1878, bequeathed all his first preference bonds in the Grand Trunk of Canada Railway Company (except six bonds of 100*l.* each) to his son, the defendant J. H. Freer, for life, with remainder to his children; and having devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate to his son, the plaintiff, and to the defendants J. H. Freer and Mrs. Caroline Ann Landor, in certain proportions.

In June, 1879, the testator was duly found a lunatic by inquisition, and in January, 1880, the plaintiff was appointed committee of his estate.

Under an order made in the lunacy, 2,830*l.* first preference stock in the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada was sold, on the ground that the investment was unsafe, and the proceeds were, on the 4th of January, 1881, paid into Court to the credit of the lunatic to an account entitled "Proceeds of the sale of stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada," and invested in Consols, which were carried to the same credit and account.

In March, 1881, this action was commenced for administration of the testator's estate, and by an order in lunacy the fund was carried over to the credit of the action to an account entitled as the account in the lunacy had been entitled.

The question now argued was, whether the effect of the sale in the lunacy was to work an ademption of the specific legacy of the Grand Trunk stock.

Ince, Q.C., and Byrne, for the plaintiff. —The same principle will apply here as in Oxenden v. Lord Compton (1)—namely, that there is no equity as between real and personal representatives after the death of a lunatic to have the property which was altered by the Court restored to its original character. The Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 70), s. 119, has made some alteration in the law as regards real estate, but the principle of the former law still applies to personal estate. Brown v. Gumbridge (2) and Jones v. Green (3) exactly cover this case, the latter being a case in which shares were sold under an order in lunacy; and Foster v. Foster (4) and In re Barker (5) support the proposition that if you are to have a reconversion you must shew an equity for it, and that the earmarking of the money in the lunacy is not intended to alter any rights.

Romer, Q.C., and Langworthy, for J. H. Freer.—The question of ademption or no ademption is one of intention in the testator—Partridge v. Partridge (6); and it cannot be said that the testator in this or any other case where there is a sale in lunacy had any intention at the time of sale. Ex parte Haycock (7) shews that the Court will, if possible, avoid interfering with the lunatic's wishes as expressed by his will made while of sound mind; and it is clear from Jones v. Green (3) that the Lord Chancellor has power, by a declaration in lunacy, to avoid doing so. We submit, therefore, that this fund was carried over to an account which would earmark it for the very purpose of preserving the rights of the parties under the will intact. In In re Leeming (8) the Court shewed by its order that under such circumstances the real and personal representatives of a lunatic do not take the property as it is at the death of the testator.

It is clear that wrongful conversion will not work ademption—Jenkins

Macnaghten, Q.C., and C. W. Greenwood, for Mrs. Landor and her husband.

CHITTY, J., after stating the facts as above, continued:—Under these circumstances the question arises whether the legacy has not been adeemed. I use the word "adeemed" because it is the common term, though a distinction is made by the text-writers between ademption and extinction. But there is no distinction for the purposes of the case before me. The question is, whether anything was done in the lunacy to prevent the proceeds of the stock from passing in the same way as the stock itself.

The nature of the jurisdiction in lunacy is well explained in Oxenden v. Lord Compton (1). It is only a power of administration; and even if the Court had in the present case directed that the proceeds of the stock should, for all purposes, represent the stock, I am not prepared to say that such a direction would have had any effect in altering the rights of the parties. However, the effect of the order as it stands is to leave the question open. It is said that Lord Justice Giffard, when Vice-Chancellor, made, in the case of Jones v. Green (3), some observations which shew that the Lord Chancellor, entrusted in lunacy, can give a direction in the order for sale that the proceeds of the property converted shall belong to the persons who would have been the owners of the property if it had remained unconverted. There is no doubt a statement to that effect in the judgment, but no authority has been produced to me which justifies that dictum; and, moreover, against that dictum I must cite the dictum of Lord Justice Cotton in In re Barker (5), where he says, "With regard to the payment into Court in the lunacy, without carrying it to a real estate account, that, in my opinion, ought not to alter the rights of the parties. The money must be dealt with without reference to the account to which it has been carried, and as if there had been no such carrying over at all. Indeed, the carrying it to a real estate account would not alter the rights at all, but simply call the attention of the Court, when the money is paid out, to the fact that a question arises about it, and that instead of being, as apparently it is, cash, it is to be considered whether it does not still preserve the character of real estate." That is the opinion at which I have arrived upon the order before me; and, with great respect to Lord Justice Giffard, I think Lord Justice Cotton's dictum is to be preferred.

The general law upon the subject is clear. If the testator himself, not being a lunatic, had sold the stock, and placed the proceeds to a separate account in his books, with a memorandum that for all purposes the proceeds were to stand in the place of the stock, the Wills Act would have stood in the way, and the memorandum would not have affected the rights of parties inter se; and to my mind all that has been done in the present case under the Lunacy Jurisdiction amounts to nothing more than what I have stated, for the law places the estate of the lunatic in the same position as if there had been no lunacy, except for the 119th section of the Lunacy Regulation Act, which provides that the proceeds of land shall, notwithstanding its conversion, preserve the character of land, and belong to the same persons who would have been entitled to the land if there had been no conversion. [His Lordship read the section and continued:] Why was that provision made? There were found to be defects in the Lunacy jurisdiction, and therefore it was intended by the Legislature, by means of the Lunacy Regulation Act, to give the persons entrusted with lunatics a greater power than they formerly possessed. Accordingly, section 118 empowered the Lord Chancellor to order that moneys directed to be expended in improving the lunatic's land should be a charge on his interest in such land; and then section 119 went on to provide, in the terms I have read, for the destination of the proceeds of any land sold or otherwise disposed of in the lunacy. The decision in In re Leeming (8), so far as it requires explanation, may be explained by reference to the 118th section; but the case really explains itself. The order made in that case was that the amount due on a mortgage of real estate created by the lunatic's ancestor should be paid out of the fund in Court standing to the credit of the lunacy, this fund having arisen from the lunatic's personal estate; but the order was made without prejudice to the question how the mortgage debt ought ultimately to be borne. The order also directed the mortgage to be kept on foot. Upon the question reserved coming before the Court for decision, it was held that the mortgage being an incumbrance on the real estate, the mortgage debt ought to be raised out of the real estate. That case is no authority for the proposition contended for in this case by the specific legatee, and I therefore hold that there was an ademption of the stock sold in the lunacy. I accordingly give judgment in favour of the plaintiff. I regret the result, but I consider the case to be plain.

EVANS v. JONES.

Partition — Sale — Pleading — Partition Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 40), ss. 3, 4 and 5—Duty of Plaintiff claiming Sale under section 3 to shew Grounds of Claim in his Pleading.

A plaintiff in a partition action, who claims to be entitled to a sale in lieu of a partition under section 3 of the Partition Act, 1868, ought by the allegations in his statement of claim clearly to set forth the grounds upon which he claims a sale, so that the defendant may be apprised under which section of the Act the plaintiff means to proceed.

A mere allegation that the property consisted of a copyhold messuage and about eleven acres of land was held not sufficient to shew that the plaintiff claimed a sale under section 3, so as to preclude the defendant from purchasing the plaintiff's share pursuant to section 5.

This was an action for sale or partition of a copyhold messuage and lands known as Cwmnant Farm, in the county of Monmouth, containing 10a. 2r. 31p. Previously to the year 1874, William Evans and Elizabeth Evans his wife, in her own right, were seised of these premises for a customary estate of inheritance in equal moieties.

Elizabeth Evans died in 1874, and on her death her moiety devolved, according to the custom of the manor, on her four surviving sons, the plaintiffs John Evans, Jonathan Evans and Philip Evans, and the defendant Joseph Evans, and her grandson the plaintiff William Evans the younger (the son of a deceased son of Elizabeth Evans), equally as co-heirs.

William Evans the elder died in March, 1875, having by his will devised his moiety to the defendant Joseph Evans upon trust for sale. The plaintiffs were some of the beneficiaries under this will.

In July, 1880, the defendant Joseph Evans purported to sell the entirety of the property to the defendant Rees Jones for 530*l.*

The plaintiffs brought this action claiming a sale in lieu of partition of the premises, and a division of the proceeds of sale amongst the persons entitled thereto, according to their respective rights, or, in the alternative, a partition; an account of rents and profits received by the defendant Joseph Evans (who was alleged to have been in possession), and payment of their shares of the rents, and also of the proceeds of sale of certain timber alleged to have been felled by him.

By an order made in the action on the 31st of August, 1881, a receiver of the rents and profits of the premises was appointed.

The plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, alleged the facts above set forth, and claimed the relief above stated; but there were no further allegations in the statement im shewing the particular grounds which the plaintiffs claimed a sale in f a partition.

e defendant Rees Jones, by his state- of defence, admitted the statements the nature of the property, and that beth Evans and her husband were ed thereto in moieties; and stated if the plaintiffs were entitled to the hares of the moiety of the premises they claimed by their pleadings, he rilling to purchase their said shares roper valuation, and submitted that, event of the Court holding that the iffs were so entitled, they nevertheless not entitled to any sale of the said ; and, by way of counter-claim as t the plaintiffs and his co-defendant, imed specific performance, with com- tion if necessary, of the agreement le of July, 1880.

by, Q.C., and Hadley, for the defen- Rees Jones.—The plaintiffs have not ir statement of claim alleged, nor hey made out, that the case is one within the 3rd section. The de- t is therefore entitled, if a sale is ordered in lieu of a partition, to purchase the shares of the plaintiffs pursuant to section 5.

KAY, J., said that if the plaintiffs' counsel desired it, he would grant leave to amend the statement of claim by inserting allegations to shew that a sale was more beneficial than a partition so as to bring the case within the 3rd section of the Act, and the hearing of action would then stand over so as to enable the parties to bring that issue before the Court.

Stallard, for the plaintiffs, declined this offer, and claimed that he was entitled on the present pleadings to a sale under section 3.

KAY, J.—This case involves a question of some little interest and importance. The action is under the Partition Act, 1868, asking a sale, in lieu of a partition, of a certain copyhold messuage and land containing about eleven acres, or for partition, and with the usual consequential directions. The statement of claim states as follows: [His Lordship referred briefly to the contents of the statement of claim, and continued:] Now there is no statement whatever that I can find in the statement of claim shewing under which of the sections of the Partition Act the sale is asked for; nor is there any statement that a sale would, by reason of the nature of the property, or of the number of the persons interested, or of the absence or disability of some of those parties or any other circumstance, be more beneficial than a partition, and there is nothing at all in the statement of claim, as I read it, to indicate under which section of the Partition Act the plaintiffs ask relief. The three material sections of the Act, sections 3, 4 and 5, have been very carefully considered, and in the case of Gilbert v. Smith (2) it was held that the sections are independent of each other, and relate altogether to different states of circumstances. Stating them shortly, they are these: [His Lordship read the sections, and continued:] Now these three sections have been held to be independent and separate sections, and certainly it seems to me very important that when a plaintiff comes into Court to ask for a sale by his statement of claim instead of a partition, he should indicate under which of these sections he asks for a sale. Different rights arise under them. If he only asks it on the ground that a sale is more beneficial than a partition, that is a question of fact which the defendant would have a right to contest and controvert. If he comes only under the 5th section, the other parties have a right to buy the shares of the party requesting a sale; and in this case in the defence the defendant assumes that the plaintiffs are asking for a sale under the 5th section, and offers to buy their shares. Now I stated that it seemed to me there was prima facie a possible case for proceeding under the 3rd section, because the property is only about eleven acres, and there are five persons interested, and the property includes a house—and a division of a house and eleven acres of land amongst five persons may be less beneficial than a sale and division of the proceeds. I do not know that it is, because everything might be altered by the nature of the property. It might be very valuable land indeed, and under the circumstances a partition might be more beneficial than a sale. The house may be, for anything I know, in a tumble-down condition, and not worth repairing. I do not know the facts. If the plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, had said that it would be more beneficial for the parties interested to make a sale, then the other parties would have known that they meant to proceed under section 3, and their attention would have been specially called to that issue, and it might be they would have adduced evidence upon it. If I were to say that under such pleadings as these the plaintiffs at the hearing would have an absolute right to say that a sale was more beneficial, and therefore ought to be made, it is obvious that the defendants might be misled extremely and taken in a trap. However, it is the duty of the Court, as it seems to me, to prevent that, and under such pleadings as these, raising a case which, if the Court knew all the facts, might bring the plaintiffs under the 3rd section, it is the duty of the Court to give leave to the plaintiffs to amend in such a way as will not prejudice the defendant in his defence, giving the defendant an opportunity of meeting that case after there has been an amendment clearly raising it on the pleadings. I have offered that, and it has been refused. Therefore it seems to me that I am bound to treat the case as not coming under that section, which would be to take the defendant entirely by surprise, but as a case under the 5th section; and I will order a sale, if it is requested, giving the defendant leave to buy under the 5th section.

Stallard, for the plaintiffs, thereupon claimed to have a partition, and KAY, J., accordingly gave the usual judgment for a partition.

Per COTTON, L.J.—The special Act empowering the promoters to take an incorporeal right as regards the land, in construing section 16 the word "land," as including hereditaments, ought to be taken to include the incorporeal right as an hereditament.

This was an appeal from an order of Chitty, J. (Nov. 29, 1882), granting an injunction to restrain the defendant company from entering or continuing upon certain lands of the plaintiffs, mentioned in a notice to treat served by the defendants upon the plaintiffs, dated the 12th of August, 1882, and from putting in force any of the powers of the Swindon and Cheltenham Railway Act, 1881, or of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in relation to the compulsory taking of the lands or any easement therein until the capital of the defendants should have been duly subscribed.

The defendant company was recently formed under a special Act of Parliament, called the Swindon and Cheltenham Extension Railway Act, 1881 (which, by section 2, incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, except where expressly varied) for the purposes of constructing (inter alia) a railway between Swindon and Cheltenham, and for other purposes. The capital of the company was 450,000*l.*, of which part only was subscribed.

The material sections of the special Act were as follows:—

Section 3. In this Act the several words and expressions to which meanings are assigned by the Acts wholly or partially incorporated herewith have the same respective meanings, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction.

Section 5. Subject to the provisions of this Act the company may make and maintain, in the line, and according to the levels shewn on the deposited plans and sections, the railways hereinafter described, with all proper stations, &c., and may enter upon, take and use such of the lands delineated on the said plans and described in the deposited books of reference as may be required for that purpose.

The railways hereinbefore referred to and authorised by this Act are :—

(1.) Railway No. 1, commencing in the parish of Swindon, in the county of Wilts, by a junction with the Swindon, Marlborough and Andover Railway at, &c., and terminating by a junction with the Banbury and Cheltenham Direct Railway, in the parish of Dowdeswell, in the county of Gloucester, at, &c.

Section 8. For the protection of the Great Western Company the following provisions shall have effect—that is to say:—

(1.) The company (Swindon and Cheltenham Extension Railway Company) shall not enter upon or interfere with the railway of the Great Western Company, or any of the lands or works of that company, or execute any works whatever, under, over or affecting the same, until the company shall have delivered to the Great Western Company plans and drawings of such intended works, and those plans and drawings shall have been approved in writing by the principal engineer for the time being of the Great Western Company, or in the event of his failure for fourteen days after the delivery of the plans and drawings, until the same shall have been approved by an engineer to be appointed on the application of the company by the Board of Trade; and all the intended works shall be executed by the company at their sole expense, in all things according to such approved plans and drawings, and to the reasonable satisfaction of the said engineer for the time being of the Great Western Company, or, in case of difference, by an engineer to be appointed by the Board of Trade.

(2.) In constructing the railways, or either of them, through or over the land and property of the Great Western Company, the company shall not deviate from the centre line shewn on the deposited plans where railway No. 1 crosses the railway of the Great Western Company to a greater extent, &c., without the previous consent in writing of that company under their common seal, and the said railway No. 1, where the same is intended to cross the main line to Bristol of the Great Western Railway, shall be carried over that railway and works by means of a bridge of one span, and the Great Western Company may at any time hereafter, upon giving one month's notice to the company of their intention to do so, and without being required to pay any sum of money for the easement which may be required for the purpose, construct and hereafter maintain an additional opening or openings under the railway; and the said railway No. 1 shall be carried under the main line to Gloucester of the Great Western Railway by an archway or bridge of not less than thirty feet in width between the parapets, and the company shall, within six months of being required to do so by the Great Western Company, construct and completely finish at their own expense, and hand over to the Great Western Company for the free and uninterrupted use of that company, an extension of the said archway or bridge upon one or both sides thereof as may be required by the Great Western Company, such extension to be in the aggregate of sufficient width to carry two additional lines of rails.

(3) provided for payment by the Swindon Company of the reasonable expenses incurred by the Great Western Railway for inspectors, watchmen, &c.

(4.) The archway or bridge and any extensions thereof constructed by the company, and the incidental works connected therewith for carrying railway No. 1 under the main line to Gloucester of the Great Western Railway, shall from and after the completion, and subject and without prejudice to the duty and obligation of the company for ever thereafter at their own expense to uphold and maintain the same in good and sufficient repair and otherwise in respect thereof, be the property of the Great Western Company and be deemed part of the structure of the said main line to Gloucester.

(5.) The company were required to pay the Great Western Railway the damage sustained by them.

(6) provided for the maintenance of works affecting the railways of the Great Western Company.

(7) provided against interference of the traffic on the railway of the Great Western Railway.

(8.) Except for the purposes of the crossings of railway No. 1, and for the junction of railway No. 3 with the main line to Bristol of the Great Western Railway, the company shall not take or acquire any rights over any land of the Great Western Railway Company, and, save as aforesaid, nothing in this Act contained shall extend to authorise or enable the company to take or enter upon or use, either temporarily or permanently, any of the lands of the Great Western Company, or to alter, vary or interfere with the railways, or either of them, of that company, or with any of the works thereof, further or otherwise than is necessary for the construction and maintenance of the railways by this Act authorised without the consent in writing in every instance for that purpose first had and obtained of the Great Western Company under their common seal. And with respect to any lands of the Great Western Company which the company are by this Act from time to time authorised to use, enter upon or interfere with, the company shall not purchase or take the same, but the company may purchase and take, and the Great Western Company shall sell or grant accordingly, an easement or right of using the same in perpetuity for the purposes for which, but for this enactment, the company might purchase and take the same.

(9.) If any dispute shall arise between the Great Western Company and the company respecting the matters and provisions aforesaid or any of them, such dispute shall be settled by an arbitrator, . . . the costs of such arbitration to be in the discretion of the arbitrator.

(10.) Nothing in this Act contained shall extend to prejudice, diminish, alter or take away any of the rights, privileges or powers of the Great Western Company otherwise than is by this Act expressly provided.

Section 24. The powers of the company for the compulsory purchase of lands for the purposes of this Act shall not be exercised after the expiration of three years from the passing of this Act.

Section 28. Persons empowered by the Lands Clauses Acts to sell and convey or release lands may, if they think fit, subject to the provisions of those Acts and of this Act, grant to the company any easement, right or privilege, not being an easement of water required for the purposes of this Act, in, over or affecting lands; and the provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts with respect to lands and rent-charges, as far as the same are applicable in this behalf, shall extend and apply to such grant, easements, rights and privileges as aforesaid respectively.

Section 31. If the railway is not completed within five years from the passing of this Act, then, on the expiration of that period, the powers by this Act granted to the company for making and completing the railway or otherwise in relation thereto shall cease to be exercised except as to so much thereof as is then completed.

The defendant company requiring to build the bridge over the Great Western Railway lands authorised by their Act on the 18th of March, 1882, sent drawings of their proposed works to the plaintiff company; but the plaintiff company failing for fourteen days to give their approval to the plans, they were, in pursuance of the provisions of the special Act, submitted to and approved by Captain Galton, the surveyor appointed by the Board of Trade.

On the 12th of August, 1882, the defendant company gave the plaintiff company notice that they required to purchase and take, and required the Great Western Railway Company to sell or grant accordingly, an easement or right of using in perpetuity, for the purposes and in the manner mentioned in the said Act, the lands following:—first, a certain portion or portions of the lands and hereditaments in the parish of Swindon described; and, secondly, a certain portion or portions of the lands and hereditaments situate in the parish of Lydiard Millicent; and the defendant company are willing and hereby offer to treat with the plaintiff company as to the purchase of the said easement or right in or over the said pieces of land, and to pay to the Great Western Railway Company such sum as shall be agreed upon between the said companies or shall be otherwise duly determined to be the sum payable by the defendant company to the plaintiff company in respect of the premises, and the defendant company offer to the plaintiff company the sum of 210*l.* for the purchase-money of the said easement or right.

The plaintiff company not sending in any claim, the defendant company subsequently, in pursuance of the 36th section of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, applied to the Board of Trade to appoint a surveyor to make the valuation prescribed by section 85 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in respect of the said easement or right. The Board of Trade, on the 7th of September, 1882, appointed J. H. Chilton such surveyor, who by writing, dated the 9th of October, 1882, determined the value to be the sum of 210*l.*

This sum was deposited by the defendant company in the Bank of England, and the bond required by the Act was sealed on the 30th of October, 1882.

The Great Western Company thereupon commenced this action, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendant company from entering or continuing upon the lands mentioned in the notice, and from putting in force any of the powers of their Act or the Lands Clauses Act relating to the compulsory taking of the lands or any easement therein, until the capital of the company should be subscribed.

The action was heard before Chitty, J., on the 29th of November, 1882.

CHITTY, J.—On behalf of the defendants it is said that, on the true construction of the 16th section of the Lands Clauses Act, the promoters of an undertaking are not authorised to take an easement, and the proposition may be accepted as a general one where the Lands Clauses Act is incorporated in a special Act without the special Act going on to authorise the taking of easements. It has been decided for more than a quarter of a century, in the case of Pinchin v. The London and Blackwall Railway Company (1), that a railway company or the promoters of an undertaking cannot take a mere easement in the lands—that is, the promoters are not authorised to take an easement to be created de novo out of lands, as by making a tunnel, and saying they only require the easement of passing through that excavation in the earth which is thus made. It is not intended to be asserted in support of this proposition that the promoters of the undertaking cannot take an easement where there is a subsisting easement in the land which they are authorised to take. Of course where they take the land they take all subsisting easements which at the time affected the land, and extinguish those easements necessarily because they take the land itself, the fee-simple, and all the rights which are involved in the fee-simple. In the present case it is not necessary to say whether this which is called in the 8th sub-section an easement would be a common law easement or not, because it has been held that Parliament can create that which is not an easement known to the law at all. But for the purposes of this judgment I accept the proposition that this is an easement. But it is an easement on the face of it of a special character. It is an easement, or right (to use the language of the 8th sub-section) of using the same, that is, the land in perpetuity.

I turn to the Lands Clauses Act for the purpose of mentioning one or two sections. The recital I need not read, but I refer to it. The first section enacts: [reads it.] And in the 5th section, which relates to the form in which parts and portions of the general Act may be incorporated with the special Act, I find a provision towards the close that "thereupon all the clauses and provisions of this Act with respect to the matter so incorporated shall, save so far as they shall be expressly varied or excepted by such Act from part of such Act, and such Act shall be construed as if—" What?—"as if the substance of such clauses and provisions were set forth therein with reference to the matter to which such Act shall relate." The special Act is, therefore, a composite enactment and framed in this way: certain special provisions are inserted therein, and as part of the Act the Lands Clauses Act, subject to the modification which I have mentioned, is incorporated, and forms part and has to be construed of course with reference to the special provisions of the special Act.

(1) 5 De Gex, M. & G. 851; 1 Kay & J. 34; 24 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 417.

Now the principles of construction applicable to such an Act as this have been clearly laid down in the case of The Metropolitan Railway v. Sharpe (2). This was originally a decision of Mr. Justice Manisty, which was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, and again affirmed in the House of Lords. The point there was, whether the 34th section, with regard to the costs of the arbitration, applied or not under these circumstances. There was a special mode of arbitration, for the purpose of ascertaining certain compensation to be paid, provided by the special Act, and the language of the 34th section did not fit in precisely with the wording of the special Act. All the Courts held that the 34th section must be read with such necessary modifications as made it applicable to the costs of the arbitration specially provided for by the special Act; and Lord Selborne, in his speech addressing the House of Lords, at page 432 (2), said: "Now, my Lords, let us consider what would happen if you did not apply those clauses. If you did not apply the 34th section, there would be in this case an unexplained departure from the universal principle, founded not upon any arbitrary policy, but upon natural reason and justice, according to which the Legislature has been accustomed in Acts belonging to the class of which this is one to provide, that if compulsory powers are exercised against the owners of property for some object considered to be of sufficient importance to justify it, the costs either shall necessarily be, or at least in the judgment and discretion of some authority trusted by the Legislature may be, paid so as to indemnify the person against whom those compulsory powers are exercised." And a little lower down, at page 433, he says, "Of course there can be no question that if the Legislature had not provided for costs in such a case a Court of Justice could not do so; but in construing Acts of Parliament of this kind, and adjusting the general provisions of the general Act to the particular provisions of the special Act, considerations of reason and justice, and the universal analogy of such provisions in similar Acts of Parliament, are proper to be borne in mind, and ought to have much weight and force."

I stay for one moment to apply those observations to the 16th section of the Lands Clauses Act. The substance of that section is to require in a case such as the present, that before it shall be lawful to put in force any powers of the Act or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith in relation to the compulsory taking of land for the purpose of the undertaking, the whole of the capital is to be subscribed. That appears to me to be a general principle of legislation with regard to this subject. Parliament investigates the nature of the proposed undertaking, and decides that it is a matter of public utility, and therefore confers on the promoters of the undertaking a power to take lands compulsorily; but this provision is intended to secure the landowner and the owner of property which is sought to be taken compulsorily. Parliament investigates the nature of the undertaking with a view to ascertain whether the capital is or is not sufficient for the purpose of purchasing property and executing the works, and having decided that in the affirmative it permits the undertakers to put in force the compulsory powers which it confers upon them. The owner of the property is thus protected in two ways:—first, there is a fund provided for the payment of the compensation to him for his property which may be so taken; and, secondly, he is not compelled to part with his land or his property until there has been subscribed a capital sufficient for executing the whole of the undertaking—otherwise his land might be taken when only a portion of the work could be executed. I say that appears to me to be a fair explanation of the general principle embodied in this 16th clause.

Now applying the principle which I have thus shortly stated to the particular enactment before me, I have no hesitation in saying that I must read the term "lands" in the 16th section so as to make it applicable to the case before me. The defendant company have the right of taking an easement or a right to use the Great Western Company's lands in perpetuity, and it seems to me, on the proper construction of the Act of Parliament before me, or the Acts of Parliament, I ought to arrive at the conclusion, which I do, that the 16th section applies.

The defendants, whose counsel argued the case most strenuously, found themselves under the necessity of pushing their arguments to this extreme. They said that the 18th section of the general Act, which contains provisions as to the service of the notice to treat, did not apply for the same reason because the terms are not here. They themselves have served a notice to treat in the regular form, with only the slight modification which was necessary because they were taking an easement, as it is termed, or a right of perpetually using, instead of taking, the lands themselves. This, it was said, was unnecessary, and, in effect, that it was a mistake on the part of the defendants. When they served the notice to treat it is clear they thought the 18th section did apply, and it is satisfactory to a Judge to know that the construction which he adopts is the one which the parties themselves have adopted. Of course they are entitled to say when they come into Court that there has been a mistake from beginning to end. The reason upon which they found their proposition that the 18th section does not apply was this: They say the easement, or right to perpetual easement, is itself defined by the Act. They are wrong in that proposition, because I have already read a portion of the special Act which shews that there were certain times within which they might take the easement in question; it was necessary, in my opinion, on a true construction of these Acts, that they should serve, as they did serve, a notice to treat.

Their argument of course is pushed further to this extreme. They say that the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, with relation to the ascertainment of the compensation or purchase-money to be paid either by arbitration or by a jury, also do not apply. They found this argument upon some words to be found in the 9th sub-section of the 8th section. I do not propose to read that through, but I state my opinion, so far as it is necessary for this judgment, that the 9th sub-section only applies to the special matters which have been mentioned in the earlier part of the 8th section itself. The compensation or purchase-money is not one of the matters which is treated specially in that 8th section, and I entertain no doubt, on the true construction of this Act, that the defendant company and the plaintiff company are both entitled to say that the provisions in the Lands Clauses Act with reference to the ascertainment of the compensation or purchase-money, and the manner in which it is to be ascertained, apply.

Again, the defendants have hitherto adopted this construction because they have obtained the appointment of a surveyor by the Board of Trade under the 85th section as amended by the later Acts, and the bond, which they have given as they have framed it, is that "if the defendant company shall pay or cause to be paid to the Great Western Company, or deposit in the Bank of England for the benefit of the parties interested in the said lands, as the case may require, under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, all such purchase-money and compensation as may in the manner in the said last-mentioned Act provided be paid, &c." Again, they have treated it on this point as if the purchase-money and compensation were to be ascertained under the Lands Clauses Act.

There was an argument addressed to me also with reference to the 85th section, and it was said, as a general proposition, that the 85th section applied to the taking of an easement. Now this proposition, as a general one, cannot be maintained, for the reasons I have stated—namely, that the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, when incorporated simply into an Act authorising the taking of lands, does not authorise the purchasing of an easement. I am satisfied that the words in that section, taken by themselves, do not authorise the entering for the taking of an easement. The words are appropriate to the taking of existing interests. The word "interest" occurs, and the word "convey" occurs, and so forth, and they are not appropriate to the taking of an easement to be created de novo out of land. Again, of course, the defendants found themselves bound to say that the provisions of the Act as to conveyance, the costs of conveyance and the like, had no application. They are compelled to say that, because the term throughout the Lands Clauses Act by itself is "land."

There is one other argument on the part of the defendants which it is right I should notice. It is founded on the 28th section of the special Act [reads it.] It is said that that shews that the words towards the close of the 28th section were necessary in order to arrive at such a conclusion as I have arrived at, and that the insertion of those words in the said clause shews that I ought not to make the modification in the 16th section, which I considered to be the right one, because an express provision is here contained. This is only an enabling section, and the term at the commencement of it is "persons." Now I agree that the Great Western Company were, under the 8th sub-section of section 8, bound to sell or grant the easement in question, and of course, therefore, they were authorised so to do; but I see no objection to this proposition. The 28th section is an empowering section, and I see no reason why the 28th section should not apply to the Great Western Company as well as to any other of the incapacitated owners, because the term at the commencement of the section is "persons," and according to the well-known decision in the House of Lords in the case of the Pharmaceutical Society, "'persons' includes corporations, except where the other provisions of the Act shew that 'persons' must be read in the sense of a natural person" (3). The 7th section of the Lands Clauses Act, which contains a power to persons under disability to enter into contracts, includes corporations. It seems to me, therefore, that I should read the term "persons" here as including corporations. The result is that this would be an additional clause shewing the general intention of the Legislature conferring a power which had already been conferred so far as the Great Western Company is concerned, but containing a power which, in express terms, says that the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, so far as the same are applicable, are to apply to such grants of such easements as are mentioned in the section. So far from the 28th section affording any ground of defence to the defendants, it seems to me, on the contrary, to strengthen the case of the plaintiffs.

For this reason, I think that the plaintiff company are right, and that they are entitled to the injunction which is asked.

From this decision the defendant company appealed.

Pope, Q.C., and Ince, Q.C. (Upjohn with them), for the appellants.—Although section 16 of the Lands Clauses Act, being unrepealed, is still, of course, law, it is virtually ignored in Parliamentary committees, other remedies being always provided for landowners; and the Great Western Company are only entitled to the most strict technical construction of the section. A railway company are not landowners in the ordinary signification of the word, but only for the purposes of the undertaking, and are not entitled to so much consideration as the ordinary landowner. What we are doing cannot be a taking of land within the section, and the section is expressly limited to lands; it is taking an easement—a new statutory easement. Land has been decided not to include an easement created de novo—Pinchin v. The London and Blackwall Railway Company (1); and then it is not a compulsory taking of land (even if easement did include land), because we are acting under an agreement contained in our special Act.

There has been no extension given by the special Act to the interpretation of "lands," and the incorporation of the Lands Clauses Act into the special Act is only the ordinary incorporation. Section 8 of the special Act is such a variation of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act as to exclude section 16.

Romer, Q.C. (Wright with him), for the Great Western Railway Company.—The defendants have served the plaintiffs with a notice to treat, modified so as to be adapted to the special circumstances—a notice to treat under section 18 of the Lands Clauses Act; and next put in force against the plaintiffs section 85, and seek to take possession before the compensation is settled.

The intention of section 16 was to give landowners a guarantee before the compulsory powers of a purchase are put in force against them, and the provision is not limited to powers of the Lands Clauses Act or special Act in relation to the compulsory taking of land for the purposes of their undertaking.

For the interpretation of the Lands Clauses Act when incorporated with the special Act, see The Metropolitan District Railway Company v. Sharpe (2), where the Court held that the provisions as to costs contained in the Lands Clauses Act, which was incorporated by the company's special Act, applied to a form of proceeding in the arbitration created by the special Act, in substitution for that under the Lands Clauses Act—the special provision not repealing the general provision of the Lands Clauses Act. In most cases, "lands" may not include easements, but the word may have an extended sense when it appears on the special Act that the company are empowered compulsorily to purchase an easement. In a composite Act, formed of the special and incorporated Acts, the general Act—that is, the Lands Clauses Act—must be read in it. There is no reference to assessing compensation in sub-section 8 of section 8. The 9th sub-section is not intended to oust the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, which are incorporated, as to compensation, or to deprive the plaintiffs of their ordinary rights under the general law; and the provisions as to costs, of which there are none in this section, must be looked for in the Lands Clauses Act. In Hill v. The Midland Railway Company (4), Fry, J., held that an "easement of making a tunnel under land given by the special Act was an hereditament"—the ground of his decision being that when the special Act gives power to take an easement, such easement becomes an hereditament within the meaning of the 84th and 85th sections.

Ince, Q.C., in reply.—The case of The Metropolitan District Railway Company v. Sharpe (2) is no authority against the appellants. It is evident that, through some slip, the costs of the arbitration under the special Act were not provided for by that Act. The House of Lords thought that it was not intended to repeal the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act as to costs, and make the landowner lose them, and held that the two sections must be read together. This is not a compulsory taking within the Act. It is a bargain and purchase of a right by virtue of a statutory agreement. There is no need to call into requisition the clauses of the general Act; we have every power conferred by section 8, and we were not really bound to proceed under the 84th section of the Lands Clauses Act.

Sub-section 9 provides all machinery for settling any dispute. A question may arise between the companies as to the price to be paid for the easement, and then that will be a dispute within the meaning of the clause. There is no need to give "lands" any extended meaning.

JESSEL, M.R.—I am afraid, as not unfrequently happens with these Acts of Parliament, that there is a difference of opinion in this Court as to the proper construction of them.

In the present case the question before us is really one of great simplicity, and depends upon the construction of the Lands Clauses Act and the special Act of Parliament. The real question is, whether what, in my opinion, amounts merely in substance to running powers, with an obligation to construct the archway or bridge and tunnel over which the running powers are to be exercised, is a taking of land within the terms of the Lands Clauses Act by compulsion, or, in other words, a compulsory taking of lands so as to make the 16th section of the Lands Clauses Act apply.

First of all, we must not forget that the Lands Clauses Act has a definition extending the ordinary meaning of the word "lands." That such a privilege as I have mentioned—I say privilege advisedly, not easement—that such a privilege, or right of running trains over land, is not land is quite clear.

The next question is, is it within the meaning of the words of the 3rd section of the Lands Clauses Act, which says, "The word 'lands' shall extend to messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments of any tenure"? In the absence of decision there might have been a question whether the word "hereditaments" would not be sufficient. It is not a tenement; I do not conceive that any kind of running power could be the subject of tenure. But the word "hereditament" might be held to apply to it. But when we consider the meaning of the statute as well as decisions, I think no one can doubt that the decisions are right, and that it was never intended to compel a landowner to carve a new easement out of his land and sell it to the railway company against his will. That is the effect of the decisions, and, as I said before, I entirely concur in them. The result, therefore, is that the ordinary meaning of the word "lands" in the Act of Parliament does not include any incorporeal easements except such as were actually attached to the "lands" which are the subject of purchase.

The 16th section says this: "And with respect to the purchase and taking of the lands otherwise than by agreement be it enacted as follows:" I will not read the section, except the last words of it, which say you must subscribe the whole of the capital "before it shall be lawful to put in force any of the powers of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, in relation to the compulsory taking of land for the purposes of the undertaking." That is what is forbidden. In the present case, I have no doubt that the capital is not subscribed. I purposely refrain from saying anything about the practice of Parliament, or the practice of some great railway companies, because I think it is our duty to decide simply according to the law, without having any regard either to the motives of the parties, or any attempt on their part to take advantage of any accidental slip or mistake on the part of the other side. We have nothing to do with that. We have only to decide it upon the merits.

Now that being so, what is the taking of land for the purposes of the undertaking? If the taking of land means the taking of land under this Act, it is clear it does not include such a right as I have mentioned, and upon that point I do not think there is any difference of opinion. This Act may be incorporated with the special Act; and the real question is this—when it is incorporated into the special Act which gives the railway company incorporated by that special Act a power of taking a right over land—which right is not land—is this section to be extended so as to prevent the company acquiring that right? In other words, whether the word "lands" when incorporated into the special Act is to have a larger meaning given to it which it has not in the original Act; because in the original Act there was no authority to take the easement rights, whereas now there is an authority, and the word hereditaments may be taken to be included. That is the question.

In trying that question, we must first see what the incorporation means. As I read the incorporation clause, it is equivalent to writing the incorporated provisions over again in the special Act. The enacting part of the Lands Clauses Act says this: "This Act shall apply to every undertaking authorised by any Act which shall hereafter be passed, and which shall authorise the purchase or taking of lands for such undertaking, and this Act shall be incorporated with such Act; and all the clauses and provisions of this Act, save so far as they shall be expressly varied or excepted by any such Act, shall apply to the undertaking authorised thereby so far as the same shall be applicable to such undertaking"—and that is all—"and shall be construed together therewith as forming one Act." Now in the special Act we have something in addition to that, and something which to my mind is very important.

The 2nd section of that Act incorporates the Lands Clauses Act with the subsequent Acts altogether, except where expressly varied by this Act—that is to say, they are incorporated with and form part of the special Act. Section 3 says this: [reads the section.] The result, therefore, is that by writing in the Lands Clauses Act you have all the definitions of the Lands Clauses Act put in, and the same sense is to be attributed to the words that they bear in the Lands Clauses Act itself, unless you find something repugnant to their doing so.

Then we come to what is really the substance of the whole matter. We first of all have section 5: "Subject to the provisions of this Act the company may take certain lands"—I do not read the rest because the clause being preceded by the words "Subject to the provisions of this Act," and there being, as I shall shew, negative words, the argument which said that had it not been for the subsequent sections this section of the Act would enable the company to take the land, altogether fails, because the section of the Act says, "subject to the provisions of this Act," you shall not take it. This section does not, having regard to the subsequent sections, empower the Swindon Company to take any lands of the Great Western Railway. Then comes section 8, which is the section for the protection of the Great Western Railway, and the result of sub-section 1, is this—that the Swindon Company is not to interfere with the lands at all, they are not to take them at all, and they are only to enter and construct works of a given class.

Sub-sections 2 and 3 are immaterial. Sub-section 4 is important [reads it]. I ought to mention that the Swindon Company is to cross the Great Western line twice—once by an archway, and the other time by a tunnel; in the one case tunnelling under the Great Western, and in the other throwing an archway across it.

Now those things, "and any extension thereof constructed by the company, and the incidental works connected therewith"—one of which is the tunnel—"for carrying railway No. 1 under the main line," &c. [reads the clause to end.]

The result of that, therefore, is that the Great Western retain their property in the land, and acquire property in the works which are placed on these lands, making the whole thing part of the main line of the Great Western Railway Company. They never part with any property whatever. Now we come to the 8th sub-section; the others I do not consider material to mention [reads the 8th sub-section.] In other words, the Swindon Company is to purchase and take a right of user equivalent to what are commonly called running powers; because the right of user is only for the purpose for which they might take the land. It comes to this—that the company has a right to buy, and the Great Western Railway Company are compelled to sell, the right of permanently using the Great Western Railway Company's railway by means of running trains over it. If the Act had said, in so many words, they may purchase and the Great Western Railway Company may give running powers over the railway, it would exactly have expressed the meaning: it really being that the Great Western Railway Company give the power of running over it, the use of it being given to the Swindon Company. That, in my view, is the effect of the sub-section. What the legal effect may be of selling such running powers, or the use of the railway for this purpose, I will consider in a moment. The 9th sub-section is, to my mind, very important [reads it]. It was said this is an attempt—I do not think it is material, although it was relied on—to take away certain rights. In my opinion there is an express enactment, and the 9th sub-section, as I understand it, relates to any of the foregoing matters. The words are, "if any dispute shall arise as to the matters aforesaid." Surely when one company is authorised to buy and the other company to sell, and there is a dispute as to the price, that is one of the matters aforesaid. It is perfectly plain that this sub-section covers any disputes which by any possibility can arise respecting the matters mentioned, and whatever you want to have done you can have done by arbitration. Let us consider what sort of thing it is. The Swindon Company are to be at the expense of making the line, and what they are to have is the right of running trains over it. Is that the sort of thing that either of the companies thought or ever dreamt of sending to a jury? I should say certainly not. This clause, I think, carries out what in my opinion both parties meant, and when the counsel for the Great Western Company talk of that company not having the right reserved to them of going before a jury, my opinion is that the company never had or dreamt that it had any such right. The whole thing was to be referred to arbitration, which is not only as good but a far better method of deciding these questions than by sending them before a jury. I seems to me that the whole matter is complete—that everything that is requirto be determined by arbitration, can be determined by arbitration, and there is no need of the powers of the Lands Clauses Act or any other Act for deciding questions between the Swindon Company and the Great Western Company with respect to the mode and manner in which the Swindon Company shall cross the Great Western Railway Company's main line either over or under it.

There is only one other section which was referred to which is of importance—the 24th section, although referred to, I think has no bearing on the matter—I mean the 28th, because it was said that there was no limit. There is a limit by the 24th section which would put an end to everything if it were not completed within a certain time [reads section 28]. In the first place that section does not apply to the railway company. They are not persons who may, if they think fit, grant the easement. In the next place it only applies to people who have the power of granting an easement, who, I suppose, as a general rule, are the fee-simple owners; and in the next place, so far as it affords any argument at all, it affords a weak argument against the plaintiffs, which is this—that if the word "lands" in the Lands Clauses Act would without any extension have applied to easements, a provision that the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act with respect to land shall extend and apply to the acquisition of easements is not wanted. That finishes all I have to say as to the "sections of the special" Act.

What is the subject-matter? First of all, is this within section 16 of the Lands Clauses Act? In my opinion it is not. The Swindon company are not compulsorily taking land. What is the compulsory taking of land referred to in that section? Does it mean to refer to that which goes before? It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to decide that question—but, in my opinion, it does mean to refer to what has gone before—the compulsory taking of land, of which the Act had been speaking. The word used is "the." It is not because land may be taken compulsorily in some other way, e.g. as by a power to take it conferred under a private Act of Parliament, and not under the incorporated Lands Clauses Act at all. I do not think the section would apply to that case. I think that this section limits the right to take land compulsorily conferred by the preceding sections. Whether that is so it is not necessary to decide, because, in my opinion, this is not a compulsory taking of land at all. The Swindon Company is prohibited from taking the land. The property never goes out of the Great Western Railway Company. All that the Swindon Company do is to enter upon the land for the purpose of constructing the works, and all that they ever acquire from the Great Western Company is a right of running their trains over it.

Is that grant of a right—whether you call it an easement, or a right of limited user of the lands as an hereditament, because the right of running trains over is some kind of user—is that a compulsory taking of land? I think it is not. I think it is quite a different thing, and the reasons for applying the Act of Parliament appear to me not to bear at all upon this question. It is intended to secure an ordinary landowner from having his lands taken from him when there is no possibility of the railway being completed. Now the Great Western Railway do not want that security. Any dispute that they raise can be referred to arbitration, and they can obtain an arbitrator's decision upon it. If they say the Swindon Company had not capital enough, and cannot make their line at all, and the enterprise is wholly abortive, I suppose they could raise the dispute, and refer it to the arbitrator. They do not require the protection of section 16, for they have another, namely, a very formidable series of clauses giving them a great deal. Therefore, whether I look at the words, or at the meaning of this section 16, it appears to me that it does not apply—that this is not a taking of lands at all, and if it is, according to the fair view of the Act of Parliament, intended to give cover to the Great Western Railway Company, they have ample protection given another way I think the Great Western Railway Company are not entitled to ask us to extend the meaning of the words—not forgetting the 3rd section of the special Act—and to say that the person or body simply taking the grant of this peculiar right—I do not choose to call it an easement, for it is not really one—is a person or body taking land within the meaning of section 16.

With regard to section 84 of the Lands Clauses Act, my present opinion is—it is not necessary to decide it—that the construction of that and the 85th section does not affect the question which we have to decide. The Swindon company have given the bond, and have not asked to withdraw it. I need not express an opinion whether it was necessary to give the bond. They have given it, and if that section applies they have complied with it. But I do not think that their compliance with that section, any more than the form of their notice, can be used against them so as to help the contention of the Great Western Railway Company. I am satisfied that the provisions of the 84th section, whether they are read so as to apply to this case or not, cannot affect the construction of the other sections. If they are read to apply to this section, they would be read to apply to the Great Western, and the words "permanent user" under the second part of the section would apply to such a user as this. Therefore they would not necessarily apply to the construction of the 16th section, which relates to the compulsory taking of land, which we have already decided in a previous case (5) means the acquiring by purchase—not the mere taking possession, that is, the general meaning of it. It does not appear to me that the 84th section throws any light upon section 16, and we have not to decide whether the Swindon Company were or were not liable to give the notice they have given.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court below cannot be supported, and must therefore be reversed.

COTTON, L.J.—The Great Western Railway Company are asking the interference of the Court to restrain the Swindon Company from interfering with the lands on which the Great Western Railway is constructed, upon this ground—that at the present moment, having regard to the provisions under which the defendants are acting, they are not in a position to claim a right to exercise these Parliamentary powers of taking this land. If they have no Parliamentary power, they are trespassers and have no right to be there. The question really turns upon the 16th section of the Lands Clauses Act, which is incorporated into the special Act, and which is to become part of the special Act, and is so to be dealt with.

I shall not refer to nor do I rely on anything that has been done by the defendants under the advice of their professional advisers, because we have to decide the law, and not to decide the question upon what has been done by parties who presumably are not so well competent to interpret it.

Nor do I think myself that the fact of the plaintiffs being a railway company is in any way to their prejudice. If the fact were to be taken into consideration—which I do not—it would, in my opinion, be probably in their favour, because a railway company has the greatest possible interest in seeing that its works are not interfered with except by bodies which are in such a position as to be able permanently to do—that which the Act of Parliament refers to—the interference works in question. However, I merely look upon the railway company as persons having land, asking the Court to prevent somebody else from interfering with that land under colour of Acts of Parliament which do not apply.

I will not read the whole of the 16th section, but "the capital is to be subscribed for before it is lawful to put in force any of the powers of this or the Special Act for the taking of lands for the purposes of the undertaking." The question is, whether the defendant company are putting in force powers in relation to the compulsory taking of land for the purposes of the undertaking. It has been suggested that this section does not apply at all, because it is said that it only applies to the taking otherwise than by agreement; and here it is to be considered that there was an agreement between the two companies that the land was to be taken, that this Act of Parliament was passed embodying an agreement between the parties, and that therefore this is a taking by agreement.

(5) Spencer v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, ante, p. 249.

my opinion, in construing this section we ought to take "land" including "hereditaments," to include what is called an easement as an hereditament.

But then it is said, that is not what the defendants are taking, or claiming to take. What does the Act of Parliament say? I quite concede that this is rather a special clause, and that notwithstanding what is to be done, the land still remains the property of the Great Western Railway Company, and in some marvellous way the line which is to be put over it is to be considered as part of the Great Western Railway; but in all cases where the easement is found, the land over which the easement is to take effect still remains the property of the owner of the land subject to this right. Here we find that the Act of Parliament says this: "that the defendant company shall not take and purchase the land, but the company may purchase and take, and the Great Western Company shall sell or grant accordingly, an easement or right of using the same in perpetuity for the purpose for which but for this enactment the company might take and purchase the same." I cannot compliment the draughtsman, because he uses the word "same" there, which would probably refer to the right in perpetuity to use the land, which is not very accurate. But in this case Parliament does give the right of purchasing an easement—a statutory easement—I agree. It is not an easement acquired in the ordinary way, but the right is given of using the lands in perpetuity, and although it is not an ordinary easement, if it is constituted a Parliamentary easement, it is to be considered an hereditament; and having regard to the words of the statute here that the defendant company are to take the right of using that in perpetuity, although the works they construct are to be part of the Great Western Railway Company's system and part of their railways, the defendant company are taking that which, looking to the interpretation clause, is to be considered as a taking of land within the meaning of the 16th section. I can see no reason why we should give to this general enactment, intended to prevent railway companies from taking lands when they have not the means of carrying out their undertakings, a limited, rather than an extended meaning, which, in my opinion, is the true meaning. That being so, I think we ought to interfere, and that Mr. Justice Chitty was right in interfering.

It was said that section 3 of the special Act is inconsistent with that view [reads it]. "Land" in the Lands Clauses Act is to have the meaning of hereditaments. There is nothing, in my opinion, inconsistent with giving that meaning to it here. In another Act, in which it was incorporated, it was held to be confined to corporeal hereditaments, and not to include incorporeal hereditaments, for the reasons I have given; and it is not as if the Lands Clauses Act had said in terms—"lands" shall not include incorporeal hereditaments. If that were so, I agree that the 3rd section would present a difficulty; but "land" was defined by that Act to mean hereditaments, which prima facie would include easements, unless there had been something in the context to shew that that is not the meaning, and there is something, in my opinion, to shew that it may have been the meaning equally well.

I must mention sub-section 9 of section 8, and I agree if that sub-section had not provided for settling a dispute about the purchase-money it would very much have strengthened the conclusion to which I have arrived, because it could then be said, how can the disputes between these parties be settled unless the clauses in the Lands Clauses Act relating to the settling of the amount of compensation for lands are to be included? I do not say that this sub-section does not and may not afford the means of settling the amount of compensation; but because it does so, and another mode has been provided other than that given by the Lands Clauses Act for settling the dispute as to the price, that does not, in my opinion, prevent one from giving what, in my opinion, is the fair and true meaning of section 16 of the Act here. It would have much strengthened this case if the sub-section could not be applied to settling the dispute as to the price to be paid for the land. Without deciding whether it does or not, I am not deterred from arriving at the conclusion to which I have come by any consideration that it might be so applied.

I do not decide that it does, but it might, and probably would be applied to settle it.

The only other section of the special Act is section 28. I in no way rely upon it, but I think that the argument that this was put in ex abundanti cautela is so weak as regards its bearing on the true construction of section 16 of the Lands Clauses Act, and what is to be done under sub-section 8 of section 8 of the special Act, that it does not afford any sufficient reason for not putting on the word "land" in section 16 in the clauses here, and the Lands Clauses Act when incorporated into this Act, the meaning which we should give to it.

I am of opinion, therefore, that Mr. Justice Chitty came to the right conclusion, and that section 16 of the Lands Clauses Act does prevent the defendant company from doing what they are doing for the purpose of taking the land previously to using this land.

BOWEN, L.J.—In this case the real question seems to me to be whether the action of the Swindon Company is a compulsory taking of land within the meaning of section 16 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. Now by that section it is provided that the capital must be subscribed before it shall be lawful to "put in force any of the powers of that Act or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith in relation to the compulsory taking of land for the purposes of the undertaking." Accordingly it becomes necessary to consider whether in this case what the Swindon Company desire to do is a compulsory taking of lands within the meaning of that provision. Now, first of all, what is it, to put it shortly, the company propose to do? When the scheme of the Swindon Company was brought before Parliament in 1881 it was opposed by the Great Western Railway Company, and in the result an Act of Parliament was passed which enabled the Swindon Company, for the purpose of carrying out its undertaking, to do certain definite things. It was given, of course, the general power of taking land from landowners when required for the purposes of the undertaking. But with regard to the Great Western Railway Company it was not given that exact power, but the power was given of approaching the Great Western Railway Company's system, and of entering upon their land for the purpose of constructing either a bridge over it, or a tunnel under it; but the Swindon Company, when they had constructed that bridge and tunnel, were not to become the owners of it, they were to have no property in the soil, but only the powers of permanently using it for the purposes of their undertaking, with certain limits to which I need not refer. Now, is that right so conferred by that statute on the Swindon Company "land or hereditaments" within the meaning of the interpretation clause of the Lands Clauses Act, and is the insisting upon and the acquiring of the right, or exercising their option to acquire it under sub-section 8, a compulsory taking of land?

First of all, what is this right which is given by the statute to the Swindon Company if they elect to take it? We have had a great deal of discussion during the argument as to whether it is an easement. It is called an easement in the section. For certain purposes it may be compendiously styled an easement; but if it were an easement in the true sense of the term, that does not bring it within the interpretation clause of the Lands Clauses Act, because it has been expressly decided that a new easement is not "land or hereditaments of any tenure" within the meaning of that section.

But then it has been said that this is at all events an hereditament; and it seems to me that it would be almost a barren controversy to pursue any lengthy discussion whether a right created by Act of Parliament for the purposes of a special Act, and vested in one railway company only, is an hereditament in the eyes of the law. It is an unanswerable kind of question. How can one say what a right which only exists by statute in favour of a particular company, would or would not be at law. I cannot understand what is gained by discussing it in the abstract, and considering it apart from the meaning of the Act of Parliament. It is a right called in the Act of Parliament which creates it, an easement, and an easement perhaps it resembles in certain qualities; but it is a right of a purely statutory kind created by Act of Parliament and vested in a particular railway company, and the only question is, whether the statutory right so created comes within the definition given to "land" in the Lands Clauses Act of 1845, which says—"the word 'lands' shall extend to messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments of any tenure." I think if we were to read the Lands Clauses Act by itself, and ask whether a statutory right of that kind can be said to be "lands of any tenure," the answer would be, prima facie, in the negative. It is not land, because the special Act which creates the right seems to me to say, in so many words, that those who take it are not to take lands. Is it an "hereditament of any tenure"? Prima facie, I think the answer would be, it is not connected with any tenure at all; but still I agree that, if on reading the two Acts together, and considering the special Act with reference to the Lands Clauses Act, the true and natural meaning which we are obliged to put upon this Act is that this special statutory right, although not prima facie an "hereditament or land," is nevertheless so treated in the special Act, and meant to be so treated for the purposes of the Lands Clauses Act, we should be driven by convenience and necessity to hold that it fell within the definition of the interpretation clause. I think that the strength of Mr. Romer's argument would be enormous if he could shew that this construction is wanted for the purpose of carrying out the transfer of the right from the one company to the other, or rendering effectual the acquisition of the right by the Swindon Company. If he could shew in fact that the machinery created by the Lands Clauses Act for its compulsory taking is needed, that would be a strong argument. But is not a very excellent special machinery in the special Act substituted for all that kind of machinery which is devised by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, for the protection of landowners, whether they be railway companies or individuals, against those who wish to take their lands?

It appears to me that the true interpretation of the Act coincides in this case with the strictly business view of what was being done. Here were the two companies—the Swindon company, who did not propose to rob or plunder the Great Western of any of its property on the terms of not having to pay compensation, but who wanted to touch the Great Western system and use it without interfering with it. When the two companies met in the committee-room of the House of Lords one can conceive what the views of those representing them would be. There would be the engineers, and the surveyors and managers, and the solicitors of these two companies. Can anybody in their senses suppose that if they had been discussing the question by the light of reason, those experienced persons who represented the one company and the other would deliberately choose the Lands Clauses compulsory machinery instead of the special arbitration machinery of the special Act? Would either company wish that the assessment to be paid for the interference with the line of the Great Western Company should be brought in any event before a jury? If such a thing had been proposed to the engineers or to the surveyors or to the solicitors of the two companies, in my opinion, they would have rejected it on the spot, and would have said—"No; let us have a special arbitration machinery." That is what I should expect, and upon looking at the Act that is expressly what I do find, and it seems to me to answer Mr. Romer's argument; for not only is there a machinery which is as good as the Lands Clauses machinery, and which therefore dispenses with the necessity of invoking that machinery for this Act, but it is a better machinery by far, and one which I believe to be far more consonant with the wishes and intentions of the parties.

Now that disposes, as it seems to me, of the force of the illustration which Mr. Romer sought from the judgment in the House of Lords in the case of The Metropolitan District Railway Company v. Sharpe (2). There the question was whether the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act with regard to costs had been inferentially repealed by the subsequent special Act; or whether, although the special Act substituted special arbitration machinery for the Lands Clauses Act arthen I can only say that I do not think the discussion of these two sections would throw any light on the subject whether the taking of this particular right is a compulsory taking of land within the 16th section of the Lands Clauses Act.

Then, says Mr. Romer, there is a further provision, "that nothing in this Act shall extend to prejudice, diminish or alter, or take away any of the rights, privileges or powers of the Great Western Railway Company otherwise than is by this Act expressly provided," and you do so if you read the Act against the plaintiffs, because you will be taking away their right as a landowner to the arbitration machinery of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and their right to section 16 under which this application arises. There is a fallacy again. That begs the question of whether they have got it to take away. The whole question in this case is, not whether it is being taken away, but whether the plaintiffs have got it.

Then there was an argument based upon section 28, which Mr. Romer was inclined to use in his favour, and which Mr. Ince prays in aid of his construction. To my mind, if this section bears in anybody's favour at all it bears rather in Mr. Ince's favour, on the ground that it contains a general expression that certain easements should be granted, rather indicating that other easements not mentioned should not. I agree with what Lord Justice Cotton and the Master of the Rolls said about not using the section in favour of the Swindon Company or pressing it against the Great Western Railway Company. It seems to me the greatest injustice might be done if we were inexorably to apply general rules of construction laid down with regard to general Acts of Parliament drawn with great care to clauses stuck into a Railway Act at the last moment when the railway bill is before a committee. We must not close our eyes to business matters, and we know perfectly well that these sections in the railway Acts must not be read as if they were marriage settlements drawn by a conveyancer. They are sections drawn by business men or by their counsel at a moment's notice. I do not press section 28 at all against the Great Western Railway Company.

I am clear of this, that they are not within section 28, because this section only applies to persons entrusted with a discretion, and the Great Western Railway Company are not entrusted with any discretion at all under sub-section 8, for if the Swindon Railway Company require to have anything the Great Western Railway Company are bound to consent.

There is only one other section which I wish to mention, and one other argument which I refer to. It is said, Are the Great Western Railway Company to be thrown into a state of utter uncertainty as to when these powers are going to be exercised by the Swindon Railway Company? The answer seems to me to be twofold—first, that the Swindon Railway Company are bound by a five years' term—it is really only a question whether they are to be bound with regard to the Great Western Railway Company by a term of five years or three. That is hardly a distinction of principle. And, secondly, in my opinion, it is not a taking of land in any sense. It is really an arrangement which is imposed by Parliament on one company for the benefit of the other company, a grant to the Swindon Railway Company of that which is in one respect analogous to, if not strictly the same as, a running power over the Great Western system for a limited portion of the Great Western line, which still leaves all the property of that portion of the Great Western line in the Great Western Railway Company, although the Swindon Railway Company are to use it.

I therefore think with the Master of the Rolls that the judgment of Mr. Justice Chitty must be reversed, and that the appellants are entitled to succeed.

Ince, Q.C., asked for costs.

JESSEL, M.R.—The rule is, where the Court has given judgment in an injunction case on the subject-matter of the action, the injunction is always dismissed with costs.

McHENRY v. LEWIS.

Practice—Stay of Proceedings—Actions in this Country—Action for same object pending in Foreign Court—Representative Actions—Action in personam—Action in rem.

When a plaintiff sues a defendant in this country and also in a foreign country for the same cause of action, the Court in this country has jurisdiction in a proper case to stay the proceedings in this country on the ground that the defendant is being doubly vexed by reason of the action being brought also in the foreign country. But if in the foreign country there are different forms of procedure and different remedies, the mere fact that the plaintiff is also suing in the foreign country is not itself evidence of vexation.

Cox v. Mitchell (7 Com. B. Rep. N.S. 55; 29 Law J. Rep. C.P. 33) discussed.

Lord Dillon v. Alvares (4 Ves. 357) explained to be no longer law.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Chitty, J., dismissing a motion by the defendants to stay all further proceedings in the action, which was instituted by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and all holders of certificates for bonds and shares under the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad Company Reorganisation Scheme, other than the defendants, against the trustees of a reconstruction scheme relating to the affairs of the above-mentioned railway company.

The case is reported ante, p. 16.

The object of the action, which was commenced in July, 1881, was in substance to render the defendants liable for numerous breaches of trust.

In 1879 an action was commenced in England by a Mr. Conybeare against the same trustees, the object of which action was to a considerable extent identical with the present action.

In August, 1881, an action was commenced in America by another Mr. Conybeare and Mr. McHenry as co-plaintiffs on behalf of themselves and others against the same trustees for purposes which were substantially the same as those in this present action; but there were additional defendants to the American action—namely, the new company and its directors.

Romer, Q.C., and Hatfield Green, for the appellants.—In all three actions the plaintiffs are seeking to get the same point decided, although in two of them, no doubt, there are certain subsidiary questions.

[JESSEL, M.R.—Assume that to be so. What then?]

Then we say that this action is vexatious and oppressive, and ought to be stayed.

[JESSEL, M.R.—You have not got the plaintiffs in both the other actions before the Court. I do not see that the actions are similar in all respects.]

We submit that all three actions are substantially the same; that the main point is being litigated three times over, and the subsidiary points twice over.

[BOWEN, L.J.—Have you any authority for staying proceedings or putting a party to his election when two actions for the same object have been brought, one in this country and another in a foreign country? COTTON, L.J., referred to Wedderburn v. Wedderburn (1). JESSEL, M.R.—Cox v. Mitchell (2) is against you.]

We submit that in principle there is no distinction whether the second action is brought in this country or in a foreign country. It is equally vexatious and harassing. At any rate, in the absence of explanation it certainly is. We submit that if the plaintiff intends to go on with both actions he should be put to his election—Walsh v. The Bishop of Lincoln (3), Cox v. Mitchell (2), Peters v. Thompson (4), Watson v. Cave (5), Gellatly v. The Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London (6), The Mali Ivo (7), The Catar-

Ince, Q.C., and H. Burton Buckley, for the respondents, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Chitty, and it raises a most important question of law. That question is, whether or not when an action is brought by a man in this country against a defendant, and the same plaintiff brings an action in a foreign country against the same defendant for the same cause of action, the Court has jurisdiction in a proper case to stay the action in this country on the ground that the defendant is doubly vexed by reason of the action being brought also in the foreign country.

Notwithstanding what has been said about the case of Cox v. Mitchell (2), I am of opinion that there is such jurisdiction in the Court, and that it is part of the general jurisdiction of the Court, to prevent a defendant being improperly vexed by legal procedure. I see no reason or principle why, if the Court is satisfied that the defendant is being improperly vexed, the mere fact of one of the actions being in this country and one in a foreign country should prevent the Court protecting the defendant from being so improperly vexed. So much for the general jurisdiction.

Now I am not sure that what I have stated really conflicts with the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Cox v. Mitchell (2). In one view it does not so conflict. If the true view of the judgment is that prima facie a man is not doubly vexed where the action is brought in the two countries, but that you want a special case to shew that he is doubly vexed, then there is no conflict of opinion. If, however, it means that in no case can the Court interfere, then I must admit, with the greatest deference to the four learned Judges who decided Cox v. Mitchell (2), I should not be prepared to endorse their opinion.

As regards the second point, it appears to me that very different considerations arise where both the actions are brought in this country, and where one of them is brought in a foreign country. In this country, where the actions are by the same man in Courts governed by the same procedure, and where the judgments are followed by the same remedies, it is prima facie vexatious to bring two actions where one will do. And, indeed, this has been recognised I believe for ages by the practice of the old Court of Chancery, which always put a plaintiff to his election by an order of course, if he was suing for the same cause of action both at law and in equity. The same principle applies, it appears to me, wherever the judgment can be enforced, and for that reason I think that the case of Lord Dillon v. Alvares (9) can no longer be relied on. At the time when that case was decided a judgment in Ireland could not be enforced in England, nor could a judgment in England be enforced in Ireland. That is not so now; and therefore as between England and Ireland, and the same observation applies to Scotland, you have the Queen's Courts, which, although not identical, are very similar in procedure, and you can obtain the same remedies; therefore it appears to me that in all those cases there is prima facie vexation. It is possible that the same observation might be made as regards the Queen's Courts in any other part of the world, but that of course may be subject to exception as regards the nature of the remedy. But where it is in a foreign country it certainly appears to me that we cannot draw the same inference. Not only is the procedure different, but the remedy is different. Take the case of an Englishman suing abroad a foreigner resident abroad, and the foreigner comes to this country, as in Cox v. Mitchell (2). The plaintiff might have totally different remedies. At that time he had the remedy of writ of capias in England, and, as far as I know, that had been abolished in several of the States of America, and perhaps in South Carolina at that time. That was a different remedy. But there is more than that. He might have a personal remedy in one country, and a remedy only against the goods in another. He may have a remedy against the real estate in one country, and no such remedy against the real estate in the other. It is not so very long ago since the law of England did not allow a crêditor to take a dead man's real estate, and we know that in foreign countries various laws apply as regards the remedies of a totally distinct character from the laws regulating the remedies in this country. So that it is by no means to be assumed, in the absence of evidence, that the mere fact of suing in a foreign country as well as in this country is vexatious. It seems to me that you must make out a special case; and there is, therefore, that distinction between the case of the two actions being brought in the Queen's Courts, and one action being brought in the Queen's Court and the other in the Court of a foreign sovereign.

Well, that being so, we must consider in this case whether a special case for vexation has been made out. Now here there are three actions, and I can well understand that the defendants who make this application strongly object to having the same subject-matter litigated three times over. In the first instance, there is an action brought by a gentleman of the name of Conybeare to make Mr. Lewis and his co-trustees liable for certain alleged breaches of trust. I need not go into that, the matter is still sub judice, and of course if the actions proceed will be disposed of at the trial. The first action, I may say, is by Mr. Conybeare on behalf of himself and all the other shareholders in the Atlantic and Great Western Railway Company. The second action is by Mr. McHenry, also on behalf of himself and the other shareholders of the Atlantic and Great Western Railway Company; and it seeks, amongst other things, to make the defendants liable for the same breaches of trust. But the second action not only seeks to make him liable for those breaches of trust, but it extends to other relief for other alleged breaches of trust, partly against him and partly against other people; and it also joins certain personal individual claims of Mr. McHenry, independently of the other shareholders. That is the nature of the second action. Then the third action is this. It is an action by the same Mr. McHenry—I have not forgotten that another Mr. Conybeare is nominally joined with him, but from the statements made at the bar (I have not heard the other side, but I will assume that they are substantially correct) it is Mr. McHenry's action brought in the United States—and it is brought against the same defendants who are defendants to the English action. It is brought substantially for the same purposes as the English action of Mr. McHenry as regards the company. But there are in addition to the defendants to the English action the new American Railroad Company and the directors of the American Railroad Company, who are not parties to the English action. Therefore this American action differs from Mr. McHenry's English action in the fact of additional parties, and very important parties too.

Now, in order to try the bona fides of Mr. McHenry's first action, you must see what it is for, and it is not suggested by the present appellants that that action, at all events, does not raise a substantial question which is proper to be raised and proper to be tried. Therefore it is not a case of a frivolous action, in any sense of the word, nor of a vexatious action. The vexation, if any, consists in bringing several proceedings to try the same question or series of questions. There is a substantial question and a serious question to be tried. A motion was made in Mr. McHenry's action in England for an injunction, which failed because the American Railroad Company and the directors of that company were not parties to it, and thereupon, or soon after, the American action was instituted making them parties. That seems to me to be the strongest evidence to shew that the American action was brought because the English action had failed to that extent, and it does seem to me very good evidence that the second action was brought in good faith. Now what will happen as regards the second action? We have got these parties to the litigation who could not be made liable in England, and who could be made liable in America, and we have got this also, that the parties in the action in America, who are resident in England, can be made liable in England and cannot be made liable in America; for although you may get judgment against them in America you cannot enforce that judgment in England. You must bring an action upon it. So strongly was that felt by the moving parties that they actually offered a personal undertaking to allow judgment to be entered up against them in England if judgment is obtained in the American action, shewing that the difficulty was present to their minds. Therefore no special case is made out for stopping the American or the English action; but, on the contrary, there is a special case for two actions, because you can only enforce the claim of the plaintiffs directly by getting judgment in both countries. At the same time I cannot help thinking that if I could see my way to have the question, which is the main question in dispute, litigated once for all, I would do so. But then it will be, I suppose, decided in one action before it will be decided in the other; it will not be decided at the same moment; and it seems to me that when judgment is pronounced in one action some application may be made which will prevent the other action proceeding. To some extent, therefore, though not to the entire extent, you can save expense. But there is another thing which has been pressing upon my mind. I do not know the state of the cause lists in the United States, though I know something about the state of them here, and it may well be that it may be eminently desirable to let both actions go on with a view of getting a speedy trial. It is no doubt to a certain extent a hardship on the defendants, and to a certain extent a hardship on the plaintiff who is bringing two actions; but I cannot at present say that there is any special case made out in this instance for the interference of the Court, and as far as I can see there is very strong ground for saying that the actions are not only brought bona fide but with a decided intention to enforce the remedy to which the plaintiff believes himself entitled. On the whole it seems to me that we ought not to interfere by staying the English actions.

Now I have some remarks to make on the third action. This third action, which was commenced first by Mr. Conybeare on behalf of himself and the other shareholders, is complained of as being vexatious together with Mr. McHenry's English action. As I said before, the two actions do not quite cover the same ground. I am not now saying that if notice of motion for consolidation had been given both to Mr. McHenry and to Mr. Conybeare, something might not have been done; but it was objected in the Court below, and properly objected, that no notice of this motion had been given to Mr. Conybeare, and that until that was done the Court was not empowered to deal with the action. I quite agree that you ought not to allow a company or directors of a company to be sued by a multitude of shareholders in a multitude of separate actions, each of which is constituted on behalf of all the shareholders. You might have a hundred actions grounded upon the same act or alleged breach of trust, and therefore, of course, the Court has power to stop all but one of the actions, if they are all for exactly the same thing. But the course of the Court is well settled. The defendants take out a summons to stay the actions, which have been previously transferred, of course, to the same Judge or Court, and then the Court decides which of the actions is to go on as a test action and which are to be stayed. You cannot tell until you have all the plaintiffs before you the right course to be taken. The first action may be a collusive action; one action may embrace further relief than another; one action may be better framed than another to raise the questions in dispute; one action may be more perfect as to parties than another; in one action the plaintiff may be a solvent person and able to answer costs, and in the other the plaintiff may be a pauper. Various considerations may arise, and until you get the whole of the actions before the Court, the Court cannot decide which is to be allowed to proceed or on what terms. It sometimes happens that we allow one action to proceed for one purpose and another for another purpose—that is, that we excise from one action so much of the relief as can properly be attributed to an earlier plaintiff, and allow the second or third action to go on for the additional relief; but all that can only be discussed in the presence of all parties. Now this objection was taken in the Court below, and the present applicants did not ask leave

id their notice of motion to bring ntiff in Conybeare v. Lewis before rt, and they have chosen to appeal making him a party. It appears at that is a fatal objection to so f the motion as relates to the ion of Mr. McHenry's action, so t extends to the same objects as ered by Mr. Conybeare's English fore, in my opinion, the decision arned Judge of the Court below t in both points, and I think the on fails and must be dismissed.

N, L.J.—The appellants here seek n action in England, on the ground re is another action, by the same jointly with another, in the United f America. Now, I am of opinion appeal fails, but not on the ground Court has no jurisdiction to make r if a proper state of circumstances n to exist for the exercise of that ion. It is true that Cox v. Mitchell relied on in the Court below as a principle which prevented the om making the order in the pre-e, and when one merely sees the f the case it looks as if that were t I cannot accede to that case if it n as a general principle that this annot interfere where one of the is in England and the other in a Court. I find that Lord Cotten-Wedderburn v. Wedderburn (1), n the rule with reference to suits nd and abroad in these terms:— can be no doubt that the general ludes parties from proceeding in r Court for the same purpose for ey are proceeding in this Court, the other proceedings are taken in n any other country"; and again, nworth, in The Carron Iron Com-Maclaren (11), says: "Where, , pending a litigation here, in mplete relief may be had, a party nit institutes proceedings abroad, t of Chancery in general considers as a vexatious harassing of the party, and restrains the foreign nga." He then refers to cases where all that would be done would be, not election, but restraining the foreign proceedings. He refers to cases where there has been a judgment in the English action under which the parties suing abroad can obtain perfect relief, and therefore he does not put it as a question of election; but, in my opinion, the power of the Court to interfere is not restricted to cases where there has been a decree in one of the actions, but exists (on the principle that there shall not be double vexation by the same party with reference to the same matter) where that occurs though one of the proceedings is abroad and the other is in this country.

That being my opinion, I quite agree with the Master of the Rolls in his opinion that we cannot accept Cox v. Mitchell (2) as deciding that this Court has no jurisdiction, simply because one of the actions is in a foreign tribunal, to interfere and put the party suing in both tribunals to his election, or to restrain one of the actions.

Possibly what the Judges in Cox v. Mitchell (2) may have meant to decide was this, that where both the actions are in England, in the Queen's Courts in England, or, under the present law, in Scotland or Ireland, it would be a matter of course to stay one of them, merely from the fact that there is the litigation between the same parties about the same matters; but that where one of the actions is abroad, then it is not of course, but it is a matter of discretion, having regard to the circumstances of the case, whether the Court having jurisdiction is willing to interfere. The distinction between proceedings where they are both in the same tribunal, and where one is in England and the other is abroad, has already been pointed out by the Master of the Rolls, and that may explain why it is of course when both the actions are in England, and not of course when one is in England and the other abroad.

But here, under the circumstances of this case, ought we to exercise a jurisdiction, which I assume we have, and to make the order? In the first place, it is a jurisdiction which we ought to exercise with extreme caution. Stopping in the middle of a suit a plaintiff from going on when he has a right of action as against the defendant, is a jurisdiction which has to be exercised with very considerable caution. I find here very great distinctions as to the two suits. In America there are the company and directors, who are subject only to the jurisdiction of the Courts there. Here we have defendants who are resident in England, and who cannot be made subject to the jurisdiction of the American Courts, at least cannot be made subject to the jurisdiction of those Courts so as to enable any decree made by those Courts to be enforced against them. Under these circumstances one sees at once why a suit was instituted here against the English trustees, and why a suit was thought necessary in America against the company and the directors and the trustees, who are necessarily joined as parties there. Under these circumstances it is not suggested that of these two suits the second is instituted vexatiously, but it is suggested that it is vexatious to go on with both. Now, if I could find a way in which I could properly interfere to say that there should not be litigation in both the tribunals with reference to the same subject-matter I should be inclined to exercise the jurisdiction. But I cannot say here that we ought to come to the conclusion, which is the principle on which the jurisdiction is to be exercised, that proceeding with these two suits in the two different tribunals is vexatious. It may be harassing, no doubt, because it is very harassing to have an action brought against one in any tribunal at all; but that is not enough. It must be vexatiously harassing the defendant on the part of the plaintiff, whose action is sought to be stayed; and one can see, as the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, some things which may make it necessary, or at all events desirable, for the plaintiff, without being vexatious, to prosecute the two suits. Therefore, in my opinion, this appeal must fail. I say nothing about the question of the consolidation, which has already been dealt with by the Master of the Rolls.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. During the whole of Mr. Romer's able argument I have felt strongly that the true answer to it was, not that a case might not possibly be made out in which this Court would interfere to prevent litigation being carried on pari passu at home and abroad, but that this was not that case, and that there were no special circumstances here which would justify the Court in interfering. I agree that it would be most unwise, unless one was actually driven to do so for the purpose of deciding this case, to lay down any definition of what is vexatious or oppressive, or to draw a circle, so to speak, round this Court unnecessarily, and to say that it will not move outside it. I would much rather rest on the general principle that the Court can and will interfere, whenever there is vexation or oppression, to prevent the administration of justice being perverted for an unjust purpose. I would rather do that than attempt to define what vexation and oppression mean. They must vary with the circumstances of each case. I think that Cox v. Mitchell (2) decided nothing more than this—that the mere pendency of an action abroad is not a sufficient reason for staying an action at home, although the causes of action and the parties may be the same. So understood, it seems to me to be common sense. The kind of jurisdiction which the Court exercises over litigation is, as I have said, to prevent what is vexatious. There are many classes of cases in which the Court acts on that principle, which I will not attempt now to enumerate. We are all familiar with them. This particular application is based on the suggestion that the Court ought to interfere to prevent what is called multiplicity of suits, litigation in various quarters of the world on the same subject-matter between the same parties and at the same time. Where there is more than one suit being carried on in the Queen's Courts, it is obvious that the case is wholly different. The remedy and the procedure are the same, and the Court of course cannot avoid seeing that a double action on the part of the plaintiff would tend to manifest injustice. When you get outside the Queen's Courts in England, and to the Queen's Courts in Ireland and Scotland, the law has probably varied a little. At a time when it was difficult to enforce the judgments of one Court of the United Kingdom in other parts of the United Kingdom, it was not unreasonable that the case of Lord Dillon v. Alvares (9) should have been decided as it was. At present I think that case can no longer be cited as conclusive law. With regard to the Queen's Courts abroad and the Consular Courts abroad the same principle no doubt applies. They are Courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction, sufficiently in the nature of English Courts to render it probable that it may be true, as Sir R. Phillimore says, that the English Courts would not favour the institution and the prosecution of litigation both in the Consular Courts and at home. But when you come to the Courts of the United States of America, it seems to me the case is wholly different, and, for the reasons which have been pointed out at length by the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Cotton, it would take a strong case to make me willing to interfere to stay an English action merely on the ground of concurrent litigation in America. That the Court has power to do it, I agree. It is clear, not merely from reason, but from the language of Lord Cottenham and Lord Cranworth, referred to by Lord Justice Cotton, that this Court would do it if necessary, but some special circumstances must surely be brought to the attention of the Court before it will do such a strong thing as to stay an English action because another action was pending between the same parties on the same subject-matter in a foreign Court. I think it is not necessary, that being the ground of my decision, to review the cases that have been cited; I think that none of them will be found to be in the least degree inconsistent with the decision of the Court in this case.

COTTON, L.J.—I wish to add, that which I had omitted, that the case might be very different after decree obtained in either of the suits.

FRY, J. 1882. Dec. 21. } In re WILLOUGHBY-OSBORNE. WILLOUGHBY-OSBORNE v. HOLYOAKE.

Will — Construction — Married Woman — Power — Appointment — Lapse of appointed Share.

By the will of a married woman she declared a desire that it should operate over all property which she had power to appoint, and she named executors and trustees. She then made a specific appointment which failed by lapse:—Held, that the lapsed share belonged to her estate.

On the occasion of the marriage, in 1875, of Augustus W. Smethurst and Theresa Willoughby Smethurst, her father, Colonel George Willoughby-Osborne, settled certain personalty, giving her, in the events that happened, a general power of appointment by will over part of the settled funds, which, in default of appointment, reverted to Colonel George Willoughby-Osborne.

By his will, Colonel George Willoughby-Osborne gave his daughter, Mrs. Smethurst, a general testamentary power of appointment over certain realty, which, in default of appointment, he gave to the children of his son John William; and also gave her a general testamentary power of appointment over one-third of his residuary real and personal estate, and gave that third, in default of appointment, to Algernon and Arthur, the two sons of his son John William.

Mrs. Smethurst died in her husband's lifetime, having made a will, which commenced with the expression:—"I declare this to be my last will, which I desire shall operate upon all property in which I have any interest, or over which I have any power of appointment." She appointed her husband and J. C. Stogdon executors and trustees; and after a number of legacies and provisions (which are sufficiently referred to in the judgment) the will concluded with the following clause: "subject to and charged with the payment of my debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the foregoing legacies, I leave and appoint all other property, both real and personal, which I have power to dispose of, unto and equally to be divided between my said three brothers absolutely."

Mrs. Smethurst had three brothers, one of whom, John William, mentioned above, died in her lifetime. This action was brought by the children of John William, other than Algernon, the eldest son, who was heir of Mrs. Smethurst, to obtain a decision that the lapsed share of their father did not pass by the will of Mrs. Smethurst, but went in default of appointment.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Dauney, for the plaintiffs.—By appointing direct to the objects of her bounty without the intervention of trustees, the testatrix shewed she had no intention of benefiting anybody else—In re Davies' Trusts (1) and Hoare v. Osborne (2). One of the surrounding circumstances, namely, the way the property would go in default of appointment, points to that conclusion.

Cookson, Q.C., and Davenport, for the executors, relied on various clauses of the will, especially the first one, as shewing an intention in the testatrix to appropriate the property to herself, and deal with it as her own; it was, they said, entirely a question of intention. The leaning of the Court was towards a full exercise of the power, and the case seemed covered by In re Pinèdi's Settlement (3) and In re De Lusi's Trusts (4). Hoare v. Osborne (2) was not good law.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.

FRY, J., said,—In my opinion, the testatrix must be deemed to have made the property in question part of her own property. It appears that she was enabled to make a will under three powers of appointment, all of which were general: one was contained in her marriage settlement, dated 1875, one was conferred by her father's will over certain devised realty, and the other was conferred also by her father's will over a certain share of the residue of his general estate.

The question I have to determine has been expressed in this manner:—"The question in all cases of the class now before me is one of intention—namely, whether the donee of a power meant by the exercise of it to take the property dealt with out of the instrument creating the power for all purposes, or only for the limited purpose of giving effect to the particular disposition expressed." That is the way the Vice-Chancellor of Ireland stated the question in In re De Lusi's Trusts (4), and it has been adopted by the Master of the Rolls in Pinèdi's Settlement (3), to which I have been referred, and it undoubtedly expresses the true mode in which the Courts have to determine such cases.

Now there are several indications, to my mind, of an intention to take the property out of the original instruments, and to make it in effect the property of the testatrix. One of the most material of these is the intention, obvious on the face of the whole will, to deal with the property as one mass. She charges the legacies and debts upon the entire property as a single body. She describes that property as her residuary estate, and she leaves it to be divided among three persons, one of whom predeceased her, and hence the question. Let me observe a little more particularly on the structure of the will. The testatrix begins by declaring her desire that the will shall operate upon all property in which she has any interest, or over which she has any power of appointment or disposition—the property in which she has interest, and the property over which she has power, are to be dealt with alike by this will. In the next place, she appoints her husband and a Mr. Stogdon to be her executors and trustees. The effect of that appears to me to be to vest the entirety of the personal estate over which she had the power of disposition, together with the property in which she had interest, in the same executors. Then she bequeaths certain legacies, and then she directs that her jewelry, not mentioned in her will or any codicil thereto, should be sold, and the proceeds should fall into her residuary estate. She has, therefore, described her residue, which she afterwards deals with as her residuary estate. I can hardly imagine a circumstance more indicative of the intention that the residue shall be treated as her own property. And then, subsequently, she having declared that the property is subject to the charge for payment of her debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and foregoing legacies, she leaves and appoints all other property, both real and personal, of which she has power to dispose, unto and to be equally divided between her three brothers. I think, therefore, there is to be found a clear intention that the residue shall be one, and that the residue shall be treated as hers. If I find that, it is sufficient to take it out of the operation of the previous instruments.

Some difficulty might be created, no doubt, by the case of Hoare v. Osborne (2), to which I have been referred, a decision of the learned Vice-Chancellor Kindersley. It appears to me that that case is not consistent with some of the subsequent decisions, and I can hardly help expressing my doubt as to the soundness of the reasoning in that case. It proceeded on this footing—a married woman cannot dispose of the fee-simple of land; a married woman cannot dispose of personal estate, unless it be settled to her separate use; a married woman can dispose of both real and personal estate by virtue of a power of appointment. If, therefore, argues the Vice-Chancellor, she makes it her own, she can only dispose of it by virtue of a power of disposition incident to property; but she has no such power, therefore her disposition would fail. The result is that no expressed intention of making it her own can prevail over the expressed intention to dispose of it. If it is her own the disposition fails; if it is not, it succeeds. That is the reasoning of the learned Vice-Chancellor. Therefore, in the case of a married woman, he declined to hold any thing sufficient to make it her own property, because he held that that would defeat the entire object of the appointment. With great deference to the learned Judge, whose decision I view with the highest respect, I am unable to follow that reasoning. It appears to me that the sound conclusion from a will of that description is this: that the appointment shall operate, but it shall operate as if the property had been her own, and she had power to will it. In that manner I give effect to both the expressed intentions: the expression of intention that it shall be disposed of, and the expression of intention that it shall be treated as if it were her own. I therefore think that where, as in the present case, I find a declaration that the property is to be deemed hers, and a declaration of intention to exercise her power of appointment, there is nothing to prevent its being appointed as if it were her own. I hold, therefore, that the plaintiffs' case has failed.

Where no principal or interest in respect of a mortgage debt has been paid, and no acknowledgment in writing has been given for the space of twelve years, no action will lie on the covenant to pay.

The 8th section, which bars the mortgagee of his remedies against the mortgaged land after the expiration of twelve years without payment or acknowledgment, bars also his remedy under the covenant of the mortgagor for payment of principal and interest.

Dictum of JESSEL, M.R., in In re Venour's Settled Estates (45 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 409; Law Rep. 2 Ch. D. 522, at

p. 525), that marginal notes to the sections of an Act of Parliament are part of the Act, corrected.

Hunter v. Nockolds (1 Mac. & G. 640, 651; 1 Hall & Tw. 644; 19 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 177) explained or overruled.

This was an action brought by the widow and executrix of G. F. R. Sutton, who died on the 8th of March, 1870, claiming an account of what was due to her, as such executrix, for principal money and interest on a covenant contained in an indenture of the 13th of May, 1868, made between the defendant of the one part, and the testator of the other part.

The writ in the action was issued on the 13th of March, 1882.

The indenture, as set forth in the statement of claim, merely shewed a covenant, whereby the defendant, in consideration of a sum of 1,850*l.* advanced by the testator, covenanted with the testator, his executors, administrators and assigns, to pay, or cause to be paid, on demand, to the testator, his executors, administrators or assigns, the sum so advanced, and interest for the same, or for so much as should for the time being remain due upon the security of the said indenture, at five per cent., and also, on demand, to pay, or cause to be paid as aforesaid, all costs of and relating to the said indenture and attending the execution of the trusts and powers therein declared.

The claim also stated that sums amounting in the aggregate to 1,003*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* had been paid by the defendant to the testator in his lifetime in part repayment of the principal and interest; the last repayment was made on the 29th of January, 1869; and that no payment on account of principal or interest had been made since the testator's death.

By his statement of defence, the defendant stated that the indenture of the 13th of May, 1868, was in fact an indenture of mortgage, whereby the principal sum and interest were secured by mortgage of and charged upon one equal undivided third part or share of and in certain lands in the county of Hertford, and that the indenture contained no covenant for principal or interest other than that set forth in the statement of claim.

It also alleged payment of a further sum on account of interest on the 12th of November, 1869.

By the 4th paragraph the defendant stated that no part of the principal, nor any interest thereon, had been paid, nor had any acknowledgment of any right thereto been given in writing, signed by the defendant or any person as his agent or otherwise, to any person entitled thereto, or his or her agent, since the 12th of November, 1869; and the defendant claimed the benefit of the provisions of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, and of all other Statutes of Limitation in bar to the relief sought in the action.

The plaintiff joined issue upon some of the defendant's allegations, and demurred to paragraph 4 as being bad in law, on the ground that the plaintiff's right to the relief sought was not barred by the statute.

Chitty, J., held that the right to sue upon the covenant had not been barred by the statute, and accordingly allowed the demurrer.

The defendant appealed.

Romer, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the appellant.—This is really an action to recover a sum of money secured by mortgage, and falls within section 8 of the Statute of Limitations, 1874, which is identical with section 40 of 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27; and the decisions on the earlier Act are consequently binding in construing the later statute—Harlock v. Ashberry (1). The object of the statute, as appears in the title, is to limit the times within which actions may be brought for the recovery of land or charges thereon.

[Macnaghten, Q.C., objected that the title could not be referred to, and cited Hunter v. Nockolds (2).]

[Jessel, M.R., said that the title and preamble could be looked at, but that his statement in In re Venour's Settled Estates (3) that the marginal notes could be referred to was incorrect.]

Sutton v. Sutton, App.

Williams (4) decides that an action for the recovery of money on a covenant or bond accompanying a mortgage-deed was within section 40 of the earlier Act. Wrixon v. Vize (5) was also referred to.

Macnaghten, Q.C., and Etherington, for the plaintiff.—The object of the Act is to protect real property, and to substitute in certain sections of the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27, twelve years for twenty, but leaves untouched the collateral covenant, which is distinct from the mortgage, and the right to sue on that covenant is not barred till after the expiration of twenty years. This was provided by 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 3, which being a later Act than 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27, would prevail. Such is the opinion of conveyancers—see Prideaux (6). In Hunter v. Nockolds (2) Lord Cottenham held that, as against the estate on which an annuity or mortgage was charged, no more than six years' arrears could be recovered; but that in an action of covenant against the covenantor twenty years arrears of annuity or interest of a mortgage might be recovered, but that they formed no charge on the estate beyond the six years.

[JESSEL, M.R.—Henry v. Smith (7) is inconsistent with Hunter v. Nockolds (2).]

They also referred to Lewis v. Duncombe (8) and Strachan v. Thomas (9).

J. G. Wood in reply.

JESSEL, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Chitty. I am sorry to say that no note of the judgment in the Court below seems to have been taken, and therefore I am unable to ascertain the real grounds on which the learned Judge founded his decision.

The sole question that we have to decide is, whether, when no principal or interest in respect of a mortgage debt has been paid, and no acknowledgment in writing has been given for the space of twelve years, an action on the covenant contained in the mortgage-deed is maintainable or not.

That question depends for its decision upon the true construction of the 8th section of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57).

Before reading the section, upon which of course everything turns, I must say a few words, and a few words only, upon the nature or origin of the limitation with regard to the right to sue under such circumstances. The period of twenty years having been established as a bar to actions of ejectment, the same period was extended to actions on bonds by analogy, and became the settled law. After the lapse of twenty years without any payment having been made, it was said that it must be presumed that the debt had been satisfied.

But then, again, that doctrine was extended somewhat, and ultimately it went to this extent—that if the mortgagor remained in possession for twenty years, and did not give any acknowledgment, the mortgage would be presumed to be satisfied. That being the state of the law, the Statute of Limitations which was passed in the reign of William IV. gave the same limitation to the recovery of a mortgage debt. What did that mean? Did it mean to cut down the old right as to presumption of payment? Surely not. The meaning of the Statute of Limitations is not to give a remedy, but to take away a remedy then existing. If, therefore, there is a presumption of payment by non-payment of any portion of the principal and interest, or by not giving an acknowledgment, the statute was not intended to interfere with that, but rather to give legislative authority to that which had previously rested on judicial decision only. I think that is the fair view we ought to take of the statute. If that is so, of course the mere fact of saying you shall not recover upon a mortgage, would not keep alive any remedy upon the mortgage, whether that remedy was upon a covenant contained in the mortgage itself, or whether it was upon the implied promise which is presumed in law from the fact of accepting the loan; because it has been decided that if there is no covenant and no accompanying bond, there is still the implied promise to pay, and if there is a time fixed, either by recital or otherwise, for the repayment, in many cases depending upon the construction of the instrument, the Court will imply even a covenant to pay. That being so, does not every mortgage contain within itself, so to speak, a personal liability to repay the amount advanced? But let us see what this section says—"No action or suit or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment or lien, or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, at law or in equity, or any legacy, but within twelve years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same, unless in the meantime some part of the principal money or some interest thereon shall have been paid, or some acknowledgment of the right thereto shall have been given in writing, signed by the person by whom the same shall be payable or his agent, to the person entitled thereto or his agent; and in such case no such action or suit or proceeding shall be brought but within twelve years after such payment or acknowledgment, or the last of such payments or acknowledgments, if more than one, was given." Now the words that are material are—"No action or suit or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage." It is impossible to say that those words do not include this sum of money. It is a sum of money secured by a mortgage. Then, reading it literally, this is an action to recover a sum of money secured by a mortgage. Those who say it is not to be read literally should shew some reason why. What they say is, that it does not mean to recover any sum of money secured by a mortgage, but that it means to recover the money, so far as it can be recovered, by a sale of the land, or by the receipt of the rents—that is to say, so far as you can get it out of the land. That contention puts words there which are not to be found in the section; and it is more than that, for it gives no meaning to words which are to be found in the section, because you could not get that money as against the land at the period when this Act passed except by a suit in the Court of Chancery. You could not have brought an action at law. There is another reading which makes it much plainer, and that is, that the words "at law or in equity" belong to "action or suit," because the words "at law" have no particular meaning when you have got the words "charged upon any land," and therefore it is probable that the words are not put in their right position. But, to my mind, the result is the same when you find that a proceeding at law is called "an action," and a proceeding in equity is called "a suit"; and when you get the two words "action" and "suit" together, it is plain, to my mind, that those who framed that section meant any proceeding in which any sum of money secured by a mortgage might be recovered. But the section does not stop there, for it says "or any legacy." To my mind there is nothing to cut down the meaning of the word "legacy." The word "legacy" stands there alone following the words "or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent at law or in equity," and it has been decided that it does apply to legacies payable out of personal estate. I think that gets rid of another observation that this Act is obviously and chiefly an Act passed with reference to real estate only, and therefore it was said that you are to restrict this section to real estate, because that is the general purview of the Act. But when you consider that you have the word "legacy" in it, which has been decided to be general and to apply to both real and personal estate, that shews that you cannot cut down the words by reference to the general purview of the Act, and that gets rid of any question as to the preamble or the title.

Then there is an observation to be made as to the result, which would be very astonishing if the man who is to be protected is to get rid of his security. Why? On what principle of justice? The principle always has been either actual satisfaction or presumed satisfaction, or such delay on the part of the creditor as entitles the debtor to believe that he will not be called upon to pay. That is the principle of the statutes which have been passed upon the subject. But can that apply to getting rid of a mortgage, and not to getting rid of a personal demand? The result, to my mind, would be absurd that you should get rid of a greater, so to speak, namely, the security upon the land—and should nevertheless retain the lesser, namely, the personal liability to pay. It is not a decisive or conclusive reason, but it is a reason.

Then it is said that there is another ground in support of the contention of the respondent, because in the case of a bond or covenant not secured upon land, there is no such provision. The only answer to be given to that is, that the Legislature has not provided for every possible case. That is quite true. There is an omission. The same observation would apply to "legacies," to which this section certainly has reference. It has been decided, and in my opinion rightly decided, that the word "legacy" includes a share of residue, but it only includes it where there is an executor named. If there is no executor named, so that the man dies intestate in law, or if he dies actually intestate without having made a will at all, then the section does not apply; and then another Act was passed limiting the period to twenty years, but by some slip it has not been applied in this subsequent Act of Parliament to intestates. So that there again is a case of omission. But that does not, to my mind, give any answer to the argument as to the absurdity of holding that the Legislature intended to retain the mortgage and to leave out the personal liability. In my opinion the literal meaning is the right meaning, and therefore this action is barred as well as regards the covenant as the right to sue.

COTTON, L.J.—This case raises the question whether twelve years is a bar to an action upon a covenant contained in a mortgage-deed to recover money when there has been no money payment or acknowledgment. That question arises under the construction of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57. I think the true principle of construing Acts of Parliament and other documents is to see what is the fair and reasonable construction of the words themselves, and to apply them accordingly; and if Parliament has used language which does not express what the intention was, it is the duty of Parliament to correct its language; and I think the Courts have involved themselves into great difficulty when they attempt to alter the fair meaning of a clause in an Act of Parliament by framing what, in their view, would have been a better enactment. Of course where there is an obvious absurdity from reading it in a literal way, and where there are doubtful expressions which may bear two meanings, one must not give a construction which will tend to an obvious absurdity. But, to my mind, there is no absurdity in reading this section grammatically and construing it according to ordinary rules. It reads: "No action shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage"; and then it goes on to something else. I think that the words "action or suit" would apply to an action at law as well as to a suit in equity; but I think that the words "at law or in equity" are not very correctly brought in their right place, but that the words do apply "to actions, suits or other proceedings." If so, it makes it undoubted that the words "or other proceeding" apply to other proceedings at law or in equity. Even if that is not so, I think that the words "action or suit" sufficiently point to the nature of the proceedings. Then, what have we here? We have an action brought to recover a sum of money which is secured by mortgage, and that being so, this action does come within the express provision of this statute. That being so, how is it sought to be maintained that twelve years is not a bar? One difficulty I have felt has been in consequence of the case decided by Lord Cottenham, and in which he expressed an opinion that, although in actions brought to recover money issuing out of the lands only six years' interest could be allowed, yet he based his decision upon this ground—that one must take the two statutes, 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27, and 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42, together. That might be right under the circumstances. He was driven to that by this consideration, that the one Act was passed only three weeks before the other, and therefore he said you must take the two together, and take the later one only as an explanation of the other Act. I think we are not in any such difficulty here, because the section we have to construe is contained in an Act passed in the year 1874, and therefore there is no necessity for construing this so as to leave the same bar to an action on the covenant as that which is provided by section 42 of the earlier Act. There is no necessity to follow in this case the mode in which Lord Cottenham dealt with the two Acts passed almost simultaneously.

The other ground of contention is this, that this Act was intended to bar actions for the recovery of land or for enforcing charges thereon. That is the primary object of the Act; but still, although it is an Act having that primary object, we find that the clause in question, according to its true construction, goes somewhat beyond that, and does something more, in my opinion, than limit its application to those actions which are the primary objects of the Act. I think it would be wrong to hold that this section ought not to have its true construction. That being so, in my opinion, the true construction is in accordance with that which would make twelve years a bar to any action upon the covenant, since it is an action to recover money charged upon land. The contention of the respondents here is, that you must treat this as a section preventing your enforcing any charge upon land, whether it be by mortgage, charge or lien. That is not what the section says; and that being so, I do not see how we can alter the language of the section, and give it a different meaning from that which I think it bears.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think this case falls within the exact words of the Act. I start with this, that section 8 of the Real Property Act, 1874, appears to me clearly to apply, and was meant to apply, not only to suits in equity, but to actions at law. It may be that the words "at law or in equity" are placed out of their ordinary position. I think that may be so; but whether they are placed in their right or their wrong position, clear it is that the section means to deal with actions at law as well as with suits in equity. If the judgment of the Court below is right, to what possible action at law could this section apply? There were two ways of suing at law when there had been a mortgage transaction. One where there was a covenant upon the express covenant; but if there was no covenant, the law presumed an implied promise arising out of the transaction itself to repay the money either at a fixed or an uncertain date—a promise which might, according to the character and construction of the document, be either a simple or a special contract. This particular action is an action of covenant. If this section applies to common law actions, and does not apply to an action of covenant, what does it apply to? It must apply to this action, which may be said to be a common law action on an implied promise. What an extraordinary result would follow if it was decided that the section did not deal with express promises, but dealt with implied promises. What possible grounds in reason could there be for putting that interpretation on the plain words of the section? It seems to me that the words themselves are really clear—"No action, suit or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage." Does not that mean that no action or suit shall be brought to recover any sum of money which is secured by any mortgage? If that is the true construction, this is a sum of money which is secured by a mortgage, and the section does apply. It has been contended by Mr. Macnaghten that we are to read it in a non-literal sense, and that the words "sum of money secured by any mortgage" do not mean a sum which is secured, but as if it was "to recover any sum of money so far as it is secured." The first objection to that is that it is not the language of the section, and I think we ought to keep to the plain words of the Act of Parliament where we can. The second objection to it is, that it gives no meaning whatever to the word "action," because there was no such thing, so far as I know, of an action which could be brought to recover a sum of money so far as it was secured.

The preamble of the Act, it is said, shews that the only actions which were intended to be limited in time were actions which related to real property. I do not think that the preamble can be taken to have cut down the express provisions of the statute, especially as there does not seem to be anything inconsistent with the spirit of the Act.

Demurrer overruled.

[IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.]

1882. Nov. 10, 13. NOBEL'S EXPLOSIVE COMPANY v. JONES, SCOTT AND COMPANY.

Patent—Infringement by Importation—Custom House Agent.

The defendants, acting as Custom House agents for a foreign firm, passed through the Custom House at London certain goods the importation of which into England was an infringement of a patent belonging to the plaintiffs. The passing through the Custom House was a step necessary to be taken before the goods could be transhipped into lighters and warehoused. The defendants never had possession or control of the goods :—Held, that the defendants had not infringed the plaintiffs' patent.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, which reversed one of Bacon, V.C. The case is reported in the Courts below—49 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 726; 50 ibid. 582; Law Rep. 17 Ch. D. 721.

The appellants were assignees of a patent for the manufacture of "dynamite," and brought this action for an alleged infringement of their patent. The acts complained of were as follows:—

Messrs. Krebs & Co. manufactured at Cologne a substance called by them "lithofracteur," which had been held in this country to be, in effect, the same thing as "dynamite," and could not be imported without infringing the appellants' patent. Messrs. Krebs & Co. shipped to the port of London in 1877 and 1878 several cases of lithofracteur, consigned to Krebs & Co., or assigns. The respondents acted as agents for Krebs & Co. in passing the goods through the Custom House, thereby enabling them to be removed in lighters to Krebs & Co.'s warehouses. In one of the documents necessary for that purpose the respondents' name was given as importers; but their real position as "Custom House agents" only was explained to and understood by the Custom House officers.

The importation licence, the holder of which alone was entitled under the Explosive Substances Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 17), s. 40, sub-s. 9, to a delivery of the cargo, was held by an agent of Krebs & Co. named Sneyd.

The question was, whether by merely acting as Custom House agents, in the manner above-mentioned, the respondents had infringed the appellants' patent.

Bacon, V.C., held that they had; the Court of Appeal were of the contrary opinion.

Aston, Q.C., and Cutler, for the appellants, repeated the arguments used in the Courts below.

Davey, Q.C., and Goodeve, for the respondents, were not called upon.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD SELBORNE), after reading the paragraphs of the statement of claim relating to the alleged infringements, continued:

Therefore there are these allegations—purchases by the defendants from Krebs; importation by the defendants; delivery to themselves on receipt by them; and transshipment and storage by them, either as owners or as agents, in the port of London. If there was no purchase, if there was no delivery or receipt by them, either as owners or as agents, and no act done by them in the way of control over the goods, it seems to me that all the allegations of infringement fail.

The case came by way of appeal before Lords Justices James, Baggallay and Lush. They were all of opinion that the acts proved to have been done were not such acts as are alleged in the statement of claim, and that they were, in point of fact, nothing more nor less than acts necessary for passing through the Custom House goods belonging to other persons, at the request and instance of those other persons; and that there was no receipt of the goods by the defendants, no delivery of the goods to them, no dealing with the goods in any sense or manner by them. The ground of the judgment against the appellants is thus stated by Lord Justice James:—"Is the mere assisting in getting the goods from the ship into a lighter an actionable wrong? What is actionable, and what the plaintiffs' rights are, are shewn by the letters patent themselves. What the rights of the patentee are, and what nobody can infringe is, that the patentee and his assigns, and no other, shall during the term make, use, exercise and vend his said invention. Can anybody say that going to the Custom House, and writing to the Custom House for Krebs & Co., for a warrant to discharge things from a ship into a barge is making the invention? Is it using it? Is it exercising it? Is it vending it? It seems to me it is neither making, using, exercising nor vending the said invention. Krebs & Co. may possibly be supposed to have been using it. Krebs & Co., the persons who had the control over it, or the persons who had the possession, may, in one sense, be said to be using it, having regard, as Mr. Aston said (though I do not think it is necessary for us to determine the point), to the particular nature of the invention in this case which was patented—that is to say, it was an invention in truth, by means of which every drop of the highly explosive thing 'nitro-glycerine' is coated with some other material in such a way as to make it storable, movable and transportable with safety." The Lord Justice says further on, "Krebs & Co. might, in that sense, be supposed to be using the invention. But a man who has no possession of the thing, and has no control over it, and who has no dominion or power to deal with the thing, to whom the safety is of no consequence, or the want of safety is not of the slightest consequence whatever, cannot be said to be using the invention, and that is the only way in which it could be said that these letters patent were infringed. Of course, nobody could pretend to say that was 'making, exercising or vending,' and it does not come within either of those."

Now I entirely concur in every word of that passage of the judgment in which the two other Lords Justices also concur. And it seems to me that the matter so plainly stated, if it be in accordance with the result of the evidence, makes it wholly unnecessary to go into the ulterior questions of law, whether the doctrine laid down as to user in the case of Neilson v. Betts(1) is really and truly applicable to what is alleged to be user in the present case. I only refer to that question of law for the purpose of guarding myself against being supposed either on the one hand to assent, without hearing the argument on the other side, to Mr. Aston's way of putting it, or on the other hand to decide a question which does not appear to me to call for decision in this case. Supposing that this was a case of Betts's Patent, it appears to me that upon the acts shewn to have been done by the present defendants it would have been impossible to say that there was any user by them of the capsules. I cannot go upon suspicion; I can only look at the evidence. The burden of proof is upon the plaintiffs. If the plaintiffs have given no evidence whatever to shew either user by the defendants or possession de facto or constructive possession, it is manifest that, whatever else they did, the defendants did not use these goods. Most assuredly, as the Lord Justice says, they did not make or exercise or vend this invention. They may or may not have been contributing some assistance to somebody who might be in the position of infringing this patent. That may have been a wrong thing to do; but they did not directly or indirectly themselves make, exercise or use the invention; they did not infringe the patent; and the present action, brought against them and against them only, cannot be sustained.

[His Lordship then reviewed the evidence, and continued:] The inference is, that the defendants did nothing whatever but pass these cargoes through the Custom House, doing those acts and only those acts which by law were required for that purpose, and doing them at the instance and at the request of the agent for Krebs & Co., gratuitously in substance. It appears to me that that is quite consistent with the single expression in the documents which is fastened upon by the appellants, where Meyer, the defendants' clerk, is described as clerk to the importers. The defendants had undertaken to act as the agents of the importers for the sole purpose of passing these goods through the Custom House, in the course of which process it was that that description was used.

It appears to me that we have nothing to do with any question as to what would or would not be an infringement of an injunction granted in a suit in particular terms, which the Court which granted the injunction would properly judge of. We have nothing whatever to do with the question what would or would not have been the liability of Krebs & Co. for the things which were here done. They were the doers of those things as far as the position of owners, or the fact of possession, went, and the only doers. They did indeed employ the agency of the defendants—and agents employed to infringe a patent may be liable in an action for infringement; but the agency was not to infringe the patent. The agency was simply to remove certain legal difficulties in the way of the passage of the goods from the ship in which they were, for the account and at the risk of the true importers, Krebs & Co., into a lighter of theirs supplied by them; and nothing whatever was done by the defendants except to comply with certain provisions of the law relative to that purpose.

I think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is unquestionably right, and I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD BLACKBURN.—I am of the same opinion. If the plaintiffs had been able to make out that the defendants had done what they in the plaintiffs' statement of claim are said to have done—namely, imported and used this patented article—there can be no doubt that they would have been guilty of an infringement of the patent, and that an action at law or a suit in equity could have been maintained against them. The first question is, What are the facts as to what they did?

[His Lordship then examined the evidence, stating that it shewed the defendants to have merely passed the goods through the Custom House, and continued:]

But the Vice-Chancellor besides that says, "Assuming all that Mr. Meyer and the other witnesses said and did to be true, I cannot resist the written and other evidence that upon three several occasions the defendants did procure the delivery and transhipment of the goods mentioned, nor can I doubt that such delivery was a user of the plaintiffs' invention, in infringement of the plaintiffs' rights under the patent." There I must say I cannot agree with the Vice-Chancellor. I agree that whoever in any way "uses or vends or exercises" a patented article does commit an infringement on the property of the patentee in that article; and although the present plaintiffs were not originally the patentees, they had on the 23rd of April, 1877, become the assignees of the patent, and anything that was done which amounted to a user of the patented article subsequent to that date would be an infringement of their property. I do not think that it would be material, in order to support an action for the infringement of their property, to shew that it was knowingly infringed. Whether it was done knowingly or not it would equally be an infringement of their property. But if it was necessary to shew that it was done knowingly I think there would be strong ground for believing that Jones & Co., who had been partly concerned in the former litigation, knew quite well that this was an article which, as the plaintiffs alleged, and, as it turned out subsequently, correctly alleged, was an infringement of their patent. And accordingly, if the defendants had in any way used this article, I should have been inclined to support that case.

But what the defendants say, and I think say truly, is this—that they did at the request of Nursey, who was the agent of the actual importers, the persons who manufactured the article, enter the ship at the customs and pass it. It was necessary under the various Acts of Parliament for protecting the revenue that that should be done. They say, "We did that. We removed that obstacle which was in the way of landing the goods from the ship to the shore." And further, under the Explosives Act it was necessary that they should have a licence to import, and that various precautions should be observed to secure the safety of the public when that article is dealt with. The defendants did upon the face of the document, avowedly acting for the patentees, as agents, apply for and obtain leave that these goods should be landed upon the proper conditions being fulfilled (and it appears that those conditions were all fulfilled), and that is all. Jones & Co. did therefore (to use a figure of speech which I used in the course of the argument) apply for the key to unlock two doors which prevented the goods being landed from the ship in the Thames to the shore; it was that, and no more. Can that in any sense of the word be called "using" the patented article? I think not.

Mr. Aston argued that if an injunction had been obtained by the present plaintiffs (it was not obtained by them, but by their predecessors in title), and they had applied against the present defendants upon the ground that the passing of the ship through the Customs and obtaining permission to land the articles was a breach of the injunction, it would have been held to be a breach of the injunction. I do not say whether it would have been or not; but I do say that that is quite a different thing from bringing a new, fresh and substantive action against the present defendants—that is to say, against persons against whom they had not got an injunction.

I quite agree that when it is a question of the use of a patented article it is important to see what the nature of the patented article is; for a dealing with the article in a particular way which would have been a use of it if the object of the patent was one thing, might not be a use of it if the object of the patent was another thing. In that I agree entirely, and I will not enter into the enquiry, which might be rather a nice one, whether, the object of this patent being to render an explosive article less dangerous, less liable to explode, than it otherwise would have been, any one who puts himself in the position of having used the article in that shape might or might not be said to have used the patent. That is a nice question. But what I do say is that Jones & Co. upon this evidence are not in that position at all. They never used the article itself; they never had anything to do with it; they did nothing whatever except take steps to remove the two obstacles which were imposed by the Legislature, not for the benefit of the patentee, but in the one case against a breach or infringement of the revenue laws, and in the other case against the danger that the article would explode and do mischief. How in any sense taking those steps to remove these two obstacles can be said to be a user of the patent has never been made clear to my mind. I am quite clear that it is not; and consequently, the defendants never having been shewn in any way to have used or in any other way to have infringed this patent, I think that the action against them ought not to succeed, and that therefore the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed with costs.

Lord Watson.—The only question in this case is, whether there has been a user or exercise of the appellants' patent by the respondents. The facts of the case, as appearing from the evidence, do not, to my mind, admit of any doubt. Krebs & Co. were the importers of three different parcels of lithofracteur, which were manufactured by them in Cologne, shipped to the Thames under bills of lading in their names, and then delivered to them and placed in their stores at Benfleet. All that the respondents did on the occasion of each of these shipments was to pass the goods through the Custom House on behalf of Krebs & Co., and also to obtain from the proper authorities a warrant for delivery to an owner in terms of the Explosives Act, 1875; they never were in possession of the goods or had any control over them. I assume for the purposes of this case that the use of the appellants' invention was continuous from and after the time when the lithofracteur in question was made up. It does not appear to me to be necessary to decide that point, because, assuming it to be decided in their favour, the appellants have, in my opinion, failed to shew that there was any use of their patent by the respondents. It is not disputed that the lithofracteur was manufactured in terms of the appellants' patent; and upon the construction of the patent which I have assumed the respondents might have been held to have used the invention, if the imported article had come into their possession, or even if they had acquired over it a certain measure of control. But I cannot discover a single fact in the connection of the respondents with these transactions of Krebs & Co. which can in any reasonable sense be characterised as a use by them of the lithofracteur or of the appellants' invention.

I have not thought it necessary to express my opinion in this case at any length, because I entirely agree with the observations made by the Judges of the Court of Appeal in deciding the case against the appellants.

LORD BRAMWELL and LORD FITZGERALD concurred.

RIDLER v. RIDLER.

Fraudulent Settlement—Intent to Defeat or Delay Creditors—13 Eliz. c. 5.

In 1877 R. R. made a voluntary settlement of leasehold property worth about 200*l. a year, held by him at a rent of* 3*l.* 10*s., his only other property being some furniture worth* 200*l. and a debt of* 1,500*l. due to him from his son R. H. R. His only liability was that incurred under a guarantee which he had previously given to the W. Bank to secure R. H. R.'s account to the extent of* 1,000*l. At the date of the settlement R. H. R.'s account was overdrawn to the amount of* 1,515*l. In* 1880 R. H. R. filed a liquidation petition, and paid a dividend of 3*s. in the pound, his debt to the bank being* 1,337*l. On the death of R. R. the bank endeavoured to set aside the settlement:*—Held (reversing the decision of BACON, V.C.), that, under the circumstances, the settlor ought to have treated his liability under the guarantee as being an actual debt of 1,000*l., that he ought not to have treated the* 1,500*l. due from his son as assets available for the payment of such debt, that the effect of the settlement, therefore, was to leave the settlor with assets insufficient to discharge his existing liabilities, and that the settlement was therefore invalid as tending to defeat or delay his creditors.*

The doctrine of Price v. Jenkins (46 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 805; Law Rep. 5 Ch. D. 619) does not apply to cases under 13 Eliz. c. 5.

On the 31st of December, 1872, Richard Ridler gave to the Worcester City and County Banking Company a written guarantee for the payment of the balance which should for the time being be owing on the account of his son, R. H. Ridler, up to the amount of 1,000*l.*

In May, 1877, R. H. Ridler's account was overdrawn to the extent of 1,515*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.*, and on the 25th of that month R. Ridler executed an assignment of certain leasehold property to his son F. W. Ridler upon trust for himself for life, and after his death for his son F. W. Ridler and his daughter Ellen Maria Ridler. The settled property was worth about 210*l.* per annum, and was held by R. Ridler for the residue of a term expiring in 1893 at a rent of 3*l.* 10*s.* per annum.

At the date of the assignment the settlor had no other property except some furniture worth about 200*l.*, and a debt of 1,500*l.* due from Richard H. Ridler. His only liability was under the guarantee which he had given to the bank.

In July, 1880, R. H. Ridler filed a liquidation petition, and his creditors accepted a composition of 3*s.* in the pound.

The bank then sued Richard Ridler on his guarantee, and on the 24th of November, 1880, he died. In an action for the administration of his estate a decree was made, and the bank were admitted creditors for the amount of the guarantee, and interest from the date of the writ in their action and costs.

At the instance of the bank, who had obtained liberty to attend the proceedings in the administration action, enquiries directed against the validity of the settlement were added to the judgment.

From an affidavit filed by T. W. Ridler, it appeared that at the time of the execution of the settlement R. H. Ridler was solvent and well able to pay the 1,500*l.* due from him to the testator, and that nobody suspected that he was likely to fail. The deponent also swore that the testator made the settlement for the purpose of conferring a benefit upon his sister and himself, equivalent to a gift of 1,200*l.* which he had already made to R. H. Ridler for his advancement.

The chief clerk having declared the settlement valid, the bank took out a summons to vary the certificate in that respect, which was adjourned into Court and heard on the 6th of May, 1882.

C. H. Turner, for the bank.—The case is covered by the authority of Townsend v. Westacott (1) and Crossley v. Elworthy (2).

Hemming, Q.C., and Yate Lee, for the respondents, referred to Price v. Jenkins (3) and Ex parte Doble (4).

They were stopped by the Court.

Turner in reply.

BACON, V.C., being of opinion on the facts that it would be against the authority of the statute to say that the deed was fraudulent, dismissed the summons.

The bank appealed.

Davey, Q.C., and C. H. Turner, for the appellants.—The settlement was upheld by the chief clerk on two grounds—first, that the appellants were not strictly creditors at the date of the deed—that is, there was no debt due to them; secondly, that there was nothing to shew an intention on the part of the settlor to defeat his creditors. The Vice-Chancellor was against us on the latter point only.

As to that, the Court will take the settlor to have intended to defeat or delay his creditors, if that was the necessary effect of the settlement—Townsend v. Westacott (1), Spirett v. Willows (5) and Freeman v. Pope (6). It is not necessary for any debt to be actually due; the Court will infer intention to defeat creditors where a man settles nearly the whole of his property previously to embarking in a risky trade—Crossley v. Elworthy (2) and Mackay v. Douglas (7).

[JESSEL, M.R., referred to Ex parte Russell (8).]

Here the settlor must have known that the debt due to him from his son was not safe, inasmuch as the bank would not trust the son without the father's guarantee.

It is said on the authority of Price v. Jenkins (3) that because the trustee took upon himself the liability to the rent of the leaseholds, that therefore the settlement was not voluntary. That was a case under the 27 Eliz. c. 4, and must not be applied to other statutes—Ex parte Hillman (9).

Hemming, Q.C., and Yate Lee, for the respondents.—The question in all these cases is, was there any intention on the part of the settlor to defeat or delay creditors? Of course the Court will infer such intention where the settlement is of such a nature as that its necessary effect must be to defeat or delay creditors, as in the case of Townsend v. Westacott (1); but it is not enough that the settlement may have that effect.

[JESSEL, M.R.—Do you dispute the law as laid down in Freeman v. Pope (6)?]

No; but the Court will not extend the rule in that case. The judgment must be read with reference to the facts. There there were present debts, and the Court would not apply the same language to a case where there are only contingent liabilities which probably will never ripen into debts. Suppose the case of a man having backed a bill for a large amount which is already backed by Rothschilds or Barings. If the parties primarily liable failed, could it be said that a settlement which had been made by him before their failure was made to defeat or delay creditors?

[LORD SELBORNE, L.C.—Where the probability of the settlor's being called upon in respect of paying a contingent liability is so remote as hardly to enter into any one's calculations, it would be hard to say that the settlement was bad. For instance, if a holder of shares in the Glasgow Bank had, in the time of its prosperity, made a settlement, it would be difficult to say that such settlement was invalid, although the liability ultimately proved ruinous.]

Here R. H. Ridler was solvent at the date of the settlement, and the father was therefore in a position to meet all his liabilities. Looking at the depressed state of agriculture during the last few years, it does not at all follow that a farmer who was insolvent in 1880 was insolvent three years before. Price v. Jenkins (3) and Ex parte Doble (4) are in our favour.

[JESSEL, M.R.—Price v. Jenkins (3) was a decision on the statute 27 Eliz. c. 4; can it apply to the 13 Eliz. c. 5?]

The question whether a transaction is for value or voluntary must be the same under both statutes. Again, the settlor did not settle the whole of his property; he retained his life interest.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD SELBORNE).—The arguments on behalf of the respondents turned much on the proposition that when a person is liable on a guarantee he is not to be regarded for the present purpose as owing a debt of that amount without taking into account the assets of the principal debtor as well as his own. There is a fallacy in this. To hold that a guarantor can make a voluntary settlement of the whole of his property, and support it by shewing that when he made it the person guaranteed had assets enough to pay the amount guaranteed, would go far to defeat the contract of suretyship. We must look at the matter as if the event had really happened the possibility of which the parties must have had in contemplation when the guarantee was given of the debtor being unable to pay. I do not think that any close enquiry as to the supposed capacity of the person guaranteed to pay the debt ought to be entered into. I do not say that there might not be a state of things in which the liability of the guarantor might be so remote that it need not be regarded; but if he conveys away all his property by a voluntary settlement I think it doubtful whether the settlement could in any case be supported in the event of his ultimately being called on under his guarantee. Here the son had no margin of property beyond what was employed in his farm, and what he had borrowed from the bank, for which the bank would not give him credit without a guarantee. I think that he had not assets to such an extent as to prevent the father's liability under the guarantee from being a serious and substantial one at the time when the settlement was executed.

Unless, then, we are to enter on a speculation as to what the son's capacity for payment was at the time of the execution of the settlement, we can only consider the state of the father's assets. They consisted of a debt of 1,500*l.* due to him from the very person for whom he had given the guarantee, and furniture not exceeding in value 200*l.* The debt due from the son cannot be looked upon as an available asset for meeting the liability on a guarantee given for the son.

It is urged that as the son, even after several years of agricultural depression, paid a dividend, the debt due from him must be considered as having been of substantial value at the time of the settlement; that the life interest retained by the father must be taken into account; and that taking them together the father retained assets more than sufficient to meet the liability in the guarantee. I think that this argument cannot prevail. The statute speaks not only of defrauding, but of delaying or hindering creditors. Now a voluntary settlement of this kind would certainly tend to delay or hinder creditors, even if we took the sanguine view of the settlor's assets which was urged at the bar.

In re Ridler, App.

The father when he made the settlement must have known that if the son could not pay the balance to the bank, he himself, if the settlement was sustained, would have substantially nothing available to meet the liability under the guarantee but such dividend as he could get from the son's estate. I am of opinion that a settlement made under such circumstances cannot be supported against the creditors.

JESSEL, M.R.—I am of the same opinion, and will only add a word as to my observations upon Price v. Jenkins (3) in Ex parte Hillman (9). I give no opinion whether I should have come to the same conclusions as the Judges who decided Price v. Jenkins (3). Treating that case as well decided, I think it has no bearing on cases under the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5. That statute excepts from its operation estates and interests conveyed "upon good consideration and bona fide." What was the meaning of "good consideration" in that exception? It could not mean that if some obligations attaching to the property went to the new owner in exoneration of the settlor that made the conveyance a conveyance for valuable consideration. Consider the consequences of such a proposition. Suppose a man transfers 10,000*l.* worth of railway shares or bank shares which are not fully paid up, is that prevented from being a voluntary transfer by the mere fact that the transferor is exonerated from the liability to calls, and the transferee becomes subject to it? If a man makes a settlement of a large freehold estate along with a small leasehold, is the settlement made for valuable consideration within the meaning of this statute because the grantee becomes liable to the rent of the leasehold in exoneration of the settlor? Whatever may be held under the statute 27 Eliz. c. 4, the undertaking the liability to rent is not a good consideration within the meaning of the statute now before us.

COTTON, L.J.—I also am of opinion that Price v. Jenkins (3), which was decided upon the construction of another statute, has no bearing on the present case. It had been decided under the statute 27 Eliz. c. 4, that a voluntary conveyance, though honestly and fairly made, was fraudulent as against a subsequent purchaser from the settlor. Price v. Jenkins (3) qualified that doctrine, and decided that the grantor's undertaking the liability for rent was sufficient to support a settlement which was open to no objection but that of being voluntary. It is a decision of this Court, and we have not to consider whether it was right or wrong, for we are bound by it; but it has no bearing on a case under 13 Eliz. c. 5, where the question is whether a settlement was made with intent to defeat or delay creditors. A man who makes a settlement without leaving himself enough property to pay his creditors must be considered to do it with an intent to defeat or delay them, and a conveyance of leaseholds made for no consideration cannot be brought within the exceptions in the statute by the mere fact that the grantee becomes liable for the rent.

Then as to the point that the settlor was not indebted, but only subject to a liability which might never become a debt. A man is not at liberty to take a sanguine view, but is bound to act upon a reasonable view of what is likely to happen. In the circumstances of this case, any reasonable man must have looked upon this guarantee as one which would probably be enforced, and the settlement must be taken as made with intent to delay or hinder creditors.

Newton Smart and Eustace Smith, for the defendants.—The production ought to take place at Colchester. The proper place for the production of documents is at the office of the solicitor on the record of the party who is ordered to produce them, and the solicitor on the record is the solicitor in the country and not the London agent. The Court has full power to order production in the country. Section 66 of the Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), gives power to order production at the office of a District Registrar. There is no hard and fast rule on the subject—Brown v. Sewell (1). In Draper v. The Manchester and Sheffield Railway Company (2) the production was directed at Manchester.

[PEARSON, J.—That may have been by consent.]

In Bonnardet v. Taylor (3) production was directed at Newcastle. At all events the Court has a discretion in the matter. They referred also to Rules of Court, 1875, Order XXXI. rules 11, 15 and 16, and Daniell's Chancery Practice Forms, 3rd ed. 2213–2217.

W. Pearson, Q.C., and H. J. Hood, for the plaintiffs.—The proper place for production is at the office of the London agents. The old rule was that production should take place at the Record and Writ Clerks' Office, and it was only by indulgence of the Court that this rule was relaxed. Every party to an action in this Court is bound to have an address where writs, &c., can be served within three miles of Temple Bar, and that address is the place at which the documents ought to be produced. The plaintiffs are persons in poor circumstances, and an order that the production should be at Colchester, would, by reason of the expense to them thereby occasioned, in effect prevent them from continuing this action.

They referred to Cons. Order XLII. rules 2 and 3, and to Rules of Court, 1875, Orders IV., XII. rule 7.

Prestney v. Mayor of Colchester.

PEARSON, J.—This is a question which does not very often come before the Court, but, so far as I am able to come to a conclusion upon it, there is no absolute rule which applies to the present case. The ordinary rule I have no doubt is this—under the old practice all deeds and documents ought to be produced at the Record and Writ Clerks' Office. That undoubtedly was modified at a later time by the production being ordered at the solicitors' office. When I come to ask myself who the solicitors are, in a case in which the parties have a London agent and also a solicitor at Colchester, I come myself to the conclusion that the office at which the documents ought to be produced for inspection must be the office of the solicitors in London. Seeing that the rule of the Court is that where there is a country solicitor on the record he is bound to give an address within three miles from Temple Bar where all writs, notices, &c., shall be served, it would be reducing the matter to absurdity to say that whereas all the writs, &c., were to be served at the particular office specified in London, documents of which inspection was required were to be considered as altogether excepted from that rule, and only to be inspected at the solicitor's office in the country. Nevertheless I cannot consider that the power of the Court is so restricted that in a particular case it cannot depart from the rule and order inspection at some place which appears to the Court more proper and desirable; and in fact at very early times the Court departed from the strict rule—for instance, as to books and documents in daily use—saying that it would not put the parties to the inconvenience of producing those books in London when they might be in daily use at Berwick-upon-Tweed. Under these circumstances I have to consider what in this case is the order which I ought to make as to these books on the application by the plaintiffs to have the inspection in London at the office of the London agents, whom I take to be solicitors for the present purpose. It is said on the one side that it is exceedingly important to the plaintiffs that the inspection should take place in London; and Mr. Pearson, arguing for them, told me that it would be an absolute denial of justice if I make any other order than that the inspection should take place in London; and he enlarged on the poverty of the plaintiffs, which he said would put them out of Court altogether and make them unable to go on with the action if the inspection were to take place in the country. I do not think I ought to listen to any argument arising from the poverty of the plaintiffs. I think I must treat the plaintiffs for the present purpose without any regard to whether they are rich or poor, and make exactly the same order in the one case as I should in the other. I do not think if they were rich I ought to say, "because you are rich inspection shall take place in the country;" nor, on the other hand, do I think I ought to say, if on other grounds I think differently, "because you are poor the inspection shall take place in London." I must have regard to all the circumstances of the case and to what seems to me the most proper course to adopt. These are not ordinary deeds and documents: they are old charters, old account books, vouchers of all moneys paid into those accounts, very large and enormous bundles of papers, some of which even without the affidavit of the town clerk I can see for myself must be on loose sheets very easily destroyed and very capable of being lost in transit; the number also is very great, being records of all the deeds and transactions of the Corporation of Colchester, who are the defendants in the action. The loss of these deeds and documents might be very material, not only as regards the corporation itself, but also as regards the rights of other parties who may hereafter engage in litigation with the corporation—rights which I may say have been the subject of litigation constantly in these Courts, and for aught I know may be so again hereafter. Therefore, having regard to the importance that these documents should be carefully preserved, and taking all the circumstances into consideration, and not considering myself absolutely fettered by any rule, I think these are circumstances in which it is right to order inspection at Colchester, with leave to the plaintiffs at the trial of the action, whether successful or not, to apply to the Court for any extra costs occasioned to them by reason of the inspection taking place at Colchester.

I thought at one time that the parties might be able to make some arrangement with regard to those extra costs, seeing that the defendants come here for what I may call an indulgence, though it is very nearly an indulgence of right. But I do not see my way to that at the present moment. I do not see at the present moment how to come to any conclusion as to what would be the right sum to fix, or how I can say that it may not be a great deal larger than any sum I should be disposed to name, or that, if I were to fix a sum, there might not be a more elaborate inspection of documents than there would otherwise be. But when the case comes on for trial, and inspection has been had, the Court will have the materials before it to decide, whether the plaintiffs be successful or unsuccessful, what sum they ought to receive. I decide so far as I can at the present moment, and I can only say that if this case goes higher I hope it may be the cause of the Court of Appeal making some positive rule which may guide Courts below in making such orders hereafter. I direct that the inspection shall be at Colchester.

POLLOCK, B., for PEARSON, J. 1883. Feb. 13, 14.

HARVEY v. THE MUNICIPAL PERMANENT INVESTMENT BUILDING SOCIETY.

Building Society—Borrowing Member—Redemption—Accounts—Premium—Interest.

A building society may properly, if in accordance with its rules, on making an advance to a borrowing member, charge a premium on the amount of the advance proportioned to the intended duration of the loan, and require that such premium shall be added to the principal sum advanced, and interest paid on the whole, and require payment of the premium for the entire period, even in case of the loan being repaid at an earlier date than that to which the premium was calculated.

In accordance with the prospectus and rules of a building society, as construed by the Court, the society advanced to a borrowing member the amount of his shares, charging him a premium calculated on the basis of the advance being for fifteen years; and a mortgage-deed of the property in respect of which the advance was made was executed, by which the premium was added to the principal, and repayment by monthly instalments provided for in accordance with the rules; the instalments for each year being made applicable in paying interest charged on the whole principal sum, made up of the sum advanced and the premium, and in reduction of that principal sum.

The borrower claimed to redeem the mortgaged property before the expiration of the fifteen years on the basis of an account in which, in calculating the extent to which the monthly instalments which had been paid were to be considered as having gone in reduction of principal, and the amount by which the principal remaining repayable had thereby been reduced, he was charged with only a part of the premium, proportioned to the shorter period for which the loan was retained, and no interest was charged upon the premium:—

Held, that the borrower could only redeem on the basis of an account in which the whole premium was charged at the outset and added to the actual sum advanced, and interest was charged on the principal sum so constituted.

The defendant society was incorporated in November, 1874, under the Building Societies Act of that year (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42).

The society consisted of investing and borrowing members, the funds invested by the former class being advanced to the latter class. The shares were of 10*l.* each. On obtaining an advance a borrowing member subscribed for shares up to the amount of the advance, and a premium was also charged him.

The prospectus issued to intending members contained, under the general heading "To borrowing members," the following statements:—

Harvey v. Municipal Building Soc.

"A borrower receiving an advance will be charged a fixed premium of 2*s.* per share per annum, and interest is calculated at the rate of five per cent. per annum only upon the equity of redemption at the end of each financial year." "Advances to borrowers are arranged so that repayments can extend over any period up to twenty-five years, according to tables prepared by the society and annexed to this prospectus." "Borrowers can redeem at any time." "The directors have power to make special arrangements as to advances and repayment of advances." "Under the Act of Parliament which governs this society, borrowers incur no liability beyond the performance of their special contract." "Mortgages by borrowing members may be at any time redeemed by payment of the balance of the amount of capital and premium, with interest only to the date of redemption."

The prospectus also contained a table, called Table II., setting out the "advance and repayment scales," and "shewing the monthly instalments required to repay an advance of 100*l.*, principal, interest and premium, for the number of years set forth, being calculated at five per cent. interest on the annual balances, at a fixed premium of 2*s.* per share, added and payable monthly with the advance." According to this table, for a sum of 100*l.* advanced on mortgage for ten shares for fifteen years, the total payment per calendar month would be 18*s.* 6*d.*, and the total payment per annum 11*l.* 2*s.*

The prospectus also contained a section, setting out, among other "special features of the advance department," that "borrowing members are charged annually only five per cent. interest upon the amount remaining unpaid," and that "mortgages by borrowing members may be at any time redeemed by payment of the balance of the amount of capital, with interest to date of redemption."

The rules of the society, which were issued to actual members of the society only, comprised the following rules:—

"32. The directors shall make advances as funds permit to any amount, repayable in one sum, or by monthly contributions, according to the scales and tables hereto annexed, and such additional scales and tables as they may adopt. The premiums charged on all mortgages shall be due in advance, but, if desired, may be added to the mortgage or paid in cash."

"43. Any member desirous of redeeming the securities held by the society shall be at liberty to do so, upon payment of all sums then due from him for subscriptions, fines and interest, and also the present value of the future repayments, as ascertained by reference to the tables." In 1879 this rule was modified by omitting the words "also the present value of."

The table of advances and repayments annexed to the rules was the same as that annexed to the prospectus.

The rules also included a rule as to arbitration; but it was agreed by both sides at the hearing that no question should be raised with respect to this provision.

The form of mortgage used by the society in lending transactions between the society and its borrowing members recited that, "Whereas the mortgagor, having subscribed for shares in the said society, numbered respectively from to (both inclusive), has applied to the said society to lend him the sum of £ in respect of such shares, and has also offered to pay a premium for such advance, which being calculated according to the rules and by-laws of the said society amounts to the sum of £ , and is to be added to and treated as part of the principal sum advanced, and he has agreed to repay such principal sum by advance instalments of £ each, extending over a period of years, computed from the day of , the first of such advance instalments to become due and be paid on the execution hereof, and the remainder of such advance instalments to become due and be paid respectively on the 1st day of every month during the said period, commencing with the month of next." The mortgage was expressed to be made "in consideration of the sum of £ paid at or before the execution hereof to the mortgagor, out of the funds of the said society, the receipt whereof he doth hereby acknowledge (such sum making, together with the said premium, the full amount of his said shares in the said society)." Then the mortgagor covenanted to pay all advance instalments, fines and other moneys (if any) payable under the agreement and rules, and to observe all the rules for the time being. And the proviso for redemption was expressed to take effect if the mortgagor should pay "all the advance instalments, fines and other moneys which, according to the said recited agreement and to the rules for the time being of the said society, should from time to time become payable in respect of the said shares, and should observe and perform all the same rules and the covenants herein contained."

In February, 1878, the plaintiff, Frederick Henry Harvey, borrowed from the society 380*l.*, in respect of Milton Villas, Addiscombe, for fifteen years, repayable by 180 monthly instalments of 3*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.* each, and subscribed for thirty-eight shares in the society, and executed a mortgage in the form above set out, with a few verbal alterations, being charged for a premium of 57*l.*, calculated at the rate of 2*s.* per 10*l.* share, or 1*l.* per cent. per annum, on the advance, according to the rules. At various subsequent dates, coming down to 1881, the plaintiff borrowed from the society further sums of 1,100*l.*, 900*l.*, 1,700*l.* and 800*l.*, in respect of other properties, for fifteen years in each instance, and repayable by 180 monthly instalments, and subscribed for 110, 90, 170 and 80 shares more in the society, and executed four mortgages in the same form; premiums being charged in proportion to the advances—thus, shortly, subscribing in all for 488 shares, and receiving advances amounting to 4,880*l.*

The plaintiff paid all instalments and other sums demanded on their advances by the society, and on the 6th of August, 1881, long before the fifteen years had expired in any instance, he wrote asking to know the terms on which he could redeem. On the 20th of August the secretary sent him a statement shewing the sum payable on redemption at that time to be 4,443*l.* in all. On the 31st of August, 1881, the plaintiff redeemed the properties by payment of the full sum demanded, but stated that he did so under protest, and asserted that the proper amount was 270*l.* less than he was charged.

On the 10th of September, 1881, the plaintiff issued his writ in the present action; and by his statement of claim he asked for an account and repayment of the 270*l.*, with interest.

The defendant society put in a defence and counter-claim, by which they stated that the amount asked and received by them from the plaintiff for redemption was 427*l.* too little, and claimed payment of that sum.

There were thus three different accounts, made up on three different principles, and the question raised by the action was as to which principle was right.

The principle on which the plaintiff's account was made up was that the total premium on each advance should be divided by the number of months over which the loan extended, and that the sum resulting should be deducted month by month from the monthly payment. The remainder of that monthly payment would then consist in part of interest at five per cent. on the principal sum advanced, the residue being attributed to principal paid off. Thus the premium was separated from the principal sum advanced, and not treated as a part of it; no part of the monthly payments was attributed to interest on premium, and the premium was treated as becoming payable month by month, and not as becoming payable immediately on the advance being made. At the end of the twelfth monthly payment a rest was made, and the total of the sums calculated on the system above stated to have been paid in reduction of principal was deducted from the original principal, and the remaining principal was then treated as the principal sum during the next twelve months, with the result that, the principal being reduced, the sum payable by way of interest was also reduced, and the proportion of the fixed monthly payment attributed to reduction of principal was increased, the premium remaining unchanged. At the end of each twelve months a similar process was gone through. On this principle the principal sum due on the first advance of 380*l.* was 380*l.* at the beginning of the first year, 360*l.* 12*s.* at the beginning of the second year, 340*l.* 5*s.* at the beginning of the third year, 318*l.* 17*s.* at the beginning of the fourth year, and 303*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.* at the end of three years and eight months.

The principle on which the society's first account was made up was that the entire premium for the advance for the whole term was added at the outset to the sum actually advanced, the total sum thus constituted becoming the principal on which interest was to be charged. Then throughout the first twelve months the monthly payments were treated as being made in respect of payment of interest at five per cent. on the principal thus constituted until the whole interest for the year was paid, then the sums subsequently paid in the course of the twelve months were treated as being paid in respect of reduction of principal. At the end of the first twelve months the total sum so calculated to have been paid in respect of reduction of principal was deducted from it, and the remaining principal was then treated as the principal sum during the next twelve months, and so on. The result was that the premium was treated as principal, and interest charged on it, so that there was a smaller annual reduction of principal than by the plaintiff's method, and none at all during the earlier of the twelve months. Then upon redemption before the expiration of the full term, a rebate of premium was allowed, the amount of the rebate being arrived at by deducting from the total amount of premium—first, an amount in respect of premium at the original rate (that is, 2*s.* per 10*l.* share, or one per cent. per annum) on the whole of the sum originally actually advanced, but only calculated down to the date of redemption; and, secondly, a redemption fee of three per cent. on the original actual advance. The residue of the total original premium, after deducting from it these two sums, was then allowed to the mortgagor by way of rebate. On this principle the principal sum due on the advance of 380*l.* was 437*l.* at the beginning of the first year, 416*l.* 13*s.* at the beginning of the second year, 395*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* at the beginning of the third year, 372*l.* 16*s.* 11*d.* at the beginning of the fourth year, and 354*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.* at the end of three years and eight months. Then, after deduction of rebate, the sum to be paid was 325*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*

The principle on which the society's second account was made up was the same as the last, except that no redemption fee was charged or rebate of premium allowed. On this principle the sum due at the end of three years and eight months was 354*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.*

This was the hearing of the action.

Barber, Q.C., and W. W. Cooper, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff was entitled to redeem on payment of the sum calculated by the plaintiff's account. To add the premium to the principal and charge interest on the whole is to make the borrower pay interest on money which he has never had lent to him. And to make the borrower pay the whole premium, though he redeems in a shorter time than that allowed for redemption, is to make him give the same consideration for a less amount of accommodation as he agreed to give for a greater.

This question must be decided on the prospectus and mortgage-deed, and not on the rules, which the plaintiff never saw till the loan was completed; but no one of the three documents supports the society's claim. The society has itself made different claims, and appears to be unable to construe its own documents. They cited Ex parte Osborne; in re Goldsmith (1) and In re Norwich and Norfolk Provident Permanent Benefit Building Society: Smith's Case (2).

T. Terrell and H. Terrell, for the defendant society.—The society is entitled to charge interest on the premium, and to treat the premium as a part of the principal from the beginning. The mortgage is a collateral security and not a primary one; the transaction is really the advance by the society of a member's shares. If the plaintiff were right, and no interest were to be charged on the premium, the table in the prospectus, which is repeated in the rules, would be wrong, and the monthly payments there set out would repay the principal in less than the times fixed for the advances. But they just pay off the principal in the time allowed if calculated on the society's principle—that is, to take such advances and premium together as the original principal, and charge simple interest on that throughout. It is true that as heavy a charge is made by way of premium for a short loan as for a long one; but the object of the society is to keep its money out, receiving repayment by regular instalments, and not to encourage speculative builders to borrow largely and repay quickly.

The mortgage-deed is plainly against the plaintiff, and as he does not seek to alter or reform it, he must have relief upon the principles which it contains—The Solvency Mutual Guarantee Company v. Freeman (3) and Mosley v. Baker (4).

The rules are still plainer. But, even assuming that the plaintiff can disregard the rules and obtain relief contrary to the mortgage-deed, yet the prospectus says clearly that the premium is a "fixed" premium, and that redemption is to be had only by payment of the balance of the amount of "capital and premium," and "with interest," not "with interest and premium," down to redemption. They also cited Seagrave v. Pope (5) and Matterson v. Elderfield (6); and referred to a letter written by the plaintiff to the secretary of the society in May, 1879, after the first three advances, but before the last two, from which it appeared that he then understood the repayment principle to be as the society asserted.

Barber, Q.C., in reply.

POLLOCK, B.—I think I have heard everything that could be urged on behalf of the plaintiff in this case. But the office I have now to discharge is to say what is the contract between these parties. So far as one takes the scope and object of this society, even from its rules, I think that the governing principle of this society, as of all building societies, is to spread the amount which is paid by a borrowing member for the purchase of a house over a certain number of years. That is the intention and the object of the borrowing power, and it is not given in order to enable speculating builders or land jobbers to come into the market backed by the aid of a society of this kind.

What is then the real contract between these parties? Now, without any authority, I should have thought it was tolerably obvious in this case that the mortgage-deed embodying the society's rules, so far as they are referred to by that deed, is the contract which is binding on both sides. If any authority be necessary, the two cases of The Solvency Mutual Guarantee Company v. Freeman (3) and Mosley v. Baker (4), which are binding upon me, are certainly sufficient.

Now this mortgage-deed provides this, after setting out the ordinary introductory recitals, "and whereas the mortgagor having subscribed for thirty-eight advance shares in the society," numbered respectively so and so, "and being desirous of borrowing a sum of 380*l.* in respect of such shares, has applied to the said society to lend him such sum for the period of fifteen years, to be computed from the 16th of February, 1878, and has also offered to pay a premium for such advance, which, being calculated according to the rules and by-laws of the said society, amounts to the sum of 57*l.*, and is to be added to and treated as part of the principal sum advanced, and he has agreed to repay such principal sum by 180 advance instalments of 3*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.* each, extending over a period of fifteen years." Now, not merely by letter but by spirit, what is the meaning of this? The meaning of it is that a certain sum is to be borrowed, but that the borrower is content to pay a premium, and that that premium is to be added to and treated as part of the principal sum. Then that principal sum is to be repaid in accordance with the rules of the society, which means to say that the principal sum, which now ex hypothesi includes the premium, is not to be all paid down at once, but is to be distributed over a certain number of years. But it would, to my mind, be a fallacy to suppose that the principal sum, including the premium, can lose its character in any way because it is to be distributed over a number of years. That is the very object of the society—to enable borrowing members to pay in a number of years what they cannot pay down at any one time. Following that out we then turn to the rules, which are very clear on this head. The 32nd rule says that "the premiums charged on all mortgages shall be due in advance, but if desired may be added to the mortgage." That is not in conflict in any way, but is consistent with the provisions in the deed. Then the 43rd rule, which also has a bearing on the subject, is this: "Any member desirous of redeeming the securities held by the society shall be at liberty to do so, upon payment of all sums then due from him for subscriptions, fines and interest, and also the present value of the future repayments, as ascertained by reference to the tables." Now, what does that mean? It means the present value by reference to the table, which regulates the deferred distribution of the money lent, plus the premium. So that it is as if they had referred to the original sum lent, plus the premium, at any time. That merely means a getting of the same thing. Those are the rules, which seem to me not only not to conflict with the mortgage-deed, but to be perfectly consistent with the mortgage-deed.

Now it is said that the observations, for they are little more, which are contained in the prospectus are in conflict with that. I confess I do not quite see that, if the prospectus is read by an intelligent person who understands the scheme of the society. Without at all saying that any complaint ought to be made against this particular society, I have often had occasion to regret that building societies should not frame their rules in a more intelligible form (because one finds, not so much in this society as in other societies, such as insurance societies, and a great number of others, that they hold enormous sums of money, which are subscribed by the poorer class, especially in the north of England), so that there should be no mistake in the mind of the most ignorant man as to what is the contract into which he is entering. With regard to this case, when the prospectus is read with the contract, I do not think there is any great doubt about it; because when the repayments are described it is in this way: "Tables of repayment, ranging from five to twenty-five years, shewing the monthly repayments required to repay 100*l.*, including principal, interest and premium, are annexed to this prospectus." That leaves open the question entirely as to what is the character of the premium. Then again, "Mortgages by borrowing members may be at any time redeemed by payment of the balance of the amount of capital and premium, with interest only to the date of redemption." Again that leaves it open. Interest upon what? Is that interest upon the bare principal lent, or is it interest on the whole principal? I have already given my reasons for thinking it is interest on the whole principal. Then at page 15 there are these words: "Borrowing members (in addition to a fixed premium of one per cent.) are charged annually only five per cent. interest upon the amount remaining unpaid." That leaves it again open whether you must refer to the rules to see what is the amount remaining unpaid. Then the next words are, "Mortgages by borrowing members may be at any time redeemed by payment of the balance of the amount of capital, with interest to the date of redemption." What is "the amount of capital"? That refers one again to the mortgage and the rules, and it seems to me that "capital" for this purpose includes premium. So that it is, as in all these societies, some arrangement whereby a larger amount of interest is obtained than actually appears under the name of interest. Whether that is done by calling it premium paid down, or premium distributed over a number of years, according to the option of the borrower, or whether it is done by entrance fees or occasional fees, is immaterial. But so it is; and the misfortune is that it is only those who have had experience of these transactions who know that they are really paying more than the five per cent. The answer to that is, that societies of this kind can scarcely carry on their business (they are mostly mutual societies—but, in any case, whether they be or be not, they can scarcely carry on their business) with the risks they run, except by having something to cover more than the ordinary interest which would be paid on the sum of money advanced well secured. The are matters of observation which belong perhaps rather to political economy than to law, and I might perhaps altogether refrain from making them, but I only use them to shew that the terms of the agreement in this case are neither unusual nor reprehensible. There must be judgment for the society on the claim and counterclaim, with costs.

Further consideration.

Christopher Stannard, who died in May, 1851, by his will, dated the 24th of June, 1850, devised and bequeathed his personal estate and a certain freehold property upon trust for his wife and sister equally during their lives, and he directed that upon the decease both of his wife and sister, the moneys arising from all his personal estate and effects entrusted to his executors, together with the money which should arise from the sale of the freehold property, should be applied in payment of certain legacies; and the will then proceeded as follows:—

"Whatever portion of my effects shall remain in the hands of my executors or administrators, or the survivor of them, or &c., after the payment of the abovementioned legacies, I desire to be divided in the manner following—and giving two-thirds to the surviving sisters or sister of my wife or their heirs, and one-third to the children of John and Mary Ann Smith, to each an equal part, on his or her arriving at twenty-one years."

The testator's widow and sister both survived him. The sister died in 1856; the widow died on the 6th of March, 1877.

This was a legatees' action for the administration of the real and personal estate of the testator, and upon the further consideration of the action the question arose, who were entitled to take under the above gift to the surviving sisters or sister of the testator's wife or their heirs.

It was not ascertained what sisters of the testator's widow were living either at the death of the testator or of his widow, nor who were the personal representatives or heirs or next-of-kin of any sister of such widow who died in the interval between the death of the testator and that of his widow. The plaintiff, however, alleged that he was the heir-at-law of any such sister, and, at his request, the class enquiries directed by the decree made on the hearing had not been proceeded with.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Terrell, for the plaintiff.—The word "heirs" must be read literally. The leaning of recent decisions has been strongly in favour of giving the word its ordinary legal sense, unless there is something in the context which clearly shews that it was intended to have some other meaning. The nature of the property bequeathed does not affect the question. In Smith v. Butcher (1), where the gift was a gift of personalty, the Master of the Rolls held that the word heirs must be construed to mean heirs and not next-of-kin, in effect overruling previous cases, such as Doody v. Higgins (2) and Gittings v. M'Dermot (3).

[KAY, J., referred to Neilson v. Monro (7), in which Fry, J., held that Smith v. Butcher (1) did not overrule Doody v. Higgins (2), and did not apply to a case where the gift was substitutionary. He asked the plaintiff's counsel whether they could distinguish Neilson v. Monro (7) from the present case.]

Graham Hastings, Q.C., admitted that it was not distinguishable.

Coltman, for the trustee of the will, and Procter and Wurzburgh, for other parties, were not called upon.

KAY, J. [after stating the terms of the bequest above set out, continued:]—Now the first question is, what is the meaning of the word "surviving"? It cannot mean surviving the tenants-for-life, because if it did, the words "or their heirs," which are substitutionary words, would be improperly used, and in fact nonsensical. It has been suggested that it is possible to read them "and their heirs." I do not think I am bound to do that, and I prefer to give them their natural meaning, because if I do, the word "surviving" may still have a very natural meaning. It may mean surviving the testator, and I so hold. I think the sisters who survived the testator were first of all to take, and that, if any of them should be dead at that date, their heirs were substituted for them. Then comes the question, what is the meaning of the word "heirs"? Reliance was placed on the case of Smith v. Butcher (1), which followed De Beauvoir v. De Beauvoir (8), according to which the word "heirs," unless there is something in the context, must bear its prima facie meaning, and be held to mean heirs entitled to succeed to real estate, and that, notwithstanding that the subject of the gift is personal estate and not real estate. That I take to be perfectly well established. But then comes another series of cases in which it has been held, without, so far as I know, any departure, that if the word "heirs" used in gifts of personal estate is a word of substitution, then that is a sufficient context to shew that the word "heirs" does not bear the meaning of persons who succeed to real estate—that is to say, that in the case of a gift of personal estate to the heirs of legatees by way of substitution, the very fact that it is a substitutionary gift shews that you must not read the word "heirs" in its natural meaning. To this effect are Low v. Smith (9), Gittings v. M'Dermot (3) and Doody v. Higgins (2). But one of the very latest cases on the subject is Neilson v. Monro (7), to which I referred, where the words were "to be equally divided to the children or their heirs" of a person named, words which I cannot distinguish at all from the words here; and in that case, relying on the class of cases to which I have referred, the learned Judge said: "That decision"—that is, Doody v. Higgins (2)—"as it appears to me, has in no way been interfered with by the recent decision of the Master of the Rolls in Smith v. Butcher (1), because there the question arose not as to a substitutional gift, but as to a gift to the heir, being persona designata. In such a case it has been long held that the well known word 'heir' means heir-at-law, there being nothing whatever to alter the prima facie meaning of the word." Therefore, I must hold that this gift being not original but substitutionary, the word "heirs" must have the meaning of next-of-kin—that is to say, according to Doody v. Higgins (2) not nearest of kin in blood, but those who under the Statute of Distributions would be entitled to share as next-of-kin—that is, next-of-kin under the statute, excluding a husband.

MANSEL v. NORTON.

Landlord and Tenant—Agreement by Landlord to pay Tenant for unexhausted Improvements at the Expiration of the Tenancy—Covenant running with the Land.

Under a parol agreement for a lease of a farm for a term of years the tenant went into possession. The lease was to contain a covenant by the landlord to pay the tenant for unexhausted improvements at the expiration of the term, but it was never executed. During the term the landlord died, having devised the farm to the plaintiff for life, with remainders over. On the expiration of the term the tenant gave up possession and the plaintiff went into possession. The question then arose, who was to pay the tenant for the valuation of the unexhausted improvements:—Held, that the obligation to pay for unexhausted improvements was in the nature of a covenant running with the land; and, consequently, that the valuation was payable not out of the testator's estate, but by the plaintiff, as the landlord for the time being.

This was an appeal from a decision of Bacon, V.C.

On the 29th of September, 1873, one Wood entered into possession of a farm in Surrey as tenant thereof to C. Mansel, under a parol agreement for a term of seven years, at the yearly rent of 165*l.* A draft lease was prepared, which contained a covenant by C. Mansel, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, with Wood, his executors, administrators and assigns, that at the expiration of the said term Mansel, his heirs or assigns, would pay and allow unto Wood, his executors, administrators or assigns, for all the tenant's property upon the farm, to be ascertained by a valuation based upon the same terms as that which Wood paid when his tenancy commenced. The lease was never executed owing to disagreement as to a clause which it contained as to the right of shooting upon the farm.

In September, 1875, C. Mansel died, having by his will devised all his real estate to trustees for a term of 1,000 years, upon trust to raise the moneys necessary to be raised in aid of his personal estate for the payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts and legacies, and subject thereto to the plaintiff for life, with remainders over.

After the death of the testator Wood paid his rent to the plaintiff, and on the expiration of the seven years gave up possession of the farm, and, as no incoming tenant could be found, the plaintiff entered into possession of it as the tenant-for-life.

In August, 1880, the trustees of the term conveyed part of the testator's estate, including the farm, for the residue of the term of 1,000 years to secure the repayment of 20,000*l.*

Wood claimed payment from the plaintiff of the sum of 638*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.*, which it was admitted was the outgoing valuation of the "tenant's property" on the farm which an incoming tenant would have to pay. The plaintiff paid this sum under protest, having arranged with the defendants, the trustees of the will, that if the estate of the testator was liable to pay the same, then the sum should be repaid to him by the defendants out of the estate.

This action was then brought to determine that question, and the defendants demurred to the statement of claim, on the ground that the estate of the testator was not liable to pay to the plaintiff the said sum of 638*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.*

The Vice-Chancellor overruled the demurrer, and the defendants appealed.

Godefroi, for the appellants, on stating the facts, was stopped.

either out of the estate or by the remaindermen.

[JESSEL, M.R.—I am afraid you have no charge against anybody.]

Assuming nothing had been said about the tenant's improvements, there would have been in this case, according to the custom of the county, an implied covenant to pay for the unexhausted improvements. But here there was an express covenant by the testator, which excluded the implied covenant, and that express covenant is a personal obligation by the testator to pay.

JESSEL, M.R., said,—It is quite clear that in this case the plaintiff is liable to pay this valuation, and cannot recover the money from the testator's estate. The testator let the land, and by the custom of the county the landlord is primarily liable for unexhausted improvements. No doubt he gets it back in the ordinary course from his new tenant. It makes no difference whether the tenancy is from year to year or for a term. Then the testator dies, having devised the farm to the plaintiff for life, and he, as tenant-for-life, enters into possession of the rents and profits. Under these circumstances who is liable to pay the tenant's improvements? The plaintiff as landlord for the time being is primarily liable to pay them. It is a liability attaching to the land like a covenant running with the land, and the plaintiff, as tenant-for-life, took subject to that liability. He need not have accepted the devise, but he did. Then it is said that because the term of years has been assigned the termor is liable. But that makes no difference. The termor is not liable. It is the tenant-for-life who is the natural landlord, and it appears to me that his liability is indisputable, and that he is not entitled to any indemnity. And there is really no hardship in this, because he has entered into possession and is cultivating the land himself, and will, if he lives long enough, get out of the land the whole benefit of the money he has paid, and it represents his capital or part of his capital. The only case in which he will lose anything will be if he dies soon after; but a tenant-for-life who improves the estate out of his own pocket always runs that risk. I am of opinion, therefore, that he has no claim against the testator's estate, and no equity against the remaindermen. The demurrer, therefore, must be allowed, with costs.

LINDLEY, L.J., said,—I also am of opinion that this claim cannot be sustained. The testator let the farm to a tenant and died before the expiration of the tenancy. On the expiration of the tenancy the outgoing tenant was entitled to be paid for his unexhausted improvements. The question is, who is to pay for them? The plain answer to that is, the landlord. Then who is the landlord? Most certainly the person to whom the tenant has been paying his rent, that is, the plaintiff.

Company — Winding-up — Defaulting Liquidator — Surety — Right to reopen Accounts—Practice.

In the winding-up of companies, where the surety for a defaulting liquidator becomes liable upon his bond, it is not the practice to give notice to the surety of the taking of the accounts as against the liquidator; but if the surety becomes aware of the taking of the accounts and applies for leave to attend, such leave will be granted at his own expense.

H. was appointed liquidator in a winding-up. The G. Society became his sureties for 3,000l., and for that purpose entered into a bond, which provided that the certificate of the chief clerk should be conclusive evidence as between all parties that the bond had been forfeited to the amount stated in the certificate. On the bankruptcy of H. a fresh liquidator was appointed in his place. The accounts of H., which were carried in and vouched without any notice having been given to the society, shewed a probable deficit of 4,500*l.* The society, on receiving notice of the date fixed for the final passing of the accounts, attended and asked to have them reopened in their presence.

The Court allowed the society to have the accounts reopened, on the terms that they should pay into Court the whole of the 3,000*l.* for which they were liable, together with 100*l.* for the costs of such reopening, and should undertake to pay interest on the amount to be found due from them, and pay the costs of the application.

Adjourned summons.

In November, 1880, at a meeting of the shareholders of the Birmingham Brewing, Malting and Distilling Company a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding-up of the company and for the appointment of a Mr. Percevall as sole liquidator. In December, 1880, an order was made that the voluntary winding-up should be continued under the supervision of the Court, and appointing Edwin Hooper joint liquidator with Percevall, Hooper being ordered to give such security as should be approved by the Judge. The security was afterwards fixed at 3,000*l.*, and on the 13th of January, 1881, Hooper entered into his own recognizance for the required amount, and the Guarantee Society on the same day became his sureties for the same sum by entering into a bond, which provided, inter alia, that a certificate, under the hand of the chief clerk for the time being of the Judge to whose Court the matters should for the time being be attached, of the amount which Edwin Hooper as such liquidator was liable to pay and had not paid should be sufficient evidence against him, his heirs, executors and administrators, and against the Guarantee Society, and also as between the society and the obligees, of the truth of the contents of the certificate; and that this bond had become forfeited thereby to the amount of the sum stated in such certificate, and should form a valid and binding charge and claim not only against Hooper, but also against the society and the funds and property thereof, without its being necessary for the obligees to first take legal or other proceedings for the recovery thereof, and without any further or other proof being given, or any action, suit or other proceeding to enforce this bond against the society or Hooper. And it was further provided that Hooper should, on being discharged from the office of liquidator, give notice of the same to the society. In September, 1881, Hooper became bankrupt. On the 8th of December, 1881, an order was made that both Percevall and Hooper should be removed from being liquidators, that they should pass their final accounts, and pay the balance that should be certified to be due from them as the Judge in chambers should direct. This order was carried out and a new liquidator appointed. On the 13th of February, 1882, the accounts of the old liquidators were carried into chambers and vouched, no notice having been given to the Guarantee Society.

On the 28th of July, 1882, the society received a letter from the solicitor of the new liquidator, informing them of the carrying in and vouching of the accounts, and that the result of such accounts would be a probable deficit of 4,500*l.*, and that the 2nd of August had been fixed by the chief clerk for finally passing the accounts. On that day the solicitor of the society attended and requested to have the accounts reopened and vouched in his presence. This application being refused, the society took out the present summons for liberty to attend the passing of the accounts; or, if they had been passed, then that they might be reopened and again gone into, and that the society might have liberty to attend such reopening and repassing.

Rigby, Q.C., and Stock, for the society.—We received no notice in the usual way that we should be required to make good our guarantee. The practice is to allow the surety to be present at the taking of the accounts. In a recent case—Couldery v. Brooks (not reported)—Jessel, M.R., said he would not shut out the society from shewing that the amount charged was not due. son, for the liquidators.—It is not the practice to allow the surety to be present at the taking of the accounts. In In re Lockey (1) the sureties of a committee of a lunatic were held liable on the default of the committee not only for the balance due from him on his account, but also for the costs and expenses incurred in consequence of his neglecting to obey the orders of the Court for the payment of such balance, although the sureties had no notice till afterwards of the default on the part of the committee. Here there is a special provision in the bond that the chief clerk's certificate should be binding on the sureties. The society cannot now be allowed to come in and argue every point in the accounts. The case before the Master of the Rolls was special in its circumstances, and it is only in special circumstances, which do not here exist, that the Court will allow the accounts to be reopened.

Rigby, Q.C., in reply, cited Dawson v. Raynes (2).

[PEARSON, J., in the course of the arguments, said he would ascertain from the chief clerks what was the practice in chambers as to the surety being allowed to attend the taking of the accounts.]

PEARSON, J. (on Jan. 19).—I have made enquiries of the chief clerks of Mr. Justice Chitty, Mr. Justice Fry and Mr. Justice Kay, and have ascertained from them that it is not the practice in chambers to give notice to the surety before the account is taken that it is about to be taken, in order that he may have the opportunity of being present when it is taken; but that if the surety becomes aware that the account is about to be taken, and applies for leave to attend, he will be allowed to attend at his own expense, and that no instance is known of the Court having reopened the account upon the application of the surety because the account had been taken without notice to him.

Now the case which I have to adjudicate upon at the present moment would be a very serious one as regards the practice of the Court if it were not that, from the answers given to me by the chief clerks to whom I have referred, it appears that this class of case is exceedingly rare, so rare that the counsel have been unable to cite to me more than one authority in the books in respect of it, and the chief clerks who have been so good as to answer my enquiries know of no case besides this. The case is simply this: In the winding-up of this company a gentleman of the name of Hooper was appointed one of the liquidators when the supervision order was made, and Hooper, according to the practice of the Court, requiring a surety or sureties, the Guarantee Society became his surety. Under the form of the bond which is now in use in the Court the certificate of the chief clerk on taking the accounts of the liquidators is made conclusive evidence against the guarantor as to the amount due from the liquidator. Hooper became bankrupt in September, 1881, and becoming bankrupt in 1881 the accounts against him seem to have been begun to be taken, I think, in February, 1882. The accounts proceeded from that time until the month of July, when the final balance due from the liquidator was assessed by the chief clerk at a sum of something like 4,500*l.* The Guarantee Society being guarantors for 3,000*l.*, it is perfectly plain that they are liable, and it is not disputed that if that sum of 4,500*l.* is really due from Hooper, the Guarantee Society are liable for 3,000*l.*, the full amount of their bond. Before the certificate was confirmed the Guarantee Society got notice that they would be liable for the whole amount of their bond, and thereupon they took out this summons, the object of which is to have the accounts reopened, inasmuch as they were not present when the accounts were taken. Having ascertained from the chief clerks whom I have consulted that if a surety applied, where there was a liquidator who was known to be a defaulter, for liberty to attend the proceedings, it would be the practice to allow him at his own expense to attend at the opening of the account, I cannot help saying that I think it rather unfortunate that the practice in chambers should not be, that when it is known the liquidator is bankrupt, or, at all events, in such a position as that it is certain he will not be he power, I think, of doing that causing any other parties to suffer by the delay which must take place in consequence of my giving a certain amount of indulgence, at all events, to the sureties. I propose, therefore, on the present occasion to do this:—to allow the sureties to reopen the accounts, but subject to this condition, that they must pay the 3,000*l.* into Court forthwith. They must pay 100*l.* into Court to meet the expense of taking the account, and they must undertake to pay any interest upon the sum that shall eventually be found due from them as from the date of to-day, if the Court shall so order it, when the final certificate of the chief clerk is made. If I were sitting here when the final certificate is made, and I found the result of the opening of the accounts was to leave the whole sum of 3,000*l.* due from the Guarantee Society, I should require them to pay interest as from to-day. I do not say what I should do if something is taken off. It might depend to a considerable degree on the amount taken off; but if the whole sum is left untouched, then I think the Guarantee Society ought to pay interest from to-day, in order that the creditors may not suffer more than they have already by the delay.

The order will go in that form. Mr. Rigby, you must pay the 100*l.*, to meet all costs properly incurred and occasioned by the reopening of the accounts, and you must undertake, if the Court shall so direct, to pay interest as from to-day on the sum found due eventually from the sureties. I have the less hesitation in making this order, because of the two liquidators against whom the account was taken, one is bankrupt, and the other is in such a situation as to lead me to suppose that he would be unable to pay, and I take it he is not able to pay, and I think it highly probable, notwithstanding the affidavit of Mr. Furber, although I give entire credence to what he says, that Percevall and Hooper did not give their solicitors as full instructions as they would have done if they had not been insolvent.

The Guarantee Society must pay the costs of this summons.

FRANCE v. CLARK.

Company—Shares—Transfer in Blank—Mortgage—Power of Sale.

Shares transferable without seal were mortgaged by deposit of certificate and transfer in blank as to the transferee:—Held, that the mortgagee had no power of sale.

In February, 1881, the plaintiff was the registered owner of ten fully paid up shares in the Anglo-Egyptian Banking Company, Limited. The articles of association of the company contain no provision as to the form of transfer of shares.

On the 8th of February, 1881, the plaintiff deposited with Frederick Arthur Clark the certificate of the shares, together with a transfer not under seal, signed by himself as transferor, blank as to the name of the transferee. The deposit was made by way of security for an advance of 150*l.* and interest.

Frederick A. Clark subsequently handed the certificate and blank transfer to W. G. Quihampton, a defendant to this action, in exchange for some securities part of a larger number Quihampton held, to secure a sum of 250*l.*, owing to him from Frederick A. Clark.

In April, 1881, Frederick A. Clark died, insolvent. On the 22nd of June, the defendant Quihampton filled up the blank transfer with his own name as transferee, and sent the transfer so filled up and the certificate to the bank to have the shares registered in his own name. The bank, in accordance with their practice, informed the plaintiff that the transfer had been left for registration, and on the 27th of June, 1881, the plaintiff's solicitors notified to the bank that he claimed a right of redemption. On the 30th of June the approval of Quihampton as transferee by the directors was given by the signature of a director to a new certificate; but such certificate was not sent out: it was in evidence that the old certificate had been marked as cancelled by a clerk of the bank.

This was an action to redeem the shares, the defendants being the administrators of Frederick A. Clark and W. G. Quihampton.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and A. R. Kirby, for the plaintiff.—The mortgage or pledge of the shares conferred no power of sale—Story on Bailments (1). The defendant Quihampton never obtained anything analogous to a legal estate, and if the action of the bank could have been considered to confer such legal estate, it was only after notice of the plaintiff's claim.

Lake, for the defendant Clark.

Glasse, Q.C., and Popham, for Quihampton.—The effect of the transfer in blank was to give the transferee a power to have the shares registered in any one's name to whom he sold—In re The Tahiti Cotton Company; ex parte Sargent (2) and Dodds v. Hills (3). Quihampton was entitled to hold the shares for what was due to him from Clark, and Clark had a power of sale.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

FRY, J. (after stating the facts).—Upon those facts two enquiries arise. The first is as to the effect of the deposit of the blank transfer with the certificate; did that confer upon Mr. Clark a power of sale, or did it merely confer on him a right to perfect the mortgage in his own name or in the name of some transferee of the mortgage? Upon principle I am unable to find why it should create a power of sale. The general rule I take to be clear, that in the case of a pawning of chattel property, the pawnee has no right of sale unless the time be fixed for redemption, or he has given notice of demand requiring payment. The law is so laid down in Mr. Justice Story's well-known book on Bailments—"Where no time of redemption is fixed by the contract, there, upon the general principle of law, the pawnor has his whole life to redeem unless he has previously arranged, as he may, with the pawnee, through the instrumentality of a Court of equity or by notice to pay to the party." I see no reason why the principle which applies to the pawn of visible chattels should not apply to the pledge or pawn of a chose in action.

(3) 2 Hem. & M. 424.

It is, however, said that the point has been determined by the Master of the Rolls in Sargent's Case (2). In that case the question was as to Mr. Sargent's right to be put on the register of the company; and the question whether he was entitled to hold for the amount which was due to him from Cannon, or only for the amount which was due from Fry, was not determined. The simple question was whether he had the legal right to be on the register at all; but it is not immaterial to observe that the Master of the Rolls puts the right of Mr. Sargent, not upon the power of sale of Cannon, but upon a power of transferring his mortgage in Cannon. Speaking of the deposit made by Fry, he says, "he hands to him (that is, to Cannon) also the certificate of shares. I have no doubt that, without express words, Mr. Cannon was authorised and was intended to be authorised by Mr. Fry, if necessary, to fill up the blanks and get the shares registered. The object and meaning of the whole transaction was that if the money was not paid Cannon should do this. Cannon, like every other mortgagee, had a right to reborrow and transfer his security." It appears to me, therefore, that Sargent's Case (2) is no authority for the proposition that a person who holds a blank transfer with the certificate has a power of sale. My conclusion, therefore, is that there was no such power of sale conferred.

The next question which arises is this: did Mr. Quihampton obtain the legal estate without notice of the plaintiff's title? If he did he would of course have a prior title. Now that enquiry appears to me to be answered by the facts which I have stated. The transfer could not be completed until the approval of the directors. The approval of the directors was not given until the 30th of June. On the 28th Quihampton and the company both had notice of the plaintiff's claim. Whatever may have been done therefore in Quihampton's favour after the 28th of June was done in full knowledge of the plaintiff's claim. I hold, therefore, that Quihampton has not made out his title in either of the two views he has contended for. The result is that on payment of the 153*l.* odd, Mr. France is entitled, in my judgment, to a transfer of the shares.

Married Woman—Deed acknowledged—Fines and Recoveries Act (3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 74. s. 77)—Prior Bankruptcy of the Husband—Concurrence of the Husband in Deed acknowledged.

A married woman was entitled to a share in the proceeds of real estate subject to the life interest of the testator's widow. During the lifetime of the tenant-for-life the husband executed a deed assigning all his property to his creditors, and subsequently became bankrupt. After the death of the tenant-for-life the husband joined with his wife in executing deeds, which were acknowledged by the wife under the Fines and Recoveries Act, creating charges on the wife's share of the testator's estate:—Held, that the creditors' deed and the bankruptcy of the husband did not preclude him from joining with his wife in executing the acknowledged deeds, and that the persons claiming under those deeds were entitled according to their priorities in preference to the trustee of the creditors' deed and the assignee in the bankruptcy.

Thomas Jakeman, who died on the 3rd of March, 1862, by his will devised real estate to his wife and her assigns for her life, and after her death to Thomas Capell (since deceased) and William Hall Burnham, upon trust to sell and to divide the proceeds of such sale equally among his nine nephews and nieces in the will mentioned, including Mary Dicks, the wife of William Dicks.

On the 15th of August, 1862, the said

In re Jakeman's Trusts.

William Dicks executed a general assignment of all his estates and effects to William Roberts for the benefit of his creditors, "in like manner as if the said William Dicks had at the date thereof been adjudged bankrupt." This deed was afterwards registered at the office of the Chief Registrar in Bankruptcy.

On the 14th of August, 1866, William Dicks was adjudged bankrupt, and on the 14th of December following obtained his discharge. Albert Coles was appointed creditors' assignee in the bankruptcy.

The testator's widow died on the 17th of January, 1869, and the trustees, Capell and Burnham, sold the real estate, and set aside 734*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.*, being one-ninth part of the proceeds of sale of testator's real estate, which they deposited in their own names with the Northamptonshire Union Bank at Daventry.

By an indenture, dated the 11th of February, 1869, before the sale of the real estate, and made between William Dicks of the first part, Mary Dicks, his wife, of the second part, the petitioner, Thomas Scriven, of the third part, and duly acknowledged by Mary Dicks, the said William Dicks and Mary Dicks, according to their respective rights and interests, assigned to Scriven all sums of money, rents and interests which should become due to them, or either of them, out of the proceeds of sale of the said Thomas Jakeman's estate, as security for the repayment to Scriven of the sum of 40*l.* then advanced by Scriven to the said William Dicks and Mary Dicks, and of such further sums as should be thereafter advanced, not exceeding in the whole 100*l.*, with interest at 5*l.* per cent.

On the 27th of February, 1869, notice of this indenture was given to Capell and Burnham as the trustees of the testator's will.

On the 11th of March, 1869, a further advance of 40*l.*, and on the 13th of March, 1869, another advance of 20*l.*, was made by Scriven to Mr. and Mrs. Dicks on the security of the indenture of the 11th of February, 1869, thus making the total of 100*l.*

By an indenture of settlement, dated the 2nd of April, 1869, and made between William Dicks of the first part, Mary Dicks of the second part, and John Dicks and John Percy Wilding of the third part, and duly acknowledged by Mary Dicks, Mr. and Mrs. Dicks assigned to John Dicks and Wilding the sum of 300*l.*, part of the share of residue bequeathed by the said will to Mary Dicks, upon trusts for the benefit of Mary Dicks, William Dicks, and their three children. Notice of this settlement was given to the trustees of the will.

By an agreement in writing, dated the 10th of May, 1869, William Dicks charged his share and interest in right of his wife and otherwise in the proceeds of sale of the testator's estate with the sum of 50*l.* in favour of the Northamptonshire Union Banking Company; and by an agreement of the 12th of May, 1869, William Dicks charged the same share and interest with 100*l.* in favour of his brother Andrew Dicks. Mary Dicks died the 18th of May, 1869, and after her death William Dicks executed further successive charges on his interest in the said fund in favour of the said Thomas Scriven, Henry Mobbs and John Dimbleby, all of whom were petitioners.

None of the persons in whose favour charges had been executed were aware of the creditors' deed of the 25th of August, 1862, or of the bankruptcy of William Dicks in August, 1866.

In August, 1881, the said William Hall Burnham, as surviving trustee of the testator's will, paid 939*l.* 17*s.* 7*d.*, being the residue, after the retention of certain costs and expenses, of the said sum of 735*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.*, and of the sum of 251*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.*, the accumulated interest thereon, into Court, to the credit of Mary Dicks' share in the testator's residue.

The petitioner prayed that the said Thomas Scriven might be declared to have a first charge upon the said sum of 939*l.* 17*s.* 7*d.*, with interest at 5*l.* per cent., and that, subject thereto, the petitioners, the Northamptonshire Banking Company, Thomas Scriven, Henry Mobbs and John Dimbleby, were entitled to valid charges on the fund in priority to the persons claiming under the creditors' deed of the 25th of August, 1862, and to the said Albert Coles as trustee under the aforesaid bankruptcy of William Dicks.

In re Jakeman's Trusts.

Chubb, for the petition.—Briggs v. Chamberlaine (1) shews that Mrs. Dicks' interest passed under the deeds acknowledged by her. The husband was not precluded by the creditors' deed or his bankruptcy from joining with his wife in the deeds acknowledged by the wife under the Fines and Recoveries Act, under which the petitioners claim. The question is covered by Sloper v. Oliver (2). That case was under Malins' Act, but the 2nd section of that Act is virtually identical with the 77th section of the Fines and Recoveries Act with respect to the acknowledged deeds of married women. In Cooper v. Macdonald (3), a husband, who was a discharged bankrupt, was held not precluded from joining with his wife in barring an equitable estate tail. The disposition is that of the wife, and not that of the husband, and this distinguishes the case from Hole v. Escott (4), in which the deed was the deed of husband and wife. He also referred to section 197 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861.

Maclean, for the respondent Coles, the assignee in bankruptcy.—Hole v. Escott (4) decided that a husband who had become bankrupt could not join with his wife in the execution of a joint power of appointment. Hole v. Escott (4) was not cited in Cooper v. Macdonald (3); and if inconsistent with Cooper v. Macdonald (3) ought to be followed in preference. In Bright's Trusts (5) the claim of the assignee in bankruptcy to a reversionary trust fund was preferred to that of the particular assignees. He also referred to Palmer v. Locke (6), Drew v. Long (7) and section 141 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849.

Bonsor, for the trustee of the creditors' deed of the 15th of August, 1862.

CHITTY, J.—The question which arises on this petition is of this nature. Mary Dicks, the wife of William Dicks, was entitled, under a will which came into operation in 1862, to a share of the proceeds of real estate, which was directed to be sold after the death of the tenant-for-life, who died on the 17th of January, 1869. Before the death of the tenant-for-life and before any dealings with the fund, her husband, in 1862, executed a deed for the benefit of his creditors under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861. I need not cite the deed, which was in the statutory form, as the effect of such a deed is clearly shewn by sections 191 to 200 of the Act of 1861, particularly by section 191. In substance, I take it that the deed does neither more nor less, so far as the property of the debtor is concerned and the rights of parties, than bankruptcy itself would have done. Then shortly after that—namely, in August, 1866—William Dicks, the husband, was made bankrupt, and an assignee was appointed, and in December of the same year the bankrupt obtained his discharge. Then after the death of the tenant-for-life, but before the sale had taken place, by the deed of the 11th of February, 1869, to which Dicks and his wife were parties, and which was duly acknowledged under the Fines and Recoveries Act, a mortgage was made in favour of one Scriven. I have now stated the facts sufficiently to raise the point. The point is, whether the deed of 1862 or the bankruptcy of 1866 precluded the husband from concurring in the deed of the 11th of February, 1869.

It appears to me that this question is entirely covered by two decisions. The first is that in Sloper v. Oliver (2) before the Lord Chancellor. That decision was on the effect of Malins' Act. But the language of that Act and that of the 77th section of the Fines and Recoveries Act are, for all material purposes, identical. What the Lord Chancellor said is this: "I am of opinion that by an assignment duly made under this statute the wife is enabled to pass and transfer personal property to which she is entitled in reversion, discharged from her husband's right, as fully and effectually as if she was a feme sole, and that the assignment ought not to be regarded as that of the husband and the wife according to their respective interests. This is apparent from three things: First, though the husband must concur in the deed, the power of disposing not only of her own interest, but of that of her husband in her right, is in terms attributed to the wife. Secondly, the words 'as fully and effectually as if she were a feme sole,' manifestly relate to the operation and not to the formalities of the deed, in respect of which latter the assignor is treated, not as a feme sole, but as a married woman. And, thirdly, the equity to a settlement is released and extinguished, manifestly not in favour of the husband or of his creditors, but so as to give to the assignee, immediately on the execution of the assignment, an absolute title. Unless, therefore, the concurrence of the husband in such a deed ought to be regarded as against equity, when the subject of the assignment is a legacy, out of which, if the husband had been entitled to reduce it into possession, the executors would have been entitled to retain a debt due from him to the testator's estate, the statute would appear to give Mrs. Sloper's assignee, in this case, as good a title as if that lady had been unmarried or a widow at the date of the assignment, in which case, of course, the husband's debt could not have been retained. I am of opinion that the executor's future and contingent right of retainer, as against the husband, if he should eventually have become entitled to reduce this legacy into possession, did not estop the husband in equity from concurring with his wife in such a deed executed by her under this statute."

The principle of the Lord Chancellor's decision is, that under Vice-Chancellor Malins' Act the disposition is the disposition of the married woman herself. In the case before me, which falls under the Fines and Recoveries Act, it has been decided in Briggs v. Chamberlaine (1) that the married woman can still dispose, under that Act, of her interest in the proceeds of sale of real estate. There is, therefore, no distinction between the two Acts as regards the disposition of the wife. But the Lord Chancellor goes on to say, on p. 485: "It would doubtless have been otherwise if the husband had previously dealt with his jus mariti in this legacy by any deed or contract for value; but the right claimed by the executors exists, if at all, by operation of law only, and not by any manner of contract." That is a dictum, and a dictum only, and what I think the Lord Chancellor means is that it would doubtless be otherwise if the husband had entered into some contract that he would not concur with his wife, because he ends the sentence with the words, "not by any manner of contract"; he means some contract on the husband's part which might prevent him from concurring. There might also be a case where the husband had specifically dealt with his interest in the fund; but that was not a case in which there had been any such dealings by the husband. Now, in Cooper v. Macdonald (3), the Master of the Rolls had this question to decide:—A married woman was tenant-in-tail to her separate use. But obviously, under the Fines and Recoveries Act, she cannot enlarge her estate-tail into a fee-simple except under the statute, and not under the statute without the concurrence of the husband. In that case the husband had become bankrupt, and it was argued that his bankruptcy had precluded him from joining in the disentailing deed. The effect of the decision is this:—the married woman, with the concurrence of her husband, having barred her estate-tail, and so enlarged it into a fee-simple, was enabled, as the result of that disposition, to dispose of the property by sale. The effect of the concurrence of the husband was to enable the wife alone to defeat the estate by the courtesy which he would otherwise have had. Notwithstanding that that was the effect of the husband's concurrence in the wife's deed, the Master of the Rolls held, and his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, that the husband was not prevented by reason of the bankruptcy from joining in the deed. It appears to me that that is a decision which applies directly to the case before me, and there is nothing in the circumstances which serves to make any material distinction between that case and this. I have already disposed of the argument that there is a difference between a deed executed in favour of creditors and a bankruptcy. It appears to me that they both stand on the same ground. I think that the wife is the really disposing party, and that the deed is an operative deed in favour of her assignees. It would be a strange thing to my mind if the bankruptcy of the husband could take away from the wife the statutory power conferred upon her of disposing of that which is her own property. No doubt there is a peculiarity in the case of this nature: though the interest of the wife was one which was capable of being disposed of by the Fines and Recoveries Act, yet for all general purposes it was a chose in action, it was an interest in personalty. But marriage does not operate as an absolute gift of the wife's chose in action; it merely operates as a qualified gift, the condition being that the husband shall reduce it into possession. Here the husband did not reduce it into possession. He had only this qualified interest, whatever it may be, and then comes in the statutory power. It seems to me, therefore, that the disposition of the deed of the 11th of February, 1869, is valid. There were some other points raised, which I practically disposed of during the argument. It is said that the case of Hole v. Escott (4), before Lord Cottenham, is inconsistent with the decision in Cooper v. Macdonald (3). I do not think it is. If it is, Cooper v. Macdonald (3) is the later case, and it is also the decision of a Court of Appeal. The Lord Chancellor, in Hole v. Escott (4), had only to consider the question whether the husband could join with his wife in the execution of a power conferred by deed; and in that case it was the husband's disposition as well as the wife's; and he held that the prior bankruptcy precluded him from joining in a disposition as he might otherwise have done. The case therefore is different, because in the case before me it is the property of the wife, over which she has a statutory power of disposition. A similar argument was founded upon Bright's Trusts (5) and upon Palmer v. Locke (6). It is not for me to say whether Bright's Trusts (5) was rightly decided. But when Palmer v. Locke (6) is read carefully it will be seen that the Master of the Rolls did not consider that the case of Bright's Trusts (5) had received all the attention which it required. The attention of the Court of Appeal does not appear to have been directed to the language of the 141st section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1849, and the previous legislation out of which that particular section had grown. If it had, I think the Court of Appeal would have held that the particular words upon which reliance had been placed in Bright's Trusts (5) related to debts only. It is not necessary for me to say more upon that case, but I think I have said enough to shew that it has no bearing upon the question before me. That being so, the other deeds take effect according to their dates. The effect of my decision is, that the acknowledged deed is good against the creditors' deed and the trustee in bankruptcy.

PEARSON, J. 1883. Feb. 26. } PENLEY v. ANSTRUTHER.

Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37—Bill of Costs—Signature—Delivery.

A bill of costs for professional work done in part by one firm of solicitors and in part by another firm who have succeeded to the practice of the first firm is properly signed and delivered so as to enable the new firm to sue for and recover the whole costs, if, though itself unsigned, it is delivered together with a letter signed by the new firm referring to the bill.

Professional work was done by a firm, which consisted at first of R. & P., and afterwards of P. & G. practising under the name of R., P. & G., the business and debts of R. & P. having been transferred to R., P. & G. Bills for the costs of the whole work were delivered unsigned, but enclosed with a letter signed by R., P. & G. referring to the bills:—

Held, that the bills were properly signed and delivered to enable R., P. & G. to sue for and recover the whole amount—as to the earlier items, as assignees of R. & P.; as to the later items, in their own right.

Action.

This was an action brought by a firm of solicitors to recover the amounts of certain bills of costs out of the separate estate of their client, a married woman, in which the question arose whether there had been a sufficient signature of the bills of costs to satisfy the provisions of the Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. s. 37.

The bills of costs in question in the action were bills for legal work done for the defendant Mrs. Anstruther in the years 1879 and 1880, and were four in all; but as to one of them his Lordship held that no question arose, it having already been paid out of payments made by Mrs. Anstruther.

As to the other three bills they in each case began with items dated in 1879, and were continued down to the middle of 1880. In no case was there any signature at the foot of the bill, but they had all been forwarded to Mrs. Anstruther, together with a letter of the 30th of July, 1880, stating the totals of the bills and requesting payment, and signed "Remnant, Penley & Grubbe." In 1879 the firm had consisted of Messrs. Remnant & Penley, and carried on business under that name; but as from the 31st of December, 1879, Mr. Remnant retired from the firm, and Mr. Grubbe came into partnership with Mr. Penley, the style adopted for the new firm being "Remnant, Penley & Grubbe." The items in each bill prior to the 31st of December, 1879, were thus due to the old firm, and the items subsequent to that date to the new one; but the new firm took over the book debts of the old one, so that the whole amount was owing to the new firm, in part as assignees of the old firm, and in part in their own right.

Mrs. Anstruther not having paid the bills of costs, the present action was commenced against her, her husband and her trustee by the members of the new firm, alleging in their statement of claim that they were then solely entitled to the relief claimed, and that the amounts were payable out of the separate estate; and they asked a declaration that Mrs. Anstruther's separate estate was chargeable with 179*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.*, the balance of the bills, an account, and an enquiry as to the separate estate.

The defendants denied that the separate estate was chargeable with the costs in question, and alleged that the bills which had been delivered were not signed by the solicitors by whom or by whose firm the work therein mentioned was actually done, as required by the statute.

This was the trial of the action with witnesses.

Higgins, Q.C., and Godefroi, for the plaintiffs.—The fact that the bills of costs were not themselves actually signed is immaterial, having regard to the letter which accompanied them, and which is duly signed by the firm to whom the amounts were payable—In re Bush (1).

W. W. Karslake, Q.C., and Dundas Gardiner, for the defendants.—A considerable proportion of the items charged in these bills was incurred at a time when the firm consisted of Messrs. Remnant & Penley, and if a letter is to be used to supply the wanting signature to the bills, it must be a letter signed by "Remnant & Penley"; a letter signed "Remnant, Penley & Grubbe" will not do—Pilgrim v. Hirschfeld (2). If, therefore, the plaintiffs are to have any relief in this action, it can only extend to the items subsequent to the 31st of December, 1879, and the earlier items must be struck out. The gist of the whole section of the Act is that the signature must be that of the attorney or solicitor or partnership by whom the work is actually done.

[PEARSON, J.—The section says that the assignee of a solicitor may sue for costs due to his assignor if a properly signed bill has been delivered, and that the bill is properly signed if signed by the assignee.]

In order to entitle the plaintiffs to the benefit of that provision they should have signed the bills "as assignees."

They also contended that the separate estate had not been charged.

Higgins, Q.C., in reply.—In Pilgrim v. Hirschfeld (2) the point was that no title was shewn in the plaintiffs to sue. The section shews clearly that an assignee of a bill of costs can sue in his own name, and that there is no ground for saying that he ought to sign it with the name of the assignor, or with that of any one but himself, or to style himself assignee. The plaintiffs are entitled to the relief sought.

(1) 8 Beav. 66; 14 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 6.
(2) 12 W. R. 51.

PEARSON, J., stated the facts and continued:—The question which I have now to consider is, whether Mrs. Anstruther is or is not liable to pay these bills of costs out of her separate estate. The first objection which has been taken is that no properly signed bills have been delivered in accordance with the provisions of the Solicitors Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73). As to this, it appears that on the 30th of July, 1880, the three bills were sent to Mrs. Anstruther, enclosed with a letter referring to the bills and requesting payment, and signed "Remnant, Penley & Grubbe." The first point that was taken was that no proper bills of costs had been duly signed and delivered, and that according to the Act of Parliament no action could be brought to recover the costs until such bills had been delivered. It is said that these bills relate in part to costs which were originally owing to Remnant & Penley, and in part to costs which are owing to the new firm of Remnant, Penley & Grubbe, and that, following the case of Pilgrim v. Hirschfeld (2), the bills were only properly signed, and judgment can now only be given for the items which are due for work done by the second firm, for the reason that there is no bill properly signed by the old firm. At first I thought that might be a dangerous objection, but on referring to the precise terms of the Act I find that it says that the bill of costs shall "either be subscribed with the proper hand of such solicitor"—that is, the solicitor by whom the business was done—"or of the executor, administrator or assignee of such solicitor."

Now it appears that Remnant, Penley & Grubbe succeeded to the practice of Remnant & Penley, and were the assignees of the professional costs due to them at the date of the change of firm, so that the letter which accompanied the bills was signed and properly signed by the same firm, who were at once the assignees of Remnant & Penley and also entitled to sue in their own right for costs due to Remnant, Penley & Grubbe. In my opinion, it was not necessary for them to sign the letter twice over, once in their own name and once as assignees from Remnant & Penley. I think that if the whole sum had been due to Remnant & Penley, the signature of Remnant, Penley & Grubbe would have been sufficient. The signature is, therefore, good for both firms, and it follows that these bills are proper bills. I can find nothing to support Mr. Karslake's argument, that though a bill for costs owing to a partnership may be signed by one member of the firm in his own name for the money due to the firm, the new firm may not sign in their own name as assignees from the old one, but must sign in the name of the solicitor or firm by whom the work was actually done. There is nothing in the Act to say that it is necessary to sign "as assignee." The bill must simply be subscribed by the proper hand of the assignee, and the Act would have been differently worded if it had been meant to require such a signature. I must therefore overrule the first objection.

[His Lordship then considered the second objection, that Mrs. Anstruther had not made her separate estate liable for the costs, and, coming to the conclusion that she had done so, gave judgment for the plaintiffs with the costs of the action, in the form of the judgment in Picard v. Hine (3), modified as in Pike v. Fitzgibbon (4).]

BANKRUPTCY.
JESSEL, M.R.
COTTON, L.J.
BOWEN, L.J.
1882.
Dec. 7.

Ex parte ISHERWOOD; in re KNIGHT.

Bankruptcy — Leasehold Property of Bankrupt—Mortgage to Building Society —Attornment Clause—Disclaimer by Trustee—Power of Court to impose Terms—Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), s. 23—Bankruptcy Rules, 1871, rule 28.

Where a trustee of a bankrupt applies under rule 28 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1871, for leave to disclaim a lease of the bankrupt, the Court may impose terms on the trustee only when a special case is made out.

Ex parte Ladbury (50 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 838; Law Rep. 17 Ch. D. 532) explained.

Although the insertion of an attornment clause in a mortgage-deed constitutes between the parties the legal relation of landlord and tenant, yet in equity their true position is not altered from that of mortgagor and mortgagee, and the Court will have regard to this fact, as well as to the rent reserved by the clause and the actual value of the property, in considering what terms should be imposed upon the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor who has applied for leave to disclaim the tenancy.

This was an appeal from a decision of Bacon, C.J.

The bankrupt, John Knight, had on the 3rd of August, 1875, mortgaged his manufactory and fixed machinery, with his stock-in-trade, and other personal chattels, to the West Derby and Everton Perpetual Benefit Building Society, to secure an advance of 7,500*l.* made to him, which, according to the rules of the society, was repayable with interest in a series of monthly instalments of 71*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* each. In case of the monthly payments being in arrear, fines were incurred by the borrower which were also secured by the mortgage. In case the instalments were three months in arrear, the mortgagees had power under the deed to enter into possession or receipt of the rents of the property. The deed also contained a proviso that if the mortgagees should become entitled to enter into possession, and the mortgagor should be in occupation, he should be tenant of the property from month to month at a monthly rent equivalent in amount to the moneys which he was bound to pay monthly under the rules, such rent being due monthly in advance. There was also a proviso that upon giving fourteen days notice the mortgagees might enter upon the property and determine the tenancy. The deed was not registered as a bill of sale. By a memorandum dated the 12th of October, 1881, Knight further charged the property to the amount of 1,600*l.* advanced to him by the society.

On the 2nd of December, 1881, Knight having been in default for three months in his payments, the society put in a distress for 664*l.*, the amount then due from him.

On the 5th of December Knight was adjudicated bankrupt, and on the 21st two trustees of his estate were appointed, who entered into possession of the mortgaged property.

On the 11th of January, 1882, the building society levied a further distress for 225*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.*, the amount which was then due to them from Knight.

In pursuance of an agreement, dated the 14th of January, between the trustees of the building society and the trustees in the bankruptcy, the stock-in-trade which had been seized by the trustees of the society under their distresses was sold, and the proceeds of such sale, amounting to 1,774*l.*, were paid into the bank in the joint names of both sets of trustees.

On the 9th of February the society levied a further distress for 127*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.*, the amount then due to them from Knight.

In proceedings instituted by the trustees in the bankruptcy the distresses were declared by the Court of Appeal to be valid—Ex parte Voisey; in re Knight (1).

On the 15th of May another distress was levied by the society, and in pursuance of another agreement between the two sets of trustees the goods distrained upon were sold, and the proceeds paid into the bank in their joint names.

On the 25th of August, 1882, the trustees in the bankruptcy applied to the

(1) Ante, p. 121; Law Rep. 21 Ch. D. 442.

County Court for leave to disclaim the tenancy created by the attornment clause, and the Judge gave leave to disclaim on the following terms:—The trustees of the building society were to be paid the sum of 664*l.*, the amount of the distress of the 2nd of December, 1881, and were also to be paid, in respect of the monthly rent under the attornment clause, the sum of 87*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* per month (being the amount of the monthly subscriptions payable to the society by the bankrupt under the provisions of the mortgage and further charge), commencing from the last rent comprised in the distress of the 2nd of December, 1881, and ending on the 25th of August, 1882, together with the fines payable by the rules of the society, such fines to run until the proceeds of the sales held in pursuance of the agreements between the two sets of trustees were from time to time paid into the bank.

The building society, not being satisfied with this order, appealed to the Chief Judge, and contended before him that the fines payable under their rules should have been allowed, not only up to the time of the payments into the bank, but up to the date of the actual payment to the society, and that the monthly rent should be paid to the society up to the date of the actual execution of the disclaimer by the trustees in the bankruptcy.

Horton Smith, Q.C., and J. E. Linklater, for the appellants.

Winslow, Q.C., and Mulholland, for the respondents.

BACON, C.J., affirmed the decision of the County Court Judge.

The building society appealed.

Horton Smith, Q.C., and Linklater, for the appellants.—The trustees upon asking for leave to disclaim ought to be put upon the terms of paying the whole of the rent due between the date of their appointment and the date of the execution of the disclaimer. By section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the effect of the disclaimer is to abolish the lease as from the date of the appointment of the trustee. Titterton v. Cooper (2) decides that the trustee of a bankrupt is personally liable on the covenants of a lease of the bankrupt as from the date of his appointment, unless he disclaims. By rule 28 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1871, the Court is enabled to do justice by imposing terms on a trustee who comes for leave to disclaim a lease.

[JESSEL, M.R.—Why should you have a preference over the other creditors?]

In Ex parte Ladbury (3) the trustee was ordered to pay the rent up to the date of his disclaimer.

[JESSEL, M.R.—In that case the lessor had been kept out of possession; here you chose not to take possession. The bankrupt's estate does not appear to have derived any benefit from the trustee's occupation.]

It has never been held that the Court will only impose terms on the trustee when it is shewn that the occupation has been beneficial to the bankrupt's estate.

Winslow, Q.C., and Birrell, for the trustees, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R.—Whether the present appellants have or have not got more than they are entitled to I will not say; I am quite satisfied of this, that they have got at least as much as they are entitled to, and that is all which it is necessary for us to decide. Whether this 28th rule is or is not ultra vires it is not necessary to decide on the present occasion; the Court carefully abstained from deciding it in Ex parte Ladbury (3). If the rule amounted to an absolute prohibition to the trustee to avail himself of the provisions of the Act, of course a great deal might be said as to its being ultra vires. But when the trustee himself is applying to the Court under the rule, he cannot be heard to complain of it. On the present occasion the appellants do not complain of the rule; on the contrary, they ask us to construe it and to give effect to it. But, if the rule is not ultra vires it cannot mean this, that in every case a disclaimer shall not be executed or take effect unless the landlord is put in the same position up to the date of its execution as if a disclaimer had been executed, because the Act says the disclaimer shall relate back to the date of the adjudication. Therefore it comes to this, that if the rule applies at all, it enables the Court to impose terms on the trustee only when a special case is made out. In Ex parte Ladbury (3) a special case was made out, though I do not know the exact extent of it. It appears that the trustee had kept possession of the demised property, which was supposed to be of some value over and above an equitable mortgage upon it, that he had sold the equity of redemption, that the purchaser was unable to complete his contract and had forfeited part of his deposit in order to be let off his bargain, and the sum so forfeited had, of course, gone to increase the bankrupt's estate. It also appears that the landlord had been kept out of possession—how I do not know. Whether there was no proviso for re-entry or any clause in the lease to hinder the re-entry does not appear. That being so, it was held, not that the landlord was entitled to his rent up to the date of the disclaimer, but that he was entitled to some compensation for the trustee's use and occupation of the property during the time for which he was kept out of the estate, and in the opinion of the Court of Appeal the compensation which had been awarded him by the Registrar was not too much. That is all which was decided in Ex parte Ladbury (3).

Well, if that is so, we are only following Ex parte Ladbury (3) in saying that the landlord must make out some special case. I do not mean to limit it to such a case as Ex parte Ladbury (3)—that is, to a case where the trustee has got a pecuniary benefit for the bankrupt's estate by keeping possession of the demised property; there may be other cases, and I wish, so far as I can, not to fetter the Appeal Court by laying down any definite limit as to the nature of the cases in which terms ought to be imposed on the trustee; but that there must be something special I am quite clear.

That being so, what have we here? In the first place, the relation between the parties is not the ordinary relation of landlord and tenant, but it is the ordinary relation of mortgagee and mortgagor. The nature of that relation is well known. In equity the mortgagor was the owner of the estate, and the mortgagee was only entitled to a charge upon it (I am speaking roughly); at law the mortgagee was the legal owner of the estate (I am now speaking of freehold estates), and the mortgagor was what was called "tenant-at-will," a very peculiar kind of tenancy. That was the legal relationship between the parties. The relation in equity was totally different. In an ordinary case, there being no rent reserved, the tenant-at-will did not pay any rent, and was not liable to pay any; but you might superadd to that legal relationship an express agreement for a tenancy, as was done in the present case, in which a monthly tenancy was created at a monthly rent. That, no doubt, altered the legal relation between the parties, but it did not alter the equitable relation. The rent, if paid, was in equity paid on account of principal and interest; if it exceeded the interest it would go in reduction of the principal. It was the subject-matter of account between the mortgagee and the mortgagor. Therefore, in equity the mortgagee remained only a chargee, and the mortgagor remained the owner of the estate, notwithstanding this variation in the ordinary legal relation between them. That is the true position of the parties. That being so, we have in this case a reservation to the mortgagees of a right to take possession after fourteen days notice, because, having created the monthly tenancy, they did not wish to be kept out of possession a whole month, and it was provided that they might after fourteen days notice take possession. At law the mortgagee became the owner in possession, and in equity he became mortgagee in possession entitled to certain rights as regards possession and subject to certain liabilities.

That being the position of the parties the mortgagor in the present case becomes bankrupt. Then the mortgagees say, "We claim our rent." Now, in this particular case we must look at what the rent really was, because here again there is a great difference between the ordinary case of landlord and tenant, when the rent is that which is agreed upon between the parties as the sum of money fairly payable for the occupation of the demised property, and what I will call a fancy rent—that is, a rent fixed, not with regard to what the tenant can afford to pay or ought to pay for the occupation of the property, but with regard to the amount of the interest on the mortgage debt, or, as in the present case, the mortgagees being a building society, for the interest and fines. In an ordinary mortgage where the rent fixed by the attornment clause really represents the interest on the mortgage debt, it may not be a tenth of the annual value of the property. But here, if the mortgagor was in default and the fines were added, it would be much more. Indeed, from the report of the case when it was before this Court on the previous occasion—Ex parte Voisey (1)—it seems that the rent in that event would certainly amount to the full value of the property, and perhaps to something more, though not so much more as to lead the Court to think that it was not intended as a bona fide rent. It is plain, therefore, that if the rent is more than the value of the property, and it is fixed, not with regard to that value, but with regard to other circumstances—namely, in order to secure by distress the due payment of interest and fines—the keeping of the mortgagee out of possession does not inflict upon him an injury equivalent to the amount of the rent reserved.

Moreover, in the present case the mortgagees were not kept out of possession; they could have entered at any time after fourteen days notice. The remaining out of possession was a voluntary abstention on their part, because they thought it would be for their advantage to distrain for a sum larger than they could obtain by letting the property to a tenant. Whether, therefore, you consider the real relation between the parties, which was not the ordinary one of landlord and tenant, or the circumstance that the mortgagees might have taken possession at any moment after fourteen days notice, it does not appear to me that they have suffered any special injury. On the contrary, by the terms of the order of the County Court, they appear to have obtained a very considerable benefit by being allowed to distrain after the bankruptcy on the goods of the bankrupt for the amount reserved to them as rent. That being so, I can see no reason whatever for imposing upon the trustee any terms beyond those imposed by the order, which in substance amounted to this—that the trustees are to pay all the rent for which the distresses were levied, and something more. Under the circumstances I think the appellants are not entitled to complain of this order, and the appeal must be dismissed.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The complaint made by the appellants is this, that under the power given to the Court by rule 28 to impose terms on the trustee in a bankruptcy, when he applies for leave to disclaim a lease of the bankrupt, the Court ought to have given the appellants more than they have got under the present order. Now the argument was carried to a very great length, and I should hardly have thought it necessary to deal with the case, but for the fact that it was contended that when there is an application for leave to disclaim, the trustee ought in fact to be put under the terms of paying the whole of the rent reserved by the lease which he disclaims up to the date of execution of the disclaimer. That would be entirely contrary to the provisions of the Act. The Act, by throwing back the effect of the disclaimer to the date of the adjudication, relieves the trustee as from the date of the adjudication from the consequences of the lease having vested in him. To say that in every case when a trustee applies for leave to disclaim a lease he should be put on the terms of paying the rent as if the disclaimer took effect only from the date of its execution would be to repeal the Act. In certain cases the Court has, and in my opinion rightly, put the trustee coming for leave to disclaim under terms. When the lease vests in him as trustee he becomes personally liable for the rent, with a right to go against the bankrupt's estate for indemnity. When he has disclaimed the lease then it has been held that the landlord's rights under the lease as against the trustee of the estate of the bankrupt are gone, and he cannot sue the trustee for the use and occupation of the property. It has been held that the trustee cannot be sued as a trespasser, and under special circumstances it is, in my opinion, right that he should be put under the terms of making some payment to the landlord, when he comes to ask for leave to deprive the landlord as from the date of the adjudication of the legal rights given to him by the lease, which is to be disclaimed or put an end to as from that date, the landlord having, except under rule 28 and by means of the right to prove given to him by section 23, no remedy in respect of the trustee's use and occupation of the property, nor any right to treat the trustee as a trespasser.

I think it is not necessary that we should in any way narrow the circumstances under which the Court may impose terms on the trustee, beyond saying that there must be special circumstances. The Master of the Rolls has already said that he does not intend to restrict the power to cases like Ex parte Ladbury (3), in which terms were properly imposed, because the trustee had made a profit by the property. In any case, what the trustee will have to pay is not the profit which he has made, nor the rent according to the lease. But in determining what he ought to pay, regard must be had to two things, whether the occupation has either in fact produced a benefit to the bankrupt's estate or was contemplated as likely to produce a benefit, and the circumstance that in consequence of the disclaimer relating back to the date of the adjudication, the owner of the estate is in the interval between the adjudication and the execution of the disclaimer in this position, that he has been lawfully kept out of the use of his property by virtue of the operation of the lease, and cannot after the disclaimer bring any action against the person who without his consent has been in the occupation of the property. These two things ought to be taken into consideration.

But, taking the present case simply as one of landlord and tenant, I cannot see that any special case has been made out by the appellants to shew that the sums which have been allowed them for the rent reserved under the attornment clause are not amply sufficient, even if the property was treated as theirs from the date of the adjudication, to compensate them for their property having been in the occupation of persons against whom they can make no claim, except by means of the power given to the Court by the 28th rule. There, in my opinion, is the entire foundation for imposing any terms on the trustee, or for the landlord's claim to have any payment made to him. I do not suggest that it was wrong to give the appellants what they have got. There was the agreement between the parties as to the mode of dealing with the distresses, and certainly at present I do not see that this was done away with by the disclaimer. The whole ground for giving the landlord on such an application a right to receive something from the trustee is that, from the effect of the disclaimer, he, the owner of the property, has been from the date of the adjudication in such a position that, though he has been kept out of his property and it has been in the possession of another, he has no remedy at law or in equity for the purpose of recovering compensation. But in the present case the position of the parties was this, not that the appellants were by the effect of the disclaimer as from the date of the adjudication the owners of property of which they were not in occupation, but that the trustees, as the owners of the equity of redemption, were in possession of their own property, and therefore it cannot be said that leave to disclaim ought not to be given, or that any terms should be imposed on the trustees. The grounds on which terms are imposed are that since the date from which the disclaimer takes effect the possession has been contrary to the title. Here the possession has been in accordance with the title. I cannot see how the appellants, the mortgagees, who have not been kept out of their property, because they might have taken possession when they pleased, can say that the Court ought to give them, in addition to what has been already given, any compensation in order to justify the trustees in getting that relief which they ask.

BOWEN, L.J.—I entertain a very clear opinion to the same effect, but I do not wish to add anything to what has been already said. It seems to me that the law not be stated more clearly than it been by the Master of the Rolls and Justice Cotton.

his was an appeal from a decision of Registrar Hazlitt sitting as Chief e in Bankruptcy.

' a bill of sale, dated the 25th of May, , Samuel Morris mortgaged goods iging to him to Ann Webster, to e the repayment of an advance of made by her to him. The mortgagee erroneously described in the bill of as of Boldock in the county of Hereford, whereas the description should have been as of Baldock in the county of Hertford. The deed was registered on the 26th of May, 1876, and re registered on the 18th of May, 1881. In the affidavit filed on the re-registration of the deed the mortgagee was correctly described as of Baldock in the county of Hertford.

On the 12th of January, 1881, Morris filed a liquidation petition, and the creditors resolved to accept a composition.

On the 27th of November, 1880, a bankruptcy petition was presented against Morris by one Streeter; but by an order of the Court of Bankruptcy, dated the 28th of April, this petition was dismissed, Morris being ordered to pay the costs thereof. The costs not having been paid, a writ of fi. fa. was issued, and the goods comprised in the bill of sale were seized by the sheriff. Ann Webster then claimed the goods under the bill of sale, and the matter came before the Registrar, who decided in favour of Streeter, on the ground that the affidavit filed on the re-registration of the bill of sale was not in compliance with section 11 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and he directed Ann Webster to pay the costs of the hearing of all parties. Ann Webster appealed, the notice of appeal being served on the sheriff as well as on Streeter.

Cooper-Willis, Q.C., and T. A. Roberts, for the appellant.—At the time when this bill of sale was executed the Act of 1854 was in force, and that Act did not require the residence of the grantee to be stated in the affidavit filed on registration, and even the Act of 1878 does not require it on first registration. By section 14 of the Act of 1878, the Court has power to rectify an accidental misstatement in the register of the "name, residence or occupation of any person." Formal errors do not vitiate the registration of a bill of sale—Hewer v. Cox (1), Gardner v. Shaw (2), Elliott v. Freeman (3), Ex parte M'Hattie (4), Ex parte Kahen (5) and Blount v. Harris (6). In Ex parte Popplewell (7) the Master of the Rolls said (p. 42) that the Bills of Sale Act was not intended to be a mere trap for those who advance money on bills of sale.

The description of the grantee in the affidavit is not material, because the object of registration is to protect the creditors of the grantor and not of the grantee. There is no such place as Boldock to be found in any directory, therefore it is clear what place is meant, and the affidavit sufficiently identifies the bill of sale. It is not necessary that the affidavit filed on registration should state the residence of the grantor at the time of execution of the bill of sale, but his residence at the time of the making of the affidavit—Button v. O'Neill (8). Section 11 is only directory.

A. G. M. McIntyre, for Streeter, was not called upon.

T. L. Wilkinson, for the sheriff.

JESSEL, M.R.—The present appeal is really a temptation to make bad law. It is a very hard case indeed. If I could so construe the Act as to decide in favour of the appellant, I should be very much inclined to do so. But that is not the province of a Judge. His duty is to find out the meaning of an Act of Parliament, without regard to the question whether it may not in the particular case produce a result which he may think contrary to the intention of the Legislature. The words of section 11 are very plain. It says that if the registration of a bill of sale is not renewed within five years the registration shall become void. Then it says that the re-registration is to be effected by the doing of certain things, and it appears to me that there is no re-registration unless the things mentioned are done. Now, what is to be done? An affidavit is to be filed with the Registrar, stating, inter alia, the names, residences and occupations of the parties to the bill of sale "as stated therein." Consequently, for some reason or other (I am quite unable to say what it is), the Legislature have required that the affidavit shall state the names, residences and occupations of both the parties to the bill of sale as they were stated in it. And the form of affidavit which is given in the schedule to the Act does not in any way cut down the enactment. In the present case the residence of the grantee as stated in the bill of sale was Boldock in the county of Hereford, and that, according to section 11, ought to have been stated in the affidavit made on the re-registration. No doubt there was a clerical error in the bill of sale, and the affidavit might have stated the address given in the bill of sale, and then added that it was so stated by mistake, and that the true address was Baldock in the county of Hertford, and in that way the Act would have been complied with. Then a suggestion is made that there is no such place as Boldock in Herefordshire, and that no one would be misled. I cannot say positively that there is no such place, though I suspect there is not, but it does not follow that other people know this. If there is no such place, I cannot impute to all the world a knowledge of that fact. Probably most people would take it to be the real description of the grantee. I cannot therefore say that there is nothing likely to mislead. There is a most material variation between Boldock in Herefordshire and Baldock in Hertfordshire. It can only be said that the names are similar. I cannot say that the residence of the grantee stated in the affidavit is that which is stated in the bill of sale. I am sorry to have to arrive at this conclusion; but the words of the Act are clear, and I am bound by them.

COTTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The sole question is whether the words of the Act have been complied with, not whether injustice will be caused by our decision. If the Act produces injustice it is for the Legislature to set it right. The sole question is whether the description of the grantee in the affidavit is that which is stated in the bill of sale. If there had been a mere mis-spelling of a name—for instance if Boldock had been simply put for Baldock—the case would have been very different. But can it be said that in the present case the description of the grantee in the affidavit is in substance the same as that which is given in the bill of sale? There is a substantial difference between them. Though I am very unwilling to come to such a conclusion, yet it is our duty simply to construe the Act; and, in my opinion, this is the true construction.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

McIntyre asked for the costs of the shorthand notes of evidence which had been taken in the Court below for the purpose of shewing that the bill of sale was fraudulent.

JESSEL, M.R.—We never allow such costs, unless the evidence is used before us.

Wilkinson asked that the costs of the sheriff might be paid by the appellant. The sheriff had been served with notice of the appeal and was entitled to appear.

JESSEL, M.R.—The sheriff ought not to have appeared. The Registrar's order gave him his costs in the Court below. There is no pretence for the sheriff appearing on the hearing of the appeal. I object to counsel appearing simply to ask for costs when they take no part in the argument. The sheriff should not have been served with formal notice of the appeal; a simple notice should have been given to him. But being served he ought not to have appeared. The appeal must be dismissed with costs as regards the execution creditor, but the sheriff will not have any costs.

COTTON, L.J., and BOWEN, L.J., concurred.

FRY, J. 1883. March 15. } HUTTON v. THE WEST CORK RAILWAY COMPANY.

Statute — Construction — "Revenue Charge"—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16), ss. 67 and 91—Meeting—Notice—Director—Remuneration.

The purchase-money for a railway undertaking transferred by statute was distributable in certain proportions among debenture-holders and shareholders:—Held, that remuneration to directors for past services was a revenue charge.

Under the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, a vote remunerating directors can only be passed at a meeting where such vote has been specified as an object in the advertisement convening the meeting.

An Act of Parliament passed in the year 1879 provided, among other things, for the transfer of the undertaking of the West Cork Railway Company to the Cork and Bandon Railway Company, in consideration of a price to be settled by an arbitrator named. With regard to the application of the purchase-money the Act provided:—

"The West Cork Company shall apply the amount of the West Cork purchase-money received by them from the Bandon Company to the following purposes and in the following manner; that is to say—

"(a) In paying their proportion of the costs of and incident to the obtaining of this Act, and of and incident to the arbitration and award, and subject thereto.

"(b) In paying off any revenue debts or charges of the West Cork Company, so far as the same may not already have been paid out of revenue, and subject thereto.

"(c) In distributing the balance of such purchase-money to and among the respective classes of debenture-stockholders, preference and ordinary shareholders of the West Cork Company in such manner and proportions as shall be allotted, fixed and determined with respect to each such class by the arbitrator, but so that, whilst the holders in each such class shall have distributed among them some part of the said balance of purchase-money, the arbitrator shall have regard to the priorities of the respective classes of holders.

"From and after the completion of the West Cork transfer and the payment to them of the West Cork purchase-money, the West Cork Company shall be dissolved, except for the purpose of regulating their internal affairs, and winding up the same, and of applying the said purchase-money in accordance with the provisions of this Act."

The arbitrator under the Act had assessed the purchase-money at 141,934*l.*, and had also awarded the proportions in which the various classes of debenture-stock-holders and shareholders were to participate in the ultimate balance. The transfer had been carried out and the purchase-money paid; some of the money had been distributed among the proprietors, and some charges paid.

The directors proposed to distribute the balance, except 4,000*l.*, in the same way; and to apply the 4,000*l.* in the first place in paying law costs, in the second place in paying further establishment charges and compensating officers of the company, and in the third place in distributing the balance, which it was estimated would amount to 1,500*l.*, among themselves by way of remuneration for services extended over a number of years. They had obtained the vote of a meeting sanctioning the application of the fund in manner proposed.

The plaintiff, a holder of B debenture stock, of E debenture stock and ordinary shares, brought this action to restrain the directors from distributing any part of the money among themselves—both on the ground that such distribution was contrary to the Act, and that proper notice of the intended resolution had not been given. The matter came on, on motion for an interlocutory injunction.

There was an affidavit by the secretary to the company which shewed that none of the directors had received any salary since they were appointed, the last appointment being in June, 1876; that at a general meeting of the proprietors a resolution was passed "that the report of the directors and the statement of accounts to the 31st of December, 1882, submitted to this meeting be, and the same are, hereby received and adopted, and that with regard to the sum of 4,000*l.* mentioned in the 6th paragraph of such report, the directors be authorised, after payment of the law costs and establishment expenses therein referred to, to apply a portion of the balance in compensating such of the company's officials in London and Cork, and for such amounts as they may think fit, and to retain the balance for their own remuneration, to be divided in such proportions as they may determine." Notice of the meeting had been duly advertised, and a printed copy of the report and balance-sheet had been posted to each stock and shareholder on the 20th of February, 1883, with a printed notice in the same terms as the advertisement indorsed.

The notice was in the following terms:—"Notice is hereby given that a general meeting of the proprietors of the West Cork Railway Company will be held at the company's offices, No. 8 Draper's Gardens, Throgmorton Avenue, in the City of London, on Monday, the 26th of February, 1883, at the hour of two o'clock in the afternoon precisely, for the purpose of receiving directors' report and statement of accounts, and for the transaction of general business."

The 6th paragraph of the report was as follows:—

"As it will probably be some months before the costs in Goodbody's suit can be taxed, your directors propose, with the view of enabling the proprietors to receive a further and final payment without delay and to close the accounts, to take over the sum of 4,000*l.*, out of which they will provide for the law costs to the present time, including those of the above suit, and any further establishment expenses, retaining the balance for compensating the company's officials in London and Cork, and their own remuneration."

The company had been reconstituted in 1872 in accordance with a scheme of arrangement under which the various creditors became debenture-holders, and the debenture-holders acquired a right to vote at the meetings of the company.

(after stating the facts), said,— aid in the first place that there er in the general meeting to sum to the directors at all. It at the 91st section of the Com- uses Consolidation Act, 1845, hat one of the powers of the vhich shall be exercised only at ıeeting of the company, is that ning the remuneration of the directors. I think, therefore, it is plainly competent to a general meeting, if it be duly called, to vote the remuneration of the directors. Can they vote the remuneration of the directors under the circumstances of this company? It is argued they cannot, because the vote is retrospective and proposes to remunerate the directors, not for future, but for past services.

It appears to me there is nothing whatever to prevent a general meeting from so voting remuneration for past services. If I were to hold otherwise, that would preclude directors from foregoing their right to remuneration when a company might be in trouble and difficulty, and asserting their moral right to remuneration when the company had become prosperous by reason of their services. Of course if the majority of the shareholders present think it undesirable or improper to vote remuneration for past services, the directors can have no claim whatever; but in case the majority think it reasonable and fit to vote a sum of money for past services, it appears to me a matter in which the majority can bind the minority; and in the present case, under the circumstance I shall hereafter refer to, they have so voted.

Then it is suggested that the power is taken away by this circumstance: that the ultimate balance of the purchase-money is to be distributed amongst the debenture-holders: and it is said they are not to be bound by the retrospective action of the general meeting of the company; but it appears to me the Act subjects them to all the revenue charges and revenue debts, and that if the company had the power of voting this remuneration to the directors, that is a revenue debt or a revenue charge. In passing I may observe that it does not appear to me that the payment is confined to those debts and charges for the current year only. I think that any arrears of such debts or charges would be payable before the ultimate sum which would become distributable among the debenture-holders could be ascertained.

But in the present case there is one circumstance to be observed upon, which makes it more than usually easy to arrive at that conclusion—namely, that by the scheme of arrangement under which the debenture stock was issued the debenture-stockholders were themselves made capable of voting at general meetings, so that they had a voice in the voting of this charge; and if they had thought fit to attend and persuade their fellow shareholders and fellow debenture-holders, that sum might never have been voted. I think, therefore, it is within the competence of the general meeting so to vote.

: Ad. 125; 1 Law J. Rep. K.B. 49.

Then arises the second question, which is this—whether the general meeting has so voted as to bind the minority? Now it appears that on the 10th of February an advertisement was issued in these terms: [His Lordship read the notice of the meeting and proceeded:] Then the 67th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, provides: "No matters except such as are appointed by this or the special Act to be done at an ordinary meeting shall be transacted at any such meeting unless special notice of such matter shall have been given in the advertisement convening such meeting." The Act does provide for certain matters which are to be done at ordinary meetings, as, for instance, the election of directors and the appointment of auditors, and I have no doubt that there are other matters specially referred to ordinary meetings. But the Act does not provide that the remuneration of directors shall be voted at an ordinary meeting. As I have already pointed out, the 91st section provides that that is a matter to be provided at a general meeting, leaving it undetermined whether the general meeting is to be an extraordinary or ordinary meeting. I think it is not shewn that this is a matter that can be dealt with without special notice, and I think that the more because in the present case the vote is intended to have a retrospective operation—to remunerate the directors for past services—and it is a vote of more than ordinary importance, to determine the final winding up of the accounts of the company.

There is one other observation which I feel I ought to make, which is this—that the remuneration of the directors is of a peculiar description in this case, because it is proposed to give them a sum of 4,000*l.*, out of which they are to pay the law costs, the compensation to the managing director, and the estimated expenses of the winding up the company; and therefore the amount may be a variable one. It appears to me, however, there is nothing whatever to restrain the company from making such a vote. They may make the amount contingent upon events which are brought to their attention; and in the present case it is eminently reasonable that such a vote should be made: because it would enable the directors to declare a final dividend amongst the shareholders and debenture-holders, and prevent a delay, which would otherwise be inevitable, in the receipt of the money coming to those persons. I think that would be within the competency of a meeting.

I must grant an injunction until the vote be submitted to a general meeting properly called.

[His Lordship made no order as to costs.]

the fact was, that it had proved a wholly insufficient security: — Held a misrepresentation as to value disentitling the vendor to enforce the contract.

This was an action by the vendors, Mullens & Bosanquet, for specific performance of a contract for the sale of a leasehold warehouse, No. 3 Nicoll's Buildings, Golden Lane, in the county of Middlesex, held under a lease for a term of eighty-four years, from 1873, at a yearly rent of 240*l.* The plaintiffs had at first authorised Dean, a surveyor, to let the property, and afterwards "to find a purchaser" of it, on the terms that Dean should have half of the price over 500*l.*, which terms were, on the 13th of December, 1881, altered so that he was to have the whole of the price over 500*l.*

Dean, who was previously acquainted with the defendant, introduced the subject to the defendant, and at an interview which took place at Dean's house, on the 11th of December, stated, amongst other things, that a Mr. Hemming, a corrugated zinc manufacturer, was prepared to buy the property for 700*l.*, and if he could not buy it, would rent it at 300*l.* a year for the rest of the term, or the ground-floor at 200*l.*, as he was determined to occupy it. Mr. Hemming was called as a witness, and on the evidence the Court held that there was no foundation for these statements. On the 13th of December the defendant inspected the property, and went with Dean to the plaintiffs' office, and Mr. Bosanquet asked the defendant if he had any further questions to ask. The defendant said—No; that Dean had given him all the information he required, and he was quite satisfied. Dean, however, in the presence of this defendant, asked Mr. Bosanquet whether it was not true that 500*l.* was recently lent on mortgage of the property, and Mr. Bosanquet replied that the money lent was 2,000*l.* It appeared now that, though this sum had been advanced, the security had proved insufficient, so that Mr. Bosanquet, who had advanced the money on behalf of a client, was forced to take over the property himself.

At this interview Mr. Bosanquet drew up an agreement for sale of the property for 750*l.*, which the defendant, after submitting it to his own solicitor, signed, and paid a deposit; the purchase was to be completed on the 24th of December.

Before that date the defendant found that he was unable to let the property as represented, and refused to complete; whereupon the plaintiffs issued their writ in this action, and the defendant counterclaimed for return of the deposit.

The plaintiffs denied that they had given any authority to Dean to make any representations about the property, except that the plaintiffs were desirous of selling.

Millar, Q.C., and Dauney, for the plaintiffs, contended that the plaintiffs were not liable for the misrepresentations made by Dean, since he had exceeded his authority in making them—Chapleo v. The Brunswick Building Society (1) and Eaglesfield v. The Marquis of Londonderry (2).

Marten, Q.C., and Ingham, for the defendant, contended that to represent facts relating to the value of the property was within the scope of Dean's authority, and that the plaintiffs were answerable—Barwick v. The English Joint Stock Bank (3), Mackay v. The Commercial Bank of New Brunswick (4) and Swire v. Francis (5); and that the defendant was entitled to refuse to complete—Higgins v. Samels (6) and Redgrave v. Hurd (7). They also contended that the representation made by Bosanquet personally as to the property having been a security for 2,000*l.* was in itself sufficient to avoid the contract.

Millar, Q.C., replied, and cited in addition Weir v. Barnett (8).

BACON, V.C.—This is a simple case. There is a written contract to buy a house; the subject is described with sufficient accuracy; the price is stated distinctly, and the day for the completion of the purchase is named; the contract is signed by both parties, and the vendor brings his action for specific performance. Prima facie, it is one of the plainest cases in the world.

The defence is, that the vendor employed an agent to deal with the property, first for letting and then for selling it, and that representations were made by the agent that were wholly untrue, and that to hold the defendant to such a bargain would be against every principle of justice. To that it was added that there was a further representation, going directly to the essence of the subject, made not by the agent, but by one of the plaintiffs themselves.

It is said that before the defendant had signed the agreement, the plaintiff Mr. Bosanquet, upon being asked by Mr. Dean if the property had not been mortgaged for 1,500*l.*, said it had been mortgaged for more than that—namely, for 2,000*l.*; and it is said that this is a representation going directly to the value of the property, shewing that it was worth a great deal more than was given for it. That this was Mr. Bosanquet's representation is stated by him in his evidence, in his answer to interrogatories, and in his evidence given in Court. The fact turns out, however, to be that, though there was a mortgage for 2,000*l.*, it so little represented the value of the property, that the plaintiff Mr. Bosanquet, who was a solicitor, and who made himself liable in that character for the negotiation and carrying into effect of this mortgage, had had to pay out of his own pocket the consideration for the reconveyance to himself and the co-plaintiff of this very property by the mortgagee under the power of sale contained in the mortgage-deed. That representation was made by the plaintiff Mr. Bosanquet himself, before the contract was signed.

Now a great deal of time has been occupied, and a great many cases have been referred to, on the question of the authority of an agent. A man employs an agent to let a house for him; that authority, in my opinion, contains also an authority to describe the property truly, to represent its actual situation, and, if he thinks fit, to represent its value. That is within the scope of the agent's authority; and when the authority is changed, and instead of being an authority to let, it becomes an authority to find a purchaser, I think the authority is just the same. I think the principal does thereby authorise his agent to describe, and binds him to describe truly, the property which is to be the subject disposed of; he authorises the agent to state any fact or circumstance which may relate to the value of the property. That, I take it, is clearly laid down in the cases referred to. It would be very dangerous, in my opinion, to limit the authority of an agent in the way in which the argument before me has proposed to limit it—namely, that the duty of Mr. Dean simply was to go out into the world and find a man likely to buy, and to bring him to the plaintiff the vendor, and to say, "Here is a man who is willing to buy." It has been argued that was his only authority.

Now what took place at Mr. Dean's house on the 11th of December is no doubt of great importance. A representation was made by an agent, who, as I think and as I hold, was authorised to make the representation if it was true, but who had no authority to state any falsehood on behalf of his principal, and if he thereby induced a purchaser to enter into a contract, he did that which now prevents the principal from saying that the agreement shall be specifically performed. That I do not hesitate to say is my view of the law. As to what took place on that day there is a direct conflict of evidence. [His Lordship examined the evidence on this part of the case, and stated his conclusion that there was not the slightest reason to suppose that there ever was any bidder for 700*l.*, or any offer to rent or anything of the sort.]

On the 13th of December, the defendant and Dean are together, and the defendant goes and looks at the property. Then they go together to Mr. Bosanquet's office, and there the interview takes place between Mr. Bosanquet and Mr. Dean, in which Mr. Bosanquet, who before that time had said he would give Dean half beyond 500*l.*, agrees to give him all that could be produced beyond 500*l.* Then the defendant comes into the conversation, and that which is stated happens. He is asked whether he would like to put any questions, and he says he has no question to ask. If he had said, "Why should I ask you any questions? Mr. Dean has dealt with me and shewn me the property, and has explained to me all these things; I need not ask you anything, for I know all about it"—that would have been one thing; but there comes this, which I have before alluded to—Mr. Bosanquet himself, before there was any binding agreement, makes a representation to the defendant, not in terms that the property is worth 2,000*l.*, but that it had been security for 2,000*l.* To what end was that said but to represent the value as being of that amount? As I have said, it turns out that, so far from the property having been a security for 2,000*l.*, the supposed security was given up, and Mr. Bosanquet had to pay out of his own pocket the consideration for the reconveyance. I am aware that that was done as the result of a compromise, but I do not think that that alters the case in the slightest degree. You have the fact that there never was a valid or beneficial or useful mortgage for 2,000*l.*, and that Mr. Bosanquet was compelled to pay money for having represented that it was worth the sum of 2,000*l.*

In my opinion the defendant was induced to sign this contract upon a false representation made to him by Dean, and upon a false representation made to him—true in form, but false and misleading in substance—by Mr. Bosanquet.

I am of opinion that the attempt to force this supposed contract upon the defendant must entirely fail; that the defendant is entitled on his counter-claim to be released from the contract, and to have back the 50*l.* deposit; and that the plaintiffs must pay the costs of this suit, including the costs of the counter-claim.

Practice—Order XXX. rules 1 and 4—Payment into Court—Debentures—Administration—Costs.

In an action by one debenture-holder, on behalf of herself and others, for administration of the trusts of a deed securing the debentures, the defendants paid money into Court, which was accepted by the plaintiff in satisfaction of her claim:—Held, that she was not entitled of right to her costs.

This was an action by the holder of twenty 5*l.* debentures of the New Wernpistill Colliery and Fire Brick Company, part of a loan of 10,000*l.* for a term of five years from July, 1876, against trustees for the debenture-holders of a deed of the 11th of January, 1876, and the company. The company was in voluntary liquidation. The property in which the debentures were secured had been sold. The plaintiff sued on behalf of herself and the other debenture-holders, and claimed administration of the trusts of the deed of the 11th of January, 1876, to make the trustees liable for wilful default, and to have a sum of 200*l.* disallowed them, and costs. The defendants paid a sum of 23*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* into Court, being the plaintiff's proportion of the purchase-money of the trust property, and a further sum of 2*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* to meet the plaintiff's claim in respect of the 200*l.*, and on the 10th of June, 1882, delivered their statement of defence. The plaintiff gave notice that she accepted the sum paid into Court in satisfaction of her claim, and the matter was brought on on a summons by the defendants to stay proceedings, and was argued on the question of costs.

E. Beaumont, for the defendants.—This is not a case within Order XXX. rule 4, for the action claims an account. Costs are regulated by Order LV., and are within the discretion of the Court; and as matter of conduct the plaintiff ought to pay the costs. He referred to Buckton v. Higgs (1) and Greaves v. Fleming (2).

Terrell, for the plaintiff.—The action was substantially an action brought for a money demand, in which the plaintiff has succeeded, and she is entitled to have her costs of right under Order XXX. rule 4.

E. Beaumont, in reply.

FRY, J. (after stating the facts and the question raised).—The defendants did not in terms pay the money in in satisfaction of the plaintiff's entire demands, nor could they, for the plaintiff demands an account, and it was not possible to satisfy that demand. The question is whether Order XXX. applies. The first rule is in these words: [His Lordship read the rule and proceeded:] That, in my judgment, applies to a case where you are, strictly speaking, seeking to recover a debt or damages, and the whole demand is for money. But if the plaintiff is seeking an account, it is impossible to satisfy that with money. I think if the first rule does not apply, the fourth does not either, and the matter is left to be regulated by Order LV.

[His Lordship gave the plaintiff costs down to the putting in the defence, and ordered her to pay the subsequent costs.]

Practice — Pleading — Endorsement of Writ—Motion on Admissions in Pleading —Judicature Act, 1873, s. 100—Rules of Court, 1875, Order II. rule 1, Order XL. rule 11.

The endorsement on a writ is not a "pleading" within the terms of Order XL. rule 11, Rules of Court, 1875, so as to entitle a plaintiff to move for judgment without the consent of the defendant on admissions in the pleading, although the defendant admits the plaintiff's claim and has given notice that he does not require the delivery of a statement of claim.

Foreclosure action.

The defendant appeared to the writ, and at the same time gave notice to the plaintiff, in pursuance of Order XIX. rule 2, Rules of Court, 1875, that he did not contest the claim, and did not require a statement of claim to be delivered. Chitty, J., on the plaintiff's motion, thereupon, under Order XL. rule 11, made the usual foreclosure order.

The Registrar, however, refused to draw up the order, on the ground that there were no "pleadings" in the sense of Order XL. rule 11.

Willis Bund, for the plaintiff, mentioned the matter to the Court. The endorsement on a writ is a pleading within the meaning of Order XL. rule 11, as it clearly comes within the definition of "pleading" given in section 100 of the Judicature Act, 1873, which is "the statement in writing of the claim or demand of any plaintiff"; and Order II. rule 1, describes an endorsement as a "statement of the nature of the claim made." The statement of claim is wholly unnecessary; the defendant has admitted the claim, and if the application is granted expense will be saved to the mortgagor.

Crossley, Q.C., and H. B. Buckley, as amici curiæ, referred to the Annual Chancery Practice, 1882, p. 359, and to Wilmott v. Young (1).

CHITTY, J., said that he was compelled, though reluctantly, by the authorities, to refuse the application. It seemed clear that the endorsement on the writ was not a pleading on which a plaintiff could move under Order XL. rule 11, without the consent of the defendant.

LYELL v. KENNEDY.

Practice—Discovery—Interrogatories—Action of Ejectment—Rules of Court, Order XXXI. rule 1*—Affidavit of Documents.*

The plaintiff in an action of ejectment has the same right as the plaintiff in any other action to administer interrogatories to the defendant.

The defendant, in an affidavit of documents, objected to produce certain documents described in a schedule, on the ground that they related solely to the defence of his title to the property in question in the action, and were communications between himself and his solicitors, their London agents, and his counsel in reference to the defence of his title aforesaid, and prepared or procured for the purposes and in contemplation of such defence.

The description of some of the documents as given in the schedule appeared not to agree with the above claim of privilege:—

Held, that the defendant must make a further and better affidavit.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (reported 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 439; Law Rep. 20 Ch. D. 484) by which two orders of Bacon, V.C., were affirmed.

The action was commenced on the 4th of January, 1881, by the appellant to recover possession of certain land and buildings in the city of Manchester, to which he claimed to be entitled as assignee of the heirs-at-law of one Ann Duncan, deceased.

The allegations in the statement of claim were to the following effect:—Ann Duncan, spinster, was at the time of her death seised of the property in question under the will of her uncle for an estate in fee-simple in possession. She died on or about the 5th November, 1867, intestate as to her real estate in England. Facts were then stated showing the devolution of the property to Eleonora Bradock and Catherine and Isabella Cunningham as co-heirs. They conveyed the property to the plaintiff by a deed dated the 24th of December, 1880. While the said Ann Duncan resided in Scotland she requested the defendant (who was co-executor with her of her uncle's will) to manage the property on her behalf, and to act as her general agent, bailiff and receiver. The defendant did so, and accounted to her until her death, and afterwards to her executors, for the rents and profits received during her life.

After Ann Duncan's death it was long uncertain who her heir was, and the defendant continued to receive the rents as agent, bailiff and receiver for the heir when he should be ascertained.

An action having been brought in Scotland against the defendant by the executors of Ann Duncan to compel him to account for rents due to her estate, he pleaded and swore in evidence that he was managing the property for the heir with the sanction of the executors, and had laid out money in repairs in accordance with an arrangement with them.

The defendant in 1872 wrote a letter to one David Buchan, who at that time claimed to be heir-at-law, in which he stated that he was acting for the heir-at-law whoever he might be.

The plaintiff in 1869, believing himself to be the heir, wrote to the defendant claiming the property, and received two letters from him, dated the 15th and 18th of January, 1869, in which he said that he was paying the rents into a bank and keeping regular accounts, and that the property would be delivered to the rightful owners thereof as soon as it could be satisfactorily ascertained who they were.

The defendant repeated these statements to the plaintiff at an interview.

The plaintiff further alleged that the defendant had collected evidence which proved the title of the said Eleonora Bradock and Catherine and Isabella Cunningham, and had used the same to defeat actions brought by other claimants to the property.

In one of the actions so brought against the defendant he claimed to be entitled to the property, as devisee of the said Ann Duncan, under a will which he alleged she told him she had made, but which had not turned up.

The statement of defence traversed the allegations of the statement of claim and pleaded the Statute of Limitations.

The plaintiff proceeded to deliver interrogatories based upon the allegations in the statement of claim, and obtained an order for the production of documents.

The defendant by his answer admitted that Ann Duncan entered into beneficial enjoyment of the property on or about the 21st of July, 1859, but objected to answer any other of the interrogatories. With regard to the 20th and 21st interrogatories, which related to searches and enquiries as to pedigree alleged to have been made by the defendant, he said—"I submit that I ought not to be required to give the result of such searches and enquiries, or any of them, on the grounds following:—(a) The said searches and enquiries were made for the purposes and in contemplation of the defence of my title to the said property, and the results were and are in the nature of reports made to me by my confidential agents. (b) The books, records and other places in which, and the persons from whom, such searches and enquiries were made, were and are equally accessible to the plaintiff as to me. (c) That the said interrogatories are not put bona fide for the purposes of this action."

In his affidavit of documents the defendant objected to produce the documents set forth in the second part of the first schedule thereto: "on the ground that they relate solely to the defence of my title to the property in question in this action, and are communications between myself and my solicitors, their London agents, and my counsel in reference to the defence of my title aforesaid, and prepared or procured for the purposes and in contemplation of such defence."

The second part of the first schedule was to the following effect:—1. Counterpart agreements for letting mill at Ardwick.

2–5. Bundles of "papers relating to my title to the property in question in this action, procured for the purposes of my defence in" certain other actions.

6. Letters and press copies between the defendant and his solicitors and their London agents with reference to the other actions and this action.

7. "Notes of searches, pedigrees and draft pedigrees made and prepared on my behalf during the pendency of or in contemplation of the various actions abovementioned and this action for purposes of my defence therein respectively."

8. Cases for counsel, opinions, &c., obtained and made by the defendant's solicitors for the purpose of his defence in this action.

"The actions mentioned above were actions commenced by persons claiming as against me the property in question in this action. All the above documents were obtained for the purpose of defending my title to the said property, and either in the course or in contemplation of legal proceedings.

"The remaining documents mentioned in this schedule consist of documents relating exclusively to disbursements made by me on account of the property in question in this action, in their nature my vouchers for such payments. None of such documents are in any way relevant to the question to be tried in this action, or tend to support the plaintiff's title to such property as aforesaid."

9–26. Bundles of receipts for chief rents, rates, insurance, &c., cash-books, rent-books and accounts, letters and sundries.

27. Bundle of correspondence, accounts and miscellaneous documents relating to another action.

28–29. Bundles of account slips and receipts.

The plaintiff took out summonses to compel the defendant to make a full and sufficient answer to the interrogatories, and a further and better affidavit of documents, and to produce the documents in the second part of the first schedule to the affidavit of documents, except those contained in paragraphs 6 and 8 thereof.

Bacon, V.C., refused both applications with costs, and his decisions were affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

General v. Gaskill (4), Eade v. Jacob (5) and Harland v. Emerson (6).

The Court of Appeal, however, has laid down as a general principle that no interrogatories can be administered in an action of ejectment. The ground of the decision was an alleged rule of practice in the Court of Chancery not to grant discovery in aid of an action of ejectment before the Judicature Acts, the Court holding that the Chancery practice, if different, would prevail against the practice of the common law Courts under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, though they were also of opinion that Horton v. Bott (7) shewed that interrogatories by a plaintiff in ejectment were not allowed at common law.

It is contended for the appellant that the alleged rule of practice has never had any existence either in the Court of Chancery or in the common law Courts. The reports are full of cases from the earliest times to the present in which discovery has been granted in aid of an action of ejectment. The principle that in an action of ejectment the plaintiff must succeed on the strength of his own title applies equally to other actions for the recovery of property, and affords no reason for refusing him the means of proving his title. Besides, he can call the defendant as his witness at the trial; why therefore should he not interrogate him before the trial? In The Attorney-General v. Gaskill (4) it was said that one object in interrogating is to obtain admissions, and so save the necessity of adducing evidence.

With regard to interrogatories in the common law Courts, Horton v. Bott (7) did not decide, as alleged, that they could not be administered by the plaintiff in actions of ejectment; but that, in accordance with the rule in Chancery, they must not relate to the defendant's title—Coster v. Baring (8), Sketchley v. Connolly (9), Towne v. Cocks (10) and The New British Mutual Investment Company v. Peed (11).

The following are some of the cases relating to discovery in equity in aid of an ejectment at law:—The Attorney General v. Duplessis (12), Rumbold v. Forteath (13), Brown v. Wales (14), Drake v. Drake (15), Bennett v. Glossop (16), Chadwick v. Broadwood (17), Hylton v. Morgan (18), Butterworth v. Bailey (19), Crow v. Tyrell (20), Jones v. Jones (21), Wright v. Plumptree (22), Pennington v. Beechy (23), Devereux v. Devereux (24) and Grey v. Grey (25). In many of the above cases no relief was sought, in others the relief sought was merely the removal of outstanding terms. In some cases the discovery was granted, in others it was refused on various grounds. All kinds of objections were taken, but the objection that discovery could not be granted in aid of ejectment at law was never put forward.

There is no mention of the supposed rule in any book of practice. In Cole on Ejectment and other books common forms of interrogatories in actions of ejectment are given. Van Heythuysen's Equity Draughtsman, Hubback on Succession, Wigram on Discovery, and Mitford on Pleading, which professes to give all defences to a bill of discovery, are silent as to the existence of the rule.

In Philipps v. Philipps (26), an action of ejectment, Bramwell, L.J., said that the plaintiff ought to have got discovery, and framed his pleadings on it.

Rules of Court, Order XXXI. gives the right if it did not exist before.

As to the affidavit of documents, the Court is not bound to accept the defendant's statement that documents relate only to his own title, if they see reason to think they may support the plaintiff's case —Ferrier v. Atwood (27). The practice has not been changed by the Judicature Acts—The Attorney-General v. Gaskill (4). In Felkin v. Lord Herbert (28), where the defendant objected to produce documents, on the ground that they did not "relate to or evidence the title of the plaintiff," Kindersley, V.C., said: "In order to protect himself a defendant must state, and it must appear, looking at the schedule and the nature of the documents, that they do not relate to or tend to shew not only the title of the plaintiff to the property to be recovered, but the title to the relief he asks"—Minet v. Morgan (29).

In The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of London (30) it was held that the plaintiff is entitled to find out by discovery what the case made against him is, but not the evidence of that case. From this it appears that whereas, as here, the defendant sets up no title whatever, he cannot refuse to discover documents on the ground that they relate to his title alone—Balguy v. Broadhurst (31), Wright v. Vernon (32), Smith v. The Duke of Beaufort (33), Goodall v. Little (34), Greenwood v. Greenwood (35), Nolan v. Shannon (36), Burrell v. Nicholson (37), Saull v. Browne (38), Harris v. Harris (39) and Jenkins v. Bushby (40). The claim of privilege here is vague; it mixes up several grounds of privilege without saying whether all grounds apply to all the documents, or some to one and some to another; and further there are documents to which it is obvious that no one of the grounds can apply. The respondent ought, therefore, to produce all the documents in the second part of the first schedule, except those set forth in paragraphs 6 and 8.

Horton Smith and Leigh Clare, for the respondent.—This is a mere common law action of ejectment, with certain statements made to get rid of the Statute of Limitations. Where the plaintiff claimed relief in equity he always got discovery; but he could not get discovery alone in aid of a pure common law action of ejectment. The Courts have held that there are special grounds of public policy for protecting the possession of land. Horton v. Bott (7) shews that the rule was the same as to interrogatories in the common law Courts. In Flitcroft v. Fletcher (41) a defendant in ejectment was allowed to interrogate a plaintiff; but in Edwards v. Wakefield (42) and Stoate v. Rew (43) even that right was limited. See also Pearson v. Turner (44), Wallen v. Forrest (45) and Finney v. Forwood (46).

The cases cited for the appellant, so far as they are in his favour, are distinguishable. In Coster v. Baring (8) there was no decision. In Sketchley v. Connolly (9) there was but one interrogatory, "Are you the real defendant or not?" Towne v. Cocks (10) was a case of tithes, as to which there is equitable jurisdiction—see Bellwood v. Wetherell (47). Cotton, L.J., in The Attorney-General v. Gaskill (4), explained his observations in Eade v. Jacobs

(5). Doe v. Francis (2) was not a decision on interrogatories. The New British Mutual Investment Company v. Peed (11) decided that the defendant must answer as to documents, but might object to produce them. The Attorney-General v. Duplessis (12) was a clear case of equity as to setting up terms. The same observation applies to The Attorney-General v. Gaskill (4). Hunt v. Hewitt (48) only gave inspection of deeds. Brown v. Wales (14) was a case of landlord and tenant, and there was collusion. In Rumbold v. Forteath (13), Harland v. Emerson (6) and Wright v. Vernon (32) there were outstanding legal estates which prevented the plaintiff from proceeding at law. Jones v. Jones (21), Grey v. Grey (25) and Stainton v. Chadwick (49) were brought to establish an equitable title.

There is no instance of a bill of discovery in aid of an action of ejectment. In Maddock's Chancery Practice, vol. i. p. 276 (3rd ed.), it is said, "Nor is he (that is, the heir), it seems, entitled to a discovery unless there are circumstances standing in the way which the Court would remove to enable him to assert his legal right."

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—That is a work of no great authority, even as a book of practice.]

He cited the following cases:—Tanner v. Morse (not reported), Lady Shaftesbury v. Arrowsmith (50), Jones v. Jones (21) and Crow v. Tyrell (20). See also Mutloe v. Smith (51), Crouch v. Hicken (52), Armitage v. Wadsworth (53) and Pennington v. Beechy (23).

As to the other cases cited for the appellant, in every one the application failed, or it was not necessary to raise the objections, or there was some equitable ground for the application, as in Drake v. Drake (15), Bennett v. Glossop (16) and Crow v. Tyrell (20). This is not an equitable case at all.

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—Why not as much equitable as where it is alleged that the defendant has wrongful possession of the plaintiff's title-deeds? Is there nothing alleged here which affects the defendant's conscience?]

Chester v. Wortley (54) and Selby v. Selby (55), cited below, have no bearing on the question.

As to the books of practice, Van Heythuysen cites only Wright v. Plumptree (22) in support; Cole on Ejectment gives forms but no interrogatories; in Hubback on Succession, there is nothing more than a general discussion of the right of the heir to proceed at law or in equity.

The Judicature Acts have made no alteration. They refer only to procedure, whereas this is a matter of right founded on public policy. Section 25 of the Act of 1873 does make an alteration in legal rights, but not as to actions of ejectment. Order XXXI. does not certainly give a more extensive right than previously existed.

As to discovery of documents, the plaintiff must shew a prima facie case; the Court has a discretion—Bullock & Company v. Corrie & Company (56), The Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company v. Quick (57), Lane v. Gray (58), The Egremont Burial Board v. The Egremont Iron Ore Company (59) and Wheeler v. Le Marchant (60).

Cur. adv. vult.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD SELBORNE).—The action in this case (brought in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice) is to recover possession of real estate in England, with mesne profits, by a legal title. The plaintiff exhibited interrogatories, in the ordinary course, to obtain discovery from the defendant of certain matters which, as I understand them, are all relevant to the plaintiff's, and not to the defendant's, case. To these interrogatories (with an exception, which I need not more particularly mention) the defendant has in effect refused to give any answer, and in that refusal he has been upheld by the judgments of Vice-Chancellor Bacon and the Court of Appeal.

I should be very sorry to encourage appeals to your Lordships' House from interlocutory orders upon interrogatories, raising no question of principle. But this appeal does raise an important question of principle.

The decision of the Court of Appeal, as understood by both parties, proceeded upon the general ground that a plaintiff in ejectment, claiming by a legal title, is entitled to no discovery, even of matters relevant to his (the plaintiff's) own case from the defendant in possession. It was held (I think correctly) that the right of discovery, under the present Rules of the Supreme Court, is not, in principle, more extensive than it formerly was in the Court of Chancery; and the plaintiff's counsel was challenged to produce authorities in support of the right of a plaintiff, in an action of ejectment at law, to file and obtain an answer to a bill of discovery in equity. This, as I understand, he was not at that time prepared to do; and it seems to have been concluded that the settled course of practice in equity was against the existence of such a right, and that this practice was founded upon principles which are, indeed, altogether beyond question—namely, that a plaintiff in ejectment at law must succeed, if at all, by the strength of his own title, and that it is against public policy to assist him in searching into the evidences of the defendant's title. Reference was also made to a case at law of Horton v. Bott (7), in which a discovery of matters relevant only to the defendant's title was, very properly, refused. It does not, however, appear to me to follow from these principles, or from the case of Horton v. Bott (7), that a plaintiff in an action of ejectment, suing upon a legal title, ought to be denied that discovery of matters within the defendant's knowledge, and tending to support, not the defendant's but the plaintiff's case, to which a plaintiff at law would be entitled in any other kind of action.

In the argument before your Lordships the appellant's counsel produced a series of authorities which, if they had been cited in the Court of Appeal, might, not improbably, have satisfied that Court (as I believe they have satisfied all your Lordships) that bills of discovery in aid of the title of plaintiffs at law in actions of ejectment were neither unknown to the Court of Chancery nor excluded by any rule or practice of that Court; on the contrary, that they were dealt with in the same manner and on the same principles as similar bills in other cases.

If there had been such a course of practice as that supposed it must have been familiar to the leading writers on the law of discovery, Sir James Wigram and Mr. Hare. There is, however, no trace of it in the learned treatises of either of those authors. What they say is inconsistent with it.

Mr. Hare's work was published in 1836, before that of Sir James Wigram, by whom it is much commended. He says (p. 198):—"That which has been said of the action of ejectment"—(quoting Lord Mansfield's words in Roe v. Harvey (61), "the plaintiff cannot recover but upon the strength of his own title," &c.)—"seems not less applicable to every suit seeking to change the right and the possession of property." "A case has been put of an ejectment brought against a party in possession, who cannot by filing a bill against the plaintiff in the action compel a discovery of his title-deeds by merely" (I may observe that in Hare's book the word "merely" is in italics) "alleging that they would shew that he had no title. The defendant is left to sustain his case or defend his possession as he may. The purposes of justice are accomplished in affording to the plaintiff all the evidence that tends to establish affirmatively the facts upon which he insists."

Sir James Wigram (2nd ed., 1840, p. 14) lays down what he calls "the two cardinal rules of the law of discovery," as follows:—

(61) 4 Burr. 2484, 2487.

"First, the right, as a general proposition, of every plaintiff to a discovery of the evidences which relate to his case; and secondly, the privilege of every defendant to withhold a discovery of the evidences which exclusively relate to his own." In the several "propositions" founded on these two cardinal rules, which he proceeds to formulate, and to the elucidation of which the rest of his treatise is devoted, his language is equally large, and the exceptions from and qualifications of those rules and propositions, which he examines in detail at pages 79 to 120, do not touch the present question. He states expressly (p. 122) that the expression "every plaintiff" is meant by him to include a plaintiff at law who files a bill for discovery only in equity, as well as a plaintiff in equity who seeks relief.

Examples of bills for discovery only, in aid of actions of ejectment brought in Courts of law, are found in Crow v. Tyrell (20), Wright v. Plumptree (22), Pennington v. Beechy (23), Drake v. Drake (15), Bennett v. Glossop (16) and Brown v. Wales (14)—cases which came (all but one of them, on demurrer or plea) before Sir John Leach, Sir James Wigram, and Sir John Wickens. In four of those cases the demurrer or plea was overruled, and it was held that discovery must be given; in another a plea of purchaser for valuable consideration without notice (as to which see Wigram's Discovery, 2nd ed., pp. 81 and 82) was allowed. The sixth came before the Court, after a full answer, upon a motion for the production of deeds, which was refused because the deeds appeared by the pleadings to be evidence of the defendant's title only, and for no other reason. In none of those cases was there the least trace of any objection, in principle, to such a bill of discovery. In one of them—Drake v. Drake (15)—Sir James Wigram said:—"This is a mere bill of discovery in aid of an ejectment . . . . The allegation" (of the plea), "if true, is not at law a bar to the action; and if the plaintiff is entitled to the relief he seeks at law, he is prima facie entitled to discovery also. If the plaintiff is entitled to recover at law, his right to discovery is prima facie incident to his right to the relief; and the defendant can no more refuse to give discovery in such a case than he could refuse to answer a bill for relief in this Court, where the right to the relief in equity could not be controverted." Butterworth v. Bailey (19) is another case of a bill of discovery only, in aid of an ejectment at law, which came before Lord Eldon, after a full answer, upon a motion to amend by adding a prayer for relief; which motion was refused, but upon grounds not implying any doubt that the bill, as it stood, was proper according to the course of the Court.

In Hylton v. Morgan (18) the bill was not for discovery only, but also prayed that the defendant to the action of ejectment might be restrained from setting up outstanding terms. Lord Eldon refused an interlocutory motion for an injunction, saying, "There are two ways of proceeding. You may get a discovery in aid of an ejectment; but if you will have equitable relief to aid the trial of your title at law you must have that relief upon a decretal order prior to the trial at law." Jones v. Jones (21) was a case in which the plaintiff, stating in his bill a legal title to land, on which he was about to proceed at law, asked relief, to which a demurrer was allowed. Sir William Grant said:—"If this had been a bill merely for discovery, there are several parts of it to which an answer must undoubtedly have been given."

It was admitted by the learned counsel for the respondent that discovery in aid of an ejectment at law might always be obtained by a bill praying relief, even if the relief were only to prevent the setting up of outstanding terms. It is unnecessary to consider whether the present action, in a Court which can give both discovery and relief, may not (for this purpose) be equivalent to a bill praying relief; because the right to discovery really rested upon the same principles, whether relief was prayed or not, and whether there was or was not any special equity beyond that which was, in all cases alike, the foundation of the right to discovery. Upon this point Sir James Wigram's authority may again be referred to. He states (pages 5 and 6) that the distinction between bills of discovery and bills for relief, "so far as principle is concerned, has no real existence.

. . . . The right of discovery is in both cases founded upon one and the same principle." (See also page 122 in the same work).

I am, therefore, of opinion that the general ground on which the judgment appealed from appears to have proceeded cannot be maintained; and that unless the whole matters enquired into by the interrogatories which the defendant has not answered are irrelevant to "the plaintiff's case about to come on for trial," in the words of Sir James Wigram's second "Proposition" (Wigram's Discovery, page 15), the defendant must make some sufficient answer to those matters.

The plaintiff claims by conveyance from alleged co-heiresses of Ann Duncan, who died in 1867, being at the time of her death entitled to and seised of the land sought to be recovered in the action, as the defendant admits. The plaintiff will have to prove at the trial that the persons through whom he claims were in fact the heirs of Ann Duncan. In aid of that part of his case, he has addressed to the defendant, by his 20th and 21st interrogatories, a series of questions which are certainly not irrelevant. The defendant, by his answer, has claimed privilege for any information which he may possess on the subject of those questions; but he has not, to my mind, answered with the particularity and distinctness necessary to reduce the discovery which he so declines to give to matters clearly within the privilege which he claims.

If the plaintiff succeeds in establishing the fact of heirship, it will also be necessary for him at the trial to repel the defence of the Statute of Limitations, the action having been brought more than twelve years after Ann Duncan's death. Most of the special averments in the statement of claim, and the interrogatories founded on them, have for their object to repel that defence; and if they are proved in fact (the heirship being also proved), the question will have to be determined at the trial, whether they are sufficient for that purpose in law. Unless their insufficiency is so manifest as to make it certain that they raise no question proper for determination at the trial (whatever the facts may then turn out to be), the plaintiff ought to be at liberty to prove this part of his case by all proper means, discovery included.

The case so set up by the plaintiff amounts in substance to this, that the possession which the defendant has had of Ann Duncan's estate, from the time of her death, was obtained, and retained, by means of the assumption by him of a fiduciary character towards her heirs, whoever they might be, and that he has from time to time made admissions to that effect, acknowledging himself to be accountable on that footing, sometimes by writing under his hand, and sometimes on oath, including two letters addressed by him to the plaintiff himself, though before the plaintiff had any title.

The plaintiff, as I understand his pleading, claims the benefit of the fiduciary relation so alleged to have been undertaken by the defendant; and he will doubtless at the trial insist that when he commenced this action he was entitled to, and did, affirm and ratify, and that the defendant was estopped from denying that fiduciary relation. I express no opinion on the question whether this case, if established, will be sufficient in law to repel the defence of the Statute of Limitations; but I think it raises a question proper to be determined at the trial upon such facts as the plaintiff may then be able to prove, and not proper to be prejudged by an interlocutory order upon interrogatories at this stage of the action. The defendant, therefore, must answer the interrogatories relevant to that portion of the plaintiff's case. It is no sufficient objection that the plaintiff may have, and to some extent (on his own shewing) has, other means of proving the facts enquired after. Admissions of the facts by the defendant might simplify the proof and materially diminish the expense of trial. Of the interrogatories in detail (of which I cannot approve the length) no more need now be said than that I think they ought generally to be answered in substance, subject to any privilege against particular discovery which the defendant may be entitled to claim.

A subordinate question arose upon a summons for the production of certain documents, admitted by the defendant's affidavit of documents filed on the 4th of November, 1881, to be in his possession or power, as to some of which he appears to have intended to claim privilege, under the doctrine of Clagett v. Phillips (62), Pearce v. Pearce (63) and other well known authorities; while as to others he probably intended to object to their production as not being relevant or material to any question to be determined at the trial, though (if the plaintiff should succeed at the trial) they may then become relevant to the consequential account. On comparing the third paragraph of the affidavit, in which protection is claimed for those documents, with the body of the second part of the first schedule in which they are described, the description does not appear to me to agree, as it ought to do, with the claim of privilege. But I think that the respondent ought to be permitted to remove this difficulty which now stands in his way by a further and better affidavit, if he is able to do so, which, as to some at least of the documents described in the latter portion of the schedule, appears to be extremely doubtful.

What I propose to your Lordships is to reverse the orders appealed from, and to remit this case to the Court below, with a declaration that the respondent ought to put in a further and better answer to the appellant's interrogatories, and also to file a further and better affidavit as to all the documents which he objects to produce. The respondent ought, I think, to pay the costs here, and the costs of the summonses in both the Courts below, whatever may be the result of the action.

LORD WATSON.—At the conclusion of the arguments in this case, I was of opinion, with all your Lordships, that the cases cited at the bar for the appellant completely displaced the reasons assigned for their judgment by the Court of Appeal.

The case has been so fully considered in the judgments of your Lordships, which I have had the advantage of perusing, that I shall content myself with saying that the judgment proposed by the Lord Chancellor appears to me to be just in principle and in strict accordance with the settled practice of the equity Courts.

LORD BRAMWELL.—I agree in the conclusion that has been arrived at by those who have preceded me, and in their reasons. But the respect which is due and should be shewn to learned Judges and others appointed to administer the law, makes me think it desirable to shew that I have formed an opinion for myself. And I wish also to call attention to the principle which ought to govern this case, and which, except by Lord Justice Brett, seems to have been lost sight of. And, strange to say, it was supposed that Horton v. Bott (7) was an authority for the decision now under consideration, and the opinion there expressed was quoted with approval as justifying that decision. There could not be a greater mistake.

As a general rule a party to a suit in the Superior Courts has, to support his own case, a right to discovery from his opponent. This must be because the law supposes that the ends of justice will be furthered thereby. But it is said that the case of a plaintiff seeking to recover land is an exception to this rule. I cannot agree. Such an exception can only exist because justice in such suits would not be furthered by such discovery, or because it is not desirable it should be. It seems to me impossible to say the former. The truth will be got at by the same means in suits to recover land as in other suits. We are driven therefore to the only other reason, namely, that in such suits it is not desirable that justice should be furthered thereby, which is impossible. Why should it not? Why not by all the means by which it is furthered in other suits? It was said by my brother Brett that public policy is opposed to it. Why? It is said that the plaintiff in such a suit recovers on the strength of his own title. Supposing that was true in such suits, and in them only, why should he not be at liberty, in order to shew its truth, to use the procedure, as in all other suits, to prove facts? But the truth is, a plaintiff always, if he recovers, does so on the strength of his own title. If the action is for the detention of a chattel, the plaintiff must shew a title to it. If on a bill of exchange, he must shew the defendant is a party, and so on. I see no reason in principle for the defendant's contention.

(62) 2 You. & C.C.C. 82.
(63) 1 De Gex & S. 12; 16 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 153.

As to the authorities, they are to my mind clear for the plaintiff. After their examination by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, I will not trouble your Lordships with any remarks.

I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed.

LORD FITZGERALD.—I also have arrived at the conclusion that the order of the Court of Appeal cannot be sustained, inasmuch as the rule on which it was supposed to rest does not exist. There is no principle properly applicable in support of that order, and it seems to me that it does not recommend itself to our notions of justice. There can be no doubt what the Court of Appeal intended to decide, as the reported language of the Lords Justices is so plain and clear. Lord Justice Brett is reported to have said: "Therefore this action seems to me to be clearly an action brought to recover possession of land, and the right to recover is rested upon the legal title of the plaintiff. The question then is, whether, in such an action as that, the plaintiff can interrogate the defendant upon the matters affecting the plaintiff's title—or, I will put it as high as this, whether he can interrogate the defendant at all."

The Lord Justice then proceeds to discuss that question, and, after some observations on the rule that a plaintiff in such an action must succeed, if at all, on the strength of his own title, he says that the plaintiff "must shew that he himself has the legal title, or a superior title to that of the person who is in possession, and he must shew it entirely by his own means, and until he has shewn that prima facie case, the defendant is not called upon to answer anything or to disclose anything;" and he adds further on, as a conclusion, "therefore, neither before the Common Law Procedure Act, nor afterwards, was it possible for either of the Courts properly to allow a plaintiff in ejectment to interrogate a defendant for the purpose of supporting the plaintiff's claim."

The Master of the Rolls puts it as forcibly and as clearly. After enquiring whether there was any case in which a Court of equity had enforced discovery under such circumstances, he observes: "There is no such case, and the reason is obvious—that it would be against public policy." And further on, he adds: "The object of it all was simply to make a man recover in an action of ejectment by the strength of his own title alone, and I think there was a good reason for it; but, reason or no reason, the course of practice in these actions is conclusive as to the non-existence of the right to file a bill for discovery by defendants in actions of ejectment; and we do find special exceptions in actions for the recovery of land where the landlord's title is admitted, but we find no such case where the person claiming adversely to the plaintiff has been admitted to do that."

Mr. Horton Smith, in his argument for the defendant, took very high ground indeed, when he urged that "The plaintiff can have no answer. This is a point of high public policy."

It did occur to me on the opening that the discussion ought to be a very short one; but the case has been debated at great length, as involving a principle applicable to all actions of ejectment on a legal title when the plaintiff's title is controverted.

A great number of cases were cited and commented on, and we were referred to several text-books of considerable authority. The industry of Mr. McClymont discovered and brought under our notice several cases in point; and I entirely agree with the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack, as the result of the examination of the authorities, that there exists no rule or practice in equity which forbade the enforcement of discovery in aid of an action of ejectment founded on a legal title; and that, on the contrary, bills of discovery in such cases were entertained, and discovery enforced, as in other cases.

Having arrived at that conclusion, the appeal must be allowed, and the defendant must answer. If the interrogatories have not been put bona fide, or are oppressive, or irrelevant, or scandalous, or are subject to any other valid objection, it will lie on the defendant to apply to strike them out, or he may refuse to answer some of them on special grounds, or he may seek to postpone some portions of the discovery until the plaintiff has established heirship.

I may be permitted to observe that your Lordships' decision does not in the least trench on the rule or maxim so much relied on in the Court below—that a plaintiff in ejectment must succeed, if at all, on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of the title of the defendant in possession, or, in other words, that the plaintiff must prove his title before the defendant can be called on to enter on his defence. Possession is enough for him until the plaintiff has shewn a right to take that possession from him. "Melior est conditio possidentis" is not confined to land, though more frequently applied to the actual and visible possession of land than to chattels, for the possession of land has ever been regarded by the law with some degree of favour as prima facie evidence of ownership in fee. In The King v. The Bishop of Worcester (64) it is said, "When you will recover anything from me it is not enough for you to destroy my title; you must prove your own better than mine; for it is not rational to conclude you have no right to this and therefore I have, for, without a better right, 'melior est conditio possidentis' regularly."

The plaintiff does not contest this maxim, or seek to escape from it. He admits that he must prove his title, and can only proceed on a proved title. He claims to be permitted to prove that title. He seeks to do so now by the examination of the defendant as to his (the plaintiff's) title, just as he would be entitled to call the defendant as a witness on the trial and examine him as to the pedigree on which the plaintiff relies, or any other step in his title on which the defendant may be a competent witness.

The contention of the defendant, on the other hand, seems to be inconsistent. He says the plaintiff must prove his title, but "he is not permitted to interrogate me now to it, even though I may be the plaintiff's only witness." There is nothing in the maxim, and there is nothing in public policy or in the policy of the law, which deprives the plaintiff of the ordinary right of proving his own title by the lips of the defendant.

There was another question discussed in the case, on which I desire to guard myself—namely, whether, under the Judicature Act and Rules, the right of discovery is or is not more extensive than it formerly was in Courts of equity. It was put thus: the Judicature Act is an Act to regulate procedure, and not to affect established right; and that if there was no right to discovery before the passing of the Judicature Act, there is no right to interrogate now. On these propositions I refrain from expressing any opinion, save that they are stated too largely, for there can be no doubt that the Judicature Act in carrying into effect the object stated in its preamble, "the better administration of justice," does interfere with and alter right. If the expressions used be limited to "discovery" and to "administering interrogatories," the rules clearly do make an alteration as to what has been called "right"; for example, a Court of equity in the exercise of its auxiliary jurisdiction did not lend its aid to enforce discovery, where the action was in respect of a mere tort, or to recover a penalty or enforce a forfeiture; but I should think that a plaintiff may now in an action properly constituted for any of those purposes exhibit interrogatories and enforce discovery.

It seems to me also not to be very clear that an increased power to exhibit interrogatories to the defendant and enforce discovery as to plaintiff's title, or vice versa, is an interference with the right of the party interrogated, or is more than alteration of procedure. Since the passing of the Evidence Amendment Acts, making all parties competent witnesses, it is difficult to see that there can be a "right" in any litigant to refuse to answer proper interrogatories where he is liable to be called as a witness and examined viva voce to the same matters.

The Judicature Act and Order XXXI. seem to confer on the litigant in every action the right to exhibit interrogatories to his opponent, subject to the protection given by the exercise of judicial discretion and by the succeeding rules of Order Practice — Administration Action — Trustee—Discretionary Powers—Appointment of New Trustee after Decree.

It is now the settled practice of the Court not to interfere, even after an administration decree, with trustees in the bona fide exercise of their discretionary powers; but the Court must be satisfied that the power is being properly exercised.

A power to appoint new trustees is a discretionary power. The right to appoint is vested in the donee of the power, and the Court sanctions the appointment if satisfied that the nominee is a fit and proper person; but if the Court disapproves of the nominee, then the donee of the power must nominate another person.

This was an appeal from a decision of Bacon, V.C.

The action was to administer the real and personal estate of G. T. Gadd, deceased, and to carry into execution the trusts of his will.

The testator died in 1870, and by his will appointed his wife Mary Gadd and the defendant trustees of his will, and declared that on the death, refusal or incapacity to act of any trustee, the surviving or acting trustee might appoint a new trustee.

Mary Gadd died in January, 1882, and the action was commenced in June, 1882, by the residuary legatee, an infant, by her father as next friend.

The usual administration decree was made on the 1st of July, and directed that a new trustee should be appointed in the place of Mary Gadd.

On the 28th of November, the plaintiff took out a summons for the appointment of a new trustee, and nominated a Mr. S. Eastwood. The defendant then took out a similar summons and nominated a Mr. W. Whiteley.

It was not alleged that either Mr. Whiteley or Eastwood was not a fit and proper person to be trustee.

The Vice-Chancellor, in accordance with the practice in his chambers, appointed the nominee of the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Millar, Q.C., and P. B. Abraham, for the appellant.—The Court will not interfere with a trustee in the proper exercise of the discretionary powers given him by the testator—In re Tempest (1) and Tempest v. Camoys (2). A power to appoint new trustees is a discretionary power.

[They were stopped.]

Hemming, Q.C., and George Williamson, for the respondent.—After decree the trustee nominates, but the Court appoints new trustees.

[JESSEL, M.R.—No. The Court does not interfere with the discretion vested in the donee of the power; it only takes care that the discretion is properly exercised.

The donee nominates and the Court sanctions the appointment.]

The decree directs that a new trustee be appointed, and under the old practice there would have been a reference to the Master, and the Master would have appointed, and the appointment could not have been questioned on appeal—Middleton v. Reay (3).

[JESSEL, M.R.—That case turned upon the particular words of the reference, and has nothing to do with this point. Whatever the old practice may have been, it is now the settled practice that after decree the donee of the power nominates the new trustee and the Court sanctions the appointment; but if it disapproves of the nominee, then the donee has to nominate some one else.]

We object to this gentleman because he is the nephew of the defendant and lives at Sheffield, which is fifty miles from Halifax, where the testator's estate is situated.

[JESSEL, M.R.—That is not a sufficient objection. Have you any other personal objection to him?]

No, we withdraw all objections.

JESSEL, M.R.—Then the order will be —Discharge the order of the Court below, and appoint Mr. Whiteley to be the new trustee. Costs of the appeal to be costs in the action.

BIRT v. BURT.

Executor — Retainer — Solicitor — Receiver—Security.

A member of a firm, solicitors to the plaintiff in an administration action, was administrator to, and creditor of, the intestate in the action:—Held, that he could not retain money belonging to the estate which had come to his hands after a receiver had been nominated but had not given security.

This was a summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate in an administration action, by, among other things, disallowing an item of 1,409*l.* in the account of Henry Wm. Burt, the defendant in the action. The summons was taken out by the person who now had the conduct of the action, who was not the plaintiff.

The defendant had obtained letters of administration to the estate of Jacob Birt. The action was brought by Wm. Jacob Birt; he employed Messrs. Webb, Stock & Burt as his solicitors. The defendant was a member of that firm, but was not that member who acted for the plaintiff. A Mr. Lucas was appointed receiver in the action by an order dated the 21st of March, 1876. Before his appointment was consummated by the giving security the defendant received certain sums amounting to 1,500*l.* in respect of furniture which he had ordered to be sold by auction. In his accounts, which had been certified by the chief clerk, he had appropriated a portion of that sum to meet the debt due to him from the intestate, which amounted to 1,409*l.*, and was the item now in question. The facts are more fully stated in the judgment.

Cookson, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the summons.—No doubt the property does not vest in the receiver till his appointment has been perfected by his giving security. But for the purpose of destroying the right of the executor to receive and retain moneys the appointment operates from the time the receiver is nominated by the Court, and after that the auctioneer ought not to have paid the money to them.

In re Birt.

[FRY, J., said the difficulty in allowing the retainer was that the person seeking to take advantage of the right was solicitor to the plaintiff, and owed a duty to his client to prevent the assets going into the hands of the administrator.]

Glasse, Q.C., and Lloyd, for H. W. Burt.—It was clear that an administrator's was the proper hand to receive the assets up to the time the receiver was actually appointed, and having once got the assets into his hands his right to retain arose.

If the fact that he was solicitor to the plaintiff made any difference that would only be so when the solicitor was personally engaged.

Edwards v. Edwards (1), Defries v. Creed (2), Wickens v. Townshend (3), and In re Watkins; ex parte Evans (4), were cited on both sides as to the position of receiver pending security being given; and Talbot v. Frere (5) and Richmond v. White (6) on the administrator's right of retainer.

FRY, J.—The facts in this case are not in dispute. It appears that the intestate, Mr. Jacob Birt, died in February, 1876, and in the following month administration was taken out by the defendant Henry William Burt, who is a solicitor, and was a member of the firm of Webb, Stock & Burt. On the 17th of March, two days after the date of the letters of administration, judgment was obtained in an action brought by Mr. William Jacob Birt against the defendant Henry William Burt, and on the 21st of March Mr. Lucas was appointed receiver upon his giving security in the usual manner. Upon that occasion and on the occasion of the judgment the plaintiff was represented by the firm of Webb, Stock & Burt, of which the defendant, as I have already said, was a member; and one of the affidavits made upon the occasion of the appointment of Mr. Lucas was the affidavit of Mr. Henry William Burt, in which he swore that Mr. Lucas was a fit and proper person to be appointed. That affidavit was filed on the part of the plaintiff by the firm of Webb, Stock & Burt. It appears to me that by so acting for the plaintiff the defendant undertook a duty towards the plaintiff; but it appears that he was also a creditor of the late Mr. Jacob Birt, and being both creditor and administrator he was interested in getting assets into his hand so as to exercise against them the right of retainer. He therefore had assumed a duty inconsistent with that right, because, as representing the plaintiff, he ought to have used every diligence to prevent any right of retainer being set up. The estate was either insolvent or likely to turn out insolvent, and the plaintiff had an interest in the equal distribution of the assets, and the defendant an unequal interest in the distribution. By assuming the office of solicitor to the plaintiff, in my judgment, he precluded himself from exercising the right which he otherwise would have had to the unequal distribution of the assets. That being his position, he directs a sale of the furniture, a step which I am far from saying he was not at liberty to do, provided he did nothing inconsistent with the plaintiff's interest; and in the month of April, and on four successive occasions on the 4th, 6th, 7th and 8th of that month, the firm of Webb, Stock & Burt received cheques from the auctioneer for furniture so sold, amounting in all to 1,500*l.* Those cheques were drawn in favour of the firm or order, and have found their way into the hands of Mr. Burt, who thereupon endorsed them in the name of the firm and paid them to his own separate account. He thereby assumed possession of the assets against the interest of the plaintiff and against the receiver upon his being appointed. He gave his recognisances the day after the last of those cheques found its way into the banking account of the plaintiff. It appears to me, therefore, that the defendant by undertaking the duty towards the plaintiff as his solicitor precluded himself from the right to obtain that money, or, if he obtained it, from asserting a right of retainer against it. It is suggested that the proper course was for him to retain it, because the firm of which he was a member might have become bankrupt. If there was any danger of that sort his duty was plain—namely, to have paid the money into Court, and so to have protected it; but I have no reason to suppose that the suggestion is any other than one drawn from fancy rather than probability. I think, therefore, the plaintiff having, as I have already said, undertaken the duty of solicitor to a person interested in the equal distribution of the assets, having been present at the appointment of the receiver, having sworn an affidavit approving of the receiver, and as solicitor of the plaintiff obtained the appointment of the receiver, he was not at liberty to do anything but retain those moneys, to hand them over to the receiver when his recognisance was perfected. In coming to that conclusion, it appears to me that I am acting in accordance with the principle on which the Lord Chancellor acted in the case of Wickens v. Townshend (3).

In a foreclosure action, the plaintiff desiring a sale, and the defendant not appearing, the Court directed an account, and on certificate, a sale of so much of the property as should be sufficient to satisfy what should be found due.

This was a foreclosure action, in which the defendant had made default in appearing at the trial, and an order had been made for an account and sale. A difficulty had been raised by the Registrar as to the form of the order—whether the sale was to be directed at once or on the chief clerk's certificate being made.

Sturges asked for an immediate sale—The York Union Banking Company v. Artley (1).

FRY, J., thought the proper form of order was to direct an account to be taken in the first place of what was due to the plaintiffs on their security, and on that amount being certified, so much of the property only as should be sufficient to satisfy the amount so found due and costs should be sold. Liberty to apply should be reserved.

Practice—Next Friend — Discovery—Production of Documents—Rules of Court, 1875, Order XXXI. rule 12—Next Friend not a "Party to the Action."

The next friend of an infant plaintiff is not a "party to the action" within the meaning of the Rules of Court, 1875, Order XXXI. rule 12, and therefore cannot be compelled to make discovery as to documents in his possession or power relating to the matters in question in the action.

This was an administration action by an infant plaintiff appearing by three next friends—namely, Georgiana Lawton his mother, W. Lawton his father's brother, and C. H. J. Lawton his father's uncle. These three persons were the testamentary guardians of the infant.

Disputes arose between the next friends, and a summons was taken out by H. G. Kisbey, volunteering to act as next friend of the infant for that purpose, for the removal of W. Lawton and C. H. J. Lawton from the office of next friend.

With a view to obtain discovery in support of this summons, H. G. Kisbey took out two further summonses, one to compel W. Lawton and C. H. J. Lawton to produce a banker's pass-book containing items relating to sums allowed for the maintenance of the plaintiff (which was one of the subjects in dispute), and the other to compel them to file the usual affidavit as to documents in their possession or power relating to the matters in question in the action.

These two summonses were adjourned into Court, and now came on to be heard together.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the summonses, referred to Order XXXI. rule 12.

W. Pearson, Q.C., and P. B. Lambert, for W. Lawton and C. H. J. Lawton, objected that the rule referred to only extended to discovery from a person who was "a party to the action," and that a next friend was not a party to the action, and could not therefore be compelled to make discovery. It would be a great hardship if persons not parties to an action could be so compelled.

Kekewich, Q.C., and Bardswell, for the trustees of the estate.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., in reply.

KAY, J.—The action in which the present applications are made is brought by an infant plaintiff appearing by three next friends, a mode of proceeding which I never heard of before, and which I hope never to hear of again. By reason of that, I suppose, the present applicant took out a summons, as a volunteer next friend, to have two of the next friends removed. That illustrates at once the enormous disadvantage of having three next friends in an action. [His Lordship then stated the circumstances under which the two summonses now before him were taken out, and continued:] I asked what authority there is for an application of this kind, and I was referred to Order XXXI. rule 12, which is in these terms:—"Any party may, without filing any affidavit, apply to a Judge for an order directing any other party to the action to make discovery on oath of the documents which are or have been in his possession or power relating to any matter in question in the action." Now the word "party" the second time used in that order is unmistakably clear. The words are "any other party to the action." The language of the rule is restricted to a party to the action, and nobody but a party to the action can be ordered to make an affidavit as to documents. As was said in the course of the argument, it would be an intolerable wrong and oppression if a person might compel any other person, not a party to any action between them, to make an affidavit as to documents. Therefore I have to consider in this case whether the two next friends sought to be removed are, for the purposes of the pending contest between them and the volunteer next friend, parties to the action. The volunteer next friend had a perfect right to take out the summons for the removal of the two next friends, because, that being in effect a summons by the infant, any next friend may apply, at the risk of being liable for costs, if the application is improper. But the question is whether the two next friends are parties to this action. I cannot possibly say that they are. It seems to me that these summonses are an entire mistake of practice. There are other modes in which the discovery may be obtained; and the obvious other mode in which the volunteer next friend may obtain sight of any documents not covered by privilege in the possession of the next friends is by treating them as witnesses, serving them with a subpœna duces tecum, and compelling them in that way to produce any documents they may have. It seems to me obviously necessary to confine this kind of practice to persons who are parties to the action in the strict and proper sense. That being so, it appears to me that these two applications are altogether wrong; and even if they had been right, I should hesitate very much to give the volunteer next friend any costs of applications of this kind. The two summonses must be refused, with costs to be paid by the volunteer next friend.

A second or cross suit of Fothergill v. Collins was instituted in the year 1867 by the defendants in the first-named suit against the plaintiffs in the same suit, praying for specific performance of an agreement for sale of the farm.

W. H. Forman died on the 28th of August, 1869, and the suit of Phillips v. Homfray was revived against his executors.

On the 9th of May, 1870, a decree was made in both suits by Stuart, V.C. This decree was appealed from, and the appeal was heard before Lord Hatherley, L.C., who, on the 30th of June, 1871, made an order varying the decree of the Vice-Chancellor. The case on appeal is reported Law Rep. 6 Chanc. 770.

By the decree of the Vice-Chancellor as varied on appeal, it was declared that the defendants S. Homfray and R. Fothergill in the first suit, and also the estate of the deceased defendant W. H. Forman in the first suit, were answerable to the plaintiffs in the first suit, for and in respect of all coal, ironstone and other produce at any time gotten or removed by the said S. Homfray, R. Fothergill and W. H. Forman, or any of them, or by any person or persons by their order or for their use, under the plaintiffs' farm or any part thereof, and that the defendants S. Homfray and R. Fothergill in the first suit were liable to make compensation to the plaintiffs for user of all roads and passages under the said farm; and after an enquiry, first, as to the quantities of coal, ironstone and other produce gotten or removed, the following further enquiries were directed:—

2. An enquiry what quantities of coal, ironstone and other produce had been conveyed from the collieries and mines of the defendants in the first suit or any of them over or through the roads or passages under the plaintiffs' said farm.

3. An enquiry what amount upon the result of the enquiry last directed ought to be paid by the defendants in the first suit to the plaintiffs in the first suit for wayleave and royalty in respect of the user by the defendants in the first suit of the said roads and passages for the purpose of working or ventilating their said collieries and mines.

4. An enquiry whether the said farm and the mineral property of the plaintiffs in the first suit under the same had sustained any, and if any what, amount of damage by reason of the manner in which the defendants in the first suit had worked the coal, ironstone and other produce under the plaintiffs' said farm.

R. Fothergill died on the 19th day of September, 1871, and the suit of Phillips v. Homfray was revived against the defendant Mary Fothergill as the widow and surviving executrix of the will of R. Fothergill.

In the year 1870 a suit was commenced by the Baroness Llanover, as lady of the manor of which the plaintiffs' farm (which was of copyhold tenure) was holden, claiming that she was entitled to the minerals under the farm, and to damages in respect of the several acts of trespass complained of in Phillips v. Homfray. The litigation in this suit terminated in November, 1881, in favour of the plaintiffs Messrs. Phillips, the Court of Appeal deciding that the customary tenants of the manor in question were entitled to the minerals in their tenements, and to work the same.

In consequence of the litigation with Lady Llanover, the enquiries in Phillips v. Homfray were not proceeded with until July, 1882, on the 14th of which month Kay, J., by an order made in chambers, directed that the enquiries should be made by the official referee in rotation.

The enquiries were accordingly proceeded with by the official referee, who held sittings at Cardiff, where, after seven days' hearing, he adjourned the enquiry and made an appointment for the 1st of July, 1883. There was evidence that the prosecution of the enquiries would take up a great deal of time and be very expensive.

This was a motion on behalf of Mrs. Fothergill that all further proceedings on the second, third and fourth enquiries above set out might be stayed, and that accordingly the official referee might be directed not to proceed with the same.

Rigby, Q.C., and Osler, for the motion.—Any sum which might have been found due from Mr. Fothergill under these enquiries was damages for a trespass or personal tort, as to which the rule actio personalis moritur cum persona applies, and for which therefore his executrix is not liable. This is clear from the form of the decree itself, in which the executor of Forman, who died before the decree was made, was only held liable for the value of the coal wrongfully taken, and not for damages. And it also appears from the judgment of Hatherley, L.C. (1), where he says that he is granting damages which, under the old law, could only have been recovered in an action in a common law Court. The same question came before him as Vice-Chancellor in Powell v. Aiken (2), where he refused relief against an executor in respect of a wayleave. His decision in the present case proceeded on no equitable doctrine, but merely followed the law, and was intended to give, under Lord Cairns' Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27), the same damages as would have been given in an action at law.

In order that the right should survive there must be a final judgment by which actio transit in rem judicatam. An interlocutory judgment is not sufficient. See Ireland v. Champneys (3)—where an action for libel was held not to survive—Fort v. Oliver (4), Smith v. Eyles (5)—where it was held that a judgment quod computet does not pass in rem judicatam until final decree—and Weston v. James (6).

Whatever may be said as to enquiries Nos. 2 and 3, it is plain that No. 4 is nothing more than a simple tort.

that time, for any compensation for the use of the wayleave, or damages in respect of the improper working of the coal. [His Lordship then proceeded to state the other facts of the case, down to and including the decease of Mr. Fothergill, and continued:] The present motion is made by Mr. Fothergill's representative, that three out of four of the enquiries directed by the decree of the Vice-Chancellor Stuart of the 14th of March, 1870, may be stayed, on the ground that this suit is, so far as those three enquiries are concerned, actio personalis quæ moritur cum persona, and that in consequence of the death of Mr. Fothergill no relief can be had against his estate either in this suit or in any other. The first enquiry, which is not sought to be stayed, is the enquiry as to the value of the coal abstracted from Messrs. Phillips' property. With regard to that it is admitted that Mr. Fothergill's estate is liable, and that that enquiry properly proceeds against his executrix. But with regard to the value of the rights of wayleave which the defendants used over the Messrs. Phillips' property, that was said to be simply damages, in the strict sense of damages, as in an action against a person for battery or assault, that it was not an action which could by any possibility survive as against an executor, and that the enquiries relating to that ought to be stayed. These enquiries are two: one, as to the amount of coal carried over and through the Messrs. Phillips' property by the defendants; and the second enquiry following upon that, what ought to be charged for royalty for the use of the wayleave over the property through which the coal was so carried. The last enquiry is an enquiry which was left in the decree by the Lord Chancellor Hatherley, and it is in these terms. [His Lordship read the terms of the fourth enquiry.] Now the rule as to actions which survive and which do not survive is not matter of question or doubt at the present day, because it came to be decided more than a hundred years ago in the case which was cited by Mr. Graham Hastings of Hambly v. Trott (9), which has been followed in all other cases since. Lord Mansfield there said—"Where the cause of action is money due, or a contract to be performed, gain or acquisition of the testator, by the work and labour or property of another, or a promise of the testator express or implied—where these are the causes of action the action survives against the executor. But where the cause of action is a tort, or arises ex delicto (as is laid in Sir T. Raym. 57, Hole v. Blandford), supposed to be by force and against the king's peace, there the action dies, as battery, false imprisonment, trespass, words, nuisance, obstructing lights, diverting a watercourse, escape against the sheriff and many other cases of the like kind." And he quotes further on a case of Sir Henry Sherrington, who had cut down trees upon the Queen's land and converted them to his own use in his lifetime, and in which, upon an information against his widow, after his decease, Mr. Justice Manwood said, "In every case where any price or value is set upon the thing in which the offence is committed, if the defendant dies his executor shall be chargeable; but where the action is for damage only in satisfaction of the injury done, there his executor shall not be liable."

I believe that that has been the law ever since, and is the law at the present day. I confess I had some doubt originally, and for some time during the course of the argument, as to whether or not the second and third enquiries were directed for the purpose of assessing, according to the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, damages only, or whether or not they were directed for the purpose of assessing the price to be paid by the wrongdoers here for the use and occupation which they had had of the plaintiffs' property; and I am glad to find on looking at the Lord Chancellor Hatherley's judgment when the case was before him, that he both entertained the same doubt and expressed it, for he says (at p. 780 of the report) "I at first felt some doubt as to compensation for wayleave; but on further consideration I think that on principle it ought to be given, whether the cases have as yet gone that length or not. Here is a man doing a surreptitious act which cannot be discovered except through the medium of a bill. Under the old practice there would have been a bill for discovery of the thing, and then an action for damages in respect of it would have been brought; but this Court has now the power to grant compensation in respect of a continuously accruing damage de die in diem, arising from a continuous trespass underground, which can only be stopped by injunction restraining any further conveyance of coal through the respondent's property. These damages cannot be better assessed than by an enquiry what is fit and proper to be paid for wayleave for the coals carried through the property. I, therefore, affirm that part of the decree."

I come, therefore, to the conclusion in my own mind, as well as intending to follow the judgment of Lord Hatherley, which I should do even if I entertained more doubt, that what is to be paid is in substance analogous to and stands, as regards the wayleave, in the stead of the price to be paid for the coal, and that I must treat what is called, for want of a better word, damages, assessed under the second and third enquiries, as what Lord Hatherley called "compensation in respect of a continuously accruing damage de die in diem." It is really and truly paying back to the plaintiffs part of the profit which the defendants themselves received from using the wayleave instead of raising their coal by a more expensive and difficult way; and having arrived at that conclusion, I have really arrived at the decision which ought to be come to upon this motion. Mrs. Fothergill, on whose behalf the motion is made, admits that she is properly brought here and properly liable so far as regards the estate of her testator for the value of the coal dug out of the property, and if she is liable for that I cannot understand how she can escape liability for the compensation for the use of the wayleave across the plaintiffs' property. It seems to me to stand on exactly the same footing and to be governed by the same principle: it is not damages in the ordinary sense for personal injuries inflicted, but simply compensation which has to be paid out of the estate of the testator, because that estate in one way or other derived profit from the use of the wayleave; and therefore I might here conclude what I have to say upon this

, simply because I have come to nclusion that the damages under the and third enquiries are governed ictly the same principle as those the first enquiry, but my respect e arguments which have been ad- l to me leads me to say a word or ore. It was argued very strongly :. Rigby, first, that at law where is an interlocutory judgment, and fendant dies between interlocutory al judgment, the action cannot be l, and that therefore there can be ivor here. It was argued also very ly that if with regard to the way- here could be an action at law, it e an action for use and occupation; asmuch as the whole of the action s founded on trespass, it was said was impossible to go on with that as an action for use and occupation: ry foundation of an action of tres- itself putting an end to any ques- use and occupation. I think Mr. is right in his contention with to use and occupation. I think it e plain that this is not an action e and occupation. But I should call attention to what Lord Mans- ays in Hambly v. Trott (9) with to actions which survive and the r in which they ought to be dealt He says in the course of the first ent (for there were two arguments t case), "The fundamental point to sidered in this case is whether, if gets the property of another into nds, it may be recovered against his ors in the form of an action of , where there is an action against the ors in another form. It is merely inction whether the relief shall be form or that. Suppose the testator ld the sheep, &c., in question; in that n action for money had and received lie. Suppose the testator had left in specie to the executors, the con- n must have been laid against the ors. There is no difficulty as to lministration of the assets, because re not the testator's own property. se the testator had consumed them ad eaten the sheep, what action have lain then? I shall be very to decide that trover will not lie if there is no other remedy for the right." And Mr. Justice Aston says, "Suppose the executor had had a counter-demand against the plaintiff, he could not have set it off in trover; but in an action for money had and received he might. If these things had been left by the testator in specie, the conversion must have been laid by the executor. There seems to be but little difference between actions of trover, and actions for money had and received. As at present advised, I incline to think trover maintainable in this case."

Well, there was a second argument, in which they came to the conclusion that trover would not lie, and this is the end of the judgment:—"The form of the plea is decisive—namely, that the testator was not guilty; and the issue is to try the guilt of the testator. And no mischief is done: for so far as the cause of action does not arise ex delicto or ex maleficio of the testator, but is founded in a duty which the testator owes the plaintiff; upon principles of civil obligation, another form of action may be brought, as an action for money had and received. Therefore we are all of opinion that the judgment must be arrested." The real decision in that case was a decision, not that the action did not survive, but simply that the form of action was wrong: that instead of an action of trover it ought to have been an action for money had and received: that if an action of trover were brought, conversion ought to be laid, and that it must be conversion by the executor and not by the testator: and taking the principle which certainly ought to be the governing principle in a Court of equity, and more especially in a case of mines, with regard to which relief can be given in a much wider way than in other similar actions, because the Court treats mines as a sort of trade or business—I should be very sorry if I thought I was fettered by the form of this action, and ought to remit the plaintiffs to bring some other action against the executor in order to obtain that right, which, so far as I can see, and so far as I know, without infringing any rule of equity, they can obtain in this present action. I know nothing whatever in the form of this action which would compel me to nonsuit the plaintiffs. Therefore I must hold that Mrs. Fothergill is rightly brought here, and is certainly liable for any damages which may be assessed under the second and third enquiries in the same way as under the first. With regard to the fourth enquiry, I intimated in the course of the argument, and I reiterate the opinion, that those are damages in the same sense in which a man recovers damages for battery or assault—compensation for a personal injury—and cannot be held answerable by the executrix on the ground of any profit derived therefrom by the estate of the testator. I therefore must stay the fourth enquiry, but as regards the second and third enquiries the motion must be refused.

Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27), ss. 7, 25 and 34; 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57. ss. 1–8—Mortgage.

A mortgage had been paid off more than thirteen years, but no reconveyance executed:—Held, that a purchaser could not require the concurrence of the mortgagee, on the ground that the mortgagor had become tenant-at-will to the mortgagee, and that time began to run one year thereafter.

This was a summons under the Vendors and Purchasers Act, 1874, s. 9, taken out by a purchaser to have the question determined whether the vendor was obliged to obtain the concurrence of the survivor of three mortgagees, whose debt had been paid off more than thirteen years ago.

The mortgage in question was executed in April, 1853, to Sir Thomas Dyke Acland and two others. The mortgagee never went into possession, and the debt was paid off in 1856, on the occasion of a sale of the property; but no reconveyance was ever executed by the mortgagees.

Cookson, Q.C., and Whately, for the purchaser.—The mortgagee, when a mortgage is paid off, becomes a trustee for the mortgagor of the legal estate—Teevan v. Smith (1). Section 25 of the Statute of Limitations of Will. 4 applies, and controls section 34, and prevents any time running so as to take the legal estate out of the mortgagee—Doe v. Rock (2) and Drummond v. Sant (3).

Wolstenholme, for the vendors.—Section 25 does not apply to trusts other than express trusts—that is, trusts expressed in writing, or at most trusts declared by word of mouth—Petre v. Petre (4); and there is no express trust raised by a mortgage. There is not even any implied trust. As soon as the debt was paid off, the mortgagor's remedy was by action to redeem, which bears no relation to an action by a cestui que trust.

A mortgagee is not a trustee under the Trustee Acts—In re Propert (5).

A reconveyance (if necessary) will be presumed—Hillary v. Waller (6).

Cookson, Q.C., replied.

FRY, J.—It appears to me that on the payment off the mortgagee became trustee for the mortgagor, and the mortgagor became tenant-at-will of the mortgagee, who had the legal estate. It is not necessary to go into the enquiry, what is the exact nature of the relationship between a mortgagor and mortgagee while the mortgage is existing. The mortgagor, we know, is sometimes said to be tenant-at-will; sometimes the relationship is said to be purely anomalous. But it appears to me that after the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee had come to an end the mortgagor was tenant-at-will. That being the conclusion at which I have arrived, it remains to enquire how far section 34 of the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4

c. 27, applies. That provides "That at the determination of the periods limited by this Act to any person for making an entry or distress, or bringing any writ of quare impedit or other action or suit, the right and title of such person to the land, rent or advowson, for the recovery whereof such entry, distress, action or suit respectively might have been made or brought within such period, shall be extinguished."

Before we can determine the end of a period, we must settle the beginning of the period; and therefore the enquiry is, at what period the right of the mortgagee to enter began. It has been contended that section 25 of the same Act, which provides for the relationship of trustee and cestui que trust, applies; and that has taken it out of section 34. In my view that is not so. It is not shewn in the present case that there was any trust in the mortgage-deed; but I understand it was in the ordinary form, containing the usual conditions, and therefore the mortgagees' estate had become absolute at law; and the instrument contained no word raising any trust in the events which have happened. My notion of an express trust is one expressed by writing or by word of mouth, and that it does not include a trust raised from the acts of the parties. It does not include, in my judgment, a resulting trust, an implied trust or a constructive trust. The judgment of Vice-Chancellor Kindersley in Petre v. Petre (4) is an exact expression of my view, except that he declined to apply the expression to any trust not expressed in writing. It is not necessary to consider how far that limitation was accurate. I hold, therefore, that section 25 does not apply.

In order, therefore, to answer the enquiry at what period the right of the mortgagee to enter accrued (he being the mortgagor of the estate-at-will), it is necessary to refer to the 7th section of the same Act, which deals with tenancies-at-will. That provides that "When any person shall be in possession or in receipt of the profits of any land, or in receipt of any rent as tenant-at-will, the right of the person entitled subject thereto, or of the person through whom he claims, to make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover such land or rent, shall be deemed to have first accrued, either at the determination of such tenancy or at the expiration of one year next after the commencement of such tenancy, at which time such tenancy shall be deemed to have determined." Now, pausing there, it is plain that the Act gave a period of twenty-one years after the commencement of the tenancy as the longest period during which the lessor-at-will could enter upon the lessee-at-will. That period would now be reduced to thirteen years. Then there followed the proviso that "No mortgagor or cestui que trust shall be deemed to be a tenant-at-will within the meaning of this clause to his mortgagee or trustee."

It appears to me that the mortgage which I am considering is not within the proviso, because the mortgage had come to an end by the payment off. The true relation of mortgagor and mortgagee was no longer subsisting between the parties. It appears to me equally clear, having regard to the two decisions of Doe v. Rock (2) and Drummond v. Sant (3), that the mortgagee was not a trustee and the mortgagor was not a cestui que trust within the meaning of that proviso, the Courts having put upon the word "trustee" in that clause the meaning of a trustee under an expressed trust. It follows that, in my judgment, the 7th section applies, and that the lessor-at will—that is to say, the mortgagee—had thirteen years after the commencement of the tenancy-at-will within which to bring his action. At the end of that thirteen years his right was extinguished by the 34th section. More than the thirteen years having expired, the legal estate has been extinguished; and the fact that there was no reconveyance ceases to be any objection. It has been urged before me that the 34th section of the Act cannot apply to a case in which in view of a Court of equity an entry would be entirely wrong. I cannot entertain that view. The right at law of a mortgagee who has not reconveyed to his mortgagor to enter upon the mortgaged property appears to me plain. It is not taken away by the statute of Geo. 2, to which reference has been made. In the first place that does not take away the right of action, it only stays the action upon certain terms. In the second place, it appears to me that that statute does not apply at all to this particular case. That provides for a case in which money is still due upon the mortgage; and in which, therefore, the Court of equity could not grant relief until the account had been taken. In this state of circumstances it does not arise, where the mortgage has been paid off before the action is brought. I therefore overrule the objection which has been urged before me.

KITTY, J.—The question in this case whether an executrix who has become krupt since the commencement of the on is entitled to her costs of the action sequently to the bankruptcy. In the ent state of the authorities I must that they are conflicting. There direct decision of Vice-Chancellor l and a decision of Mr. Justice North ch decided the point inconsistently with the other. In this state of gs it is necessary that I should con- r shortly what the principles are upon ch the Court appears to have pro- led. The Master of the Rolls in the of Smith v. Dale (5), after having d Lord Gifford's judgment in the case Harmer v. Harris (9), ending with se words, "these parties cannot receive ir costs while they continue debtors to estate," says "that is right." The de- ting executor would have been enti- l to no costs until he had made good default. It is equally clear that this nciple applies to a trustee and to an cutor—no distinction can be made. t another principle has been brought and I must, in order to shew what at principle is, go shortly through some the leading authorities upon the sub- ct.

The first case is that of Samuels v. Jones (2), and the Vice-Chancellor there allowed the subsequent costs. I will not read his judgment at length, because my judgment if I did so would be too long. It seems to me that he states one ground, and one ground only, for his position, and that is, that the bankruptcy was a statutory mode by which the debt of the executor was discharged. Consequently there was no set-off as between the costs which the executor prima facie was entitled to, or the costs which the trustee was prima facie entitled to receive, and the debt which he owed. Why? Because the debt was barred by the bankruptcy. That appears to be the ground on which the case of Gibbons v. Hawley, which is cited in a note to Samuels v. Jones (2), was decided, because the decree, which appears to have been most carefully framed, recites that inasmuch as the defendant became a debtor to the estate, he was, in respect of the amount of his default, by reason of the Act in force for the relief of insolvent debtors, and for other reasons given, discharged by virtue of the insolvency. It is quite immaterial whether it was technically right to say that the defendant was discharged by the insolvency. It is sufficient for the purpose of that judgment to say that he was substantially discharged, because the only mode in which he could be reached after the insolvency was through the medium of the judgment given on that occasion. That appears to put the matter on an intelligible ground. There is no longer any set-off between the debt which the defaulting trustee or executor owes to the estate and the right which he has to the sum which he is entitled to receive by way of costs out of the estate, because the debt itself is discharged. It is unnecessary to go through some other decisions which there are to the same effect, but I will go at once to the case which was before Vice-Chancellor Malins of Bowyer v. Griffin (3). That was preceded by a decision of Turner v. Mollineux (10), decided by Sir W. Page Wood, and the grounds on which the decision proceeded are not stated; but Vice-Chancellor Malins, in the case of Bowyer v. Griffin (3), says that, "so far as the bill seeks to make him account for the trust fund which he has misapplied, that being a mere money demand which ought to have been made, not against him personally, but against the trustees of the composition deed, he is improperly made a party. So far as it seeks to execute the trusts and to change the trustees, he is a necessary party, but he is entitled to have his costs paid by those who have brought him and kept him before the Court. If the suit had been instituted before the bankruptcy, his costs incurred before the bankruptcy would have been set off against his debt to the estate, but his costs incurred after his bankruptcy by which he has divested himself of his estate must be paid." Upon the authority of that passage it is said that the ground on which the Vice-Chancellor proceeded was that his estate was divested by the composition deed or by the bankruptcy. I can hardly think, however, that this was the true ground on which the Vice-Chancellor proceeded. The case was one to which the old bankruptcy law applied, and there is some difficulty in maintaining that there would be any substantial ground for making a distinction between the costs prior to and those subsequent to the bankruptcy—because if the trustee's not having any estate is sufficient to excuse him in the one case, it seems to me it would be sufficient to excuse him in the other—that is to say, to excuse him from the effect of his own default. The case itself of Bowyer v. Griffin (3) is one which may be placed, and I think it ought to be placed, on the same footing as the principle enunciated in Samuels v. Jones (2). The exact point did not come before the present Master of the Rolls in Smith v. Dale (5). That was a case where there were two executors, and the default, if there was a default, was on the part of the executor who had become bankrupt, and was in respect of a debt which he himself owed to the testator's estate. It does not appear when the testator died, what time had elapsed, or whether there had been any unreasonable delay in getting in the debt. Those facts do not appear on the report, and, as the facts disclosed on the report shew, it was a debt which fell within the ordinary operation of the bankruptcy law, and therefore would be barred. Besides, if the debt had been one arising from a breach of trust as opposed to an ordinary debt, it seems to me that the learned counsel who argued the case would not have failed to insist upon the distinction. I say that because this case was decided in 1881, and although it is now said at the bar that the principle upon which I propose to proceed had not been thought of at that time, that is an error, because it had been clearly pointed out in Mr. Lewin's book on Trusts in the edition of 1875. In the edition which appeared in 1879 the same point is taken, and it is there stated, at p. 850, in this way, "The Court never gives costs to a 'defaulting trustee' while he continues in default, but the Court says when you have paid in the balance found due from you, then you shall have your costs. But a bankrupt ceases from the date of his bankruptcy to be a debtor of the trust estate, and is therefore entitled to costs from the date of the bankruptcy." That passage appears to me to state truly the principle; but then in a note Mr. Lewin refers to the present state of the bankruptcy law under the Act of 1869, suggesting that the practice with reference to the payment of an executor's costs is altered by reason of the change in the bankruptcy law.

Perhaps I ought to say that I have looked at Morgan and Davey on Costs, and also Stone, and they contain nothing which is material for me to mention in my judgment. In that state of things there come the two last decisions. First there is the decision in Lewis v. Trask (6). That was a case before Mr. Justice North in which he declined to order payment to an executor of any costs out of the estate until he had made good his default, and this is what he says: "With regard to the case of Bowyer v. Griffin (3), I shall only follow it to this extent—that a trustee may have his costs after he has paid into Court the sum in which he is in default; otherwise I do not think the case applies to the present, because there was no money due from the trustee to be paid into Court, whereas in the present case there is a sum due and an order for its payment into Court." He takes the same ground as that on which I have proceeded. Then Vice-Chancellor Hall, in a subsequent case of Clare v. Clare (7), appears to have made enquiries as to Lewis v. Trask (6), which had not then been reported; and he states (and this is worthy of observation, in consequence of a portion of the argument which has been addressed to me, namely, that the practice was settled) that the practice did not appear to him to be settled, and then he said he preferred to follow the decision of Bowyer v. Griffin (3), "as it seemed to him to be consistent with good sense to hold that any person who, though adjudicated bankrupt, was retained as a party to an action as executor or trustee should be paid his costs." I do not see how it can be said that a bankrupt executor is retained by the beneficiaries merely because he is not dismissed from the suit; but I have very little doubt that it would be the right course to allow a defaulting executor, notwithstanding his bankruptcy being subsequent to the commencement of the action, to have his costs paid out of the estate if the parties beneficially interested in that estate said, "We cannot get on without your assistance; you must remain before the Court, and we wish you to appear by solicitors and counsel." If there was any case of that sort made out, it appears to me that the executor would be entitled—seeing that he is the executor, and that it is impossible to divest himself of the character of executor—to his subsequent costs, on account of the services rendered by him to the Court, and that he would be entitled to those costs out of the assets of the estate; but I think the right principle is, that a defaulting executor or trustee cannot get any of his costs out of the estate, until he has made good his default. Where, however, the debt arising from the default is one that has been barred by the bankruptcy, he is entitled to be paid his costs subsequent to the bankruptcy. I therefore make an order similar to that in Lewis v. Trask (6)—that Mrs. Basham pay into Court the balance found due from her within two months, and also for payment to her of her costs out of the estate, such costs, however, not to be paid to her until she has paid her balance into Court.

Bell, Nott & Co. had certain subsequent business transactions with the intestate, which commenced before the close of the bankruptcy, on the terms of a letter from them, dated the 29th of November, 1879, which was as follows:—"We credit you one hundred and ninety-one pounds 10/9 margin on 200 bales American cotton, Novr./Decr. delivery, bought from Eskrigge, Pooley & Co. on 31st ult. to your account. Any profit realised on this or on any further purchases of cotton on your account, to be applied, half in reduction of balance due to us ℔ a/c to Dec. 31, 1876, and the other half to be paid to you, or retained as margin against more extended purchases if you prefer it."

At the death of the intestate there was due to him on account of the dealings under the letter of the 29th of November, 1879, from Bell, Nott & Co. the sum of 238*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.*, after allowing a deduction of 46*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.*, as half of the profits, to be in reduction of the balance proved by Bell, Nott & Co. in the bankruptcy. Bell, Nott & Co. now claimed to set the sum of 238*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* off against the balance of the sum proved in the bankruptcy. This was a summons in the administration action (Bell, Nott & Co. submitting to the jurisdiction) to determine whether they had such right. The summons asked for an order on Bell, Nott & Co. to pay the 238*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* into Court.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., and W. W. Cooper, for the plaintiff.—The bankruptcy is a complete bar to any enforcement of a debt proved by the individual creditor, except under the second part of section 54; such enforcement can only lie in the manner prescribed, and does not include set-off. The three years from the close of the bankruptcy had not expired at the death of the debtor, and no leave of the Court had been obtained—In re Pettit (1) and Ex parte Rhodes (2). Section 54 does not give any right against the estate of a deceased debtor—Ex parte Kelly (3).

The creditors, Messrs. Bell, Nott & Co., have entered into a new bargain, and it would be contrary to their stipulation, that out of the past transactions they should get more than the half of the profits then engaged for.

Byrne, for the trustee in bankruptcy, was willing that the money should be paid to the estate now being administered.

Yate Lee, for Bell, Nott & Co.—Nothing had taken away the right under the statute of set-off, and the remedy of the old creditors against after-acquired property of a bankrupt who does not obtain his discharge remains—Barton v. Tattersall (4), Ward v. Painter (5) and Rose v. Start (6).

[FRY, J., referred to Francis v. Dodsworth (7).]

The proper person to recover this sum, if it could be recovered from Bell, Nott & Co., would have been the trustee, before the order closing the bankruptcy. Now the proper person was the receiver of the Court of Bankruptcy.

Cooper Willis, in reply.—A bankrupt (and therefore his representative, if he be dead) may sue in respect of transactions since the adjudication, and the bankruptcy is no defence; but the trustee may, if he thinks fit, intervene, and take the benefit of the proceedings—Jameson v. The Brick and Tile Company (8) and Herbert v. Sayer (9).

FRY, J.—The respondents, Bell, Nott & Co., in the first place, claim the right of set-off against the amounts due to them in the bankruptcy. On that question Mr. Yate Lee, who argued for the respondents, relied on the statute of set-off. In answer to that it is suggested that the effect of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, is to deprive them of any such right of set-off. The 12th section of that Act provides "that where a debtor shall be adjudicated a bankrupt no creditor to whom the bankrupt is indebted in respect of any debt provable in the bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the property or person of the bankrupt in respect of such debt, except in manner provided by this Act." Now pausing there, a right of set-off is undoubtedly a remedy against the property of the bankrupt, and comes within the section. Then section 47 directs that, upon a report of the trustee, "the Court, if satisfied that the whole of the property of the bankrupt has been realised for the benefit of his creditors, or so much of it as can be realised without needlessly protracting the bankruptcy, shall make an order that the bankruptcy is closed."

Then section 54 provides what shall happen in the case of a person who has not obtained his discharge after the close of the bankruptcy. It provides, in the first place, that "no portion of a debt provable under the bankruptcy shall be enforced against the property of the person so made bankrupt until the expiration of three years from the close of the bankruptcy." If he pay certain sums during that time he will be entitled to his order of discharge. Then, in the alternative, the section provides, if he has not obtained an order of discharge, "any balance remaining unpaid in respect of any debt proved in such bankruptcy (but without interest in the meantime) shall be deemed to be a subsisting debt, in the nature of a judgment debt, and, subject to the right of any persons who have become creditors of the debtor since the close of his bankruptcy, may be enforced against any property of the debtor, with the sanction of the Court which adjudicated such debtor a bankrupt, or of the Court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy in the place where the property is situated, but to the extent only and in manner directed by such Court, and after giving such notice and doing such acts as may be prescribed in that behalf."

The whole scope of the Bankruptcy Act appears to me to be this—that the whole of the remedies of persons proving are confined to proceedings in the bankruptcy or under the Bankruptcy Courts. The property is to be realised before the Courts, and to be distributed pari passu. ending three years no creditor proving to enforce his debt, and if the bankrupt the end of that time has made the quired payment he will be entitled to s discharge; if not, the debts shall be forced, in one manner, and one manner ly, under the direction of the Bankruptcy ourt, and the money thus produced as to be distributed among all the creitors. It is evident that to allow one reditor to enforce payment of his debt by means of a set-off is to give such creditor a preference against all other creditors, and to the extent to which he succeeds to divert the property which would feed the fund which is divisible among all the creditors. Therefore, to allow such set-off would be acting against the 12th section and the scope of the Act. In that conclusion I am very much confirmed by the case of Francis v. Dodsworth (7), to which I have before referred. That was a case under the Act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. The marginal note states: "Although a discharge under the Insolvent Debtors Act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, does not operate as a complete extinguishment of a debt scheduled, the creditor is not entitled to plead such debt by way of set-off to an action brought against him by the insolvent for a demand accruing subsequently to his discharge."

The principle on which the Court proceeded was, mutatis mutandis, the same which I have already expressed. The Court found that the spirit and intention of the Act was to distribute any property for the benefit of all, and to prevent priority; and the Court held that though the words "set off" were not mentioned, yet it was inconsistent with the general spirit and intention of the Act to allow a set-off. I hold therefore that, under the circumstances of this case, there is no right of set-off.

Mr. Yate Lee has said that the money in question is due to the trustee, and is not therefore capable of being received by the executor. The rule I take to be is, that where a person is sued by a bankrupt, he cannot set up the bankruptcy as a ground of defence to the action unless the trustee thinks fit to intervene. Now, in the present case the trustee has appeared in Court, and has not interfered with the payment to the executor.

There is only one other point on which I think I ought to observe. Mr. Yate Lee has contended that section 39 of the Bankruptcy Act is imported into the administration by virtue of the 10th section of the Judicature Act, 1875. There is no evidence before me that the estate is insolvent. The only question is, whether I ought not to allow Mr. Yate Lee to bring that forward by an enquiry if he thinks he can succeed.

DONNELL v. BENNETT.

Jurisdiction — Injunction — Negative clause.

An injunction was granted to enforce a contract not to sell fish refuse to any manufacturer other than the plaintiff.

The plaintiff had set up at Great Grimsby a fish manure manufactory. The defendants were Messrs. Bennett, fish manure manufacturers, also of Great Grimsby, and Daniel Cormack, a fish-curer and fish-smoker of the same town.

The plaintiff in December, 1882, entered into a contract in writing with the defendant Daniel Cormack in the following terms:—

"The vendor agrees to sell, and the purchaser agrees to buy, all fish or parts of fish not used by the vendor in his business as a fish-curer and fish-smoker, at the price of twenty-three shillings per ton, for the space of two years, from the 31st day of December, 1882; and in consideration thereof, the vendor further agrees that he will not sell during the said space of two years any fish or parts of fish to any other manufacturer whatever; and the purchaser further agrees that he will take and pay for all fish or parts of fish which the vendor shall deliver to him at the said price of twenty-three shillings per ton delivered at the purchaser's works."

The defendants, Messrs. Bennett, had induced the defendant Cormack to break his contract with the plaintiff, and sell his fish refuse to themselves at an enhanced price. In consideration for his doing so, they paid him money and promised him indemnity.

The plaintiff claimed specific performance against Cormack; an injunction against all the defendants, to restrain Cormack from selling to Messrs. Bennett, and Messrs. Bennett from buying from Cormack, any fish refuse; and, in the third place, damages from all the defendants.

H. A. Giffard, Q.C., and Samuel Hall, for the plaintiff.—The rule in granting injunctions in such a case as this was that where there was a contract that from its nature could not be specifically enforced, the Court could not restrain the doing of acts incompatible with the performance of the contract, unless (as in this case) there was a substantive negative contract not to do such acts; but that if there were such negative contract the Court would enforce it by injunction—Lumley v. Wagner (1), De Mattos v. Gibson (2) and Dietrichsen v. Cabburn (3).

[FRY, J., referred to Fothergill v. Rowland (4) and The Wolverhampton and Walsall Railway Company v. The London and North Western Railway Company (5).]

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Williamson, for the defendants, distinguished this case from the decisions cited on the other side, on the ground that here the negative contract was coextensive with the positive contract. They cited, in addition to the cases referred to on the other side, Bett v. The East India Steamship Company (6) and Catt v. Tourle (7).

FRY, J., after stating the facts, said,—The question is, in my judgment, by no an easy one, because of the state of thorities. It appears to me that the ncy of recent decisions, especially g at Fothergill v. Rowland (4) and olverhampton and Walsall Railway ny v. The London and North Wes- Railway Company (5) is towards iew—that the Court ought to look at is the nature of the contract be- the parties, and if that contract, as le, is the subject of equitable juris- n, an injunction may be granted, er it contains a negative stipulation t. But if, on the other hand, the ct is only properly satisfied by es, then the Court ought not to in- by way of injunction. That, it s to me, is the course to which the is tending; and it appears to me hat is the proper line at which the ought to divide the cases. But that the question before me. The ques- s whether on the authorities that drawn. Now there are authorities our of the plaintiff's contention— chsen v. Cabburn (3) was one, in the Court interfered by injunction train breach of a negative contract, here the whole contract could not een specifically enforced. Still more case of Lumley v. Wagner (1) in his . There the Court enforced by tion a portion of a contract which not have been specifically enforced, ord St. Leonards discussed the ques- whether an injunction ought to be d in some cases in which specific mance cannot be granted, and he de- ned that question in the affirmative, e made these observations (8):— erever this Court has no proper juris- n to enforce specific performance, erates to bind men's consciences, r as they can be bound, to a true literal performance of their agree- , and it will not suffer them to depart their contracts at their pleasure, g the party with whom they have cted to the mere chance of any ges which a jury may give. The se of this jurisdiction has, I believe, a wholesome tendency towards the enance of that good faith which exists in this country to a much greater degree, perhaps, than in any other; and although the jurisdiction is not to be extended, yet a Judge would desert his duty who did not act up to what his predecessors have handed down as the rule for his guidance in the administration of an equity." It is plain, therefore, that Lord St. Leonards did not adopt the rule to which the more recent cases have been tending.

That is the way in which the direct authorities stand. They appear to me to shew that in cases of this description where there is a negative clause the Court has enforced it, without regarding whether specific performance can be granted of the whole. Then it is said by Mr. Hardy, that in all those cases the negative contract was a part, and a separate part, of a larger contract, and those cases do not apply to cases like the present, in which he suggests that the negative and positive branches of the contract are coextensive. On that argument two enquiries arise. In the first place, is it true that the negative is coextensive with the positive branch of the contract? In my judgment it is not. The affirmative contract is, that for two years he will supply all fish refuse at 23*s.* per ton. The negative contract is, that during two years he will not sell to any other manufacturer whatever. It leaves it open to him on the negative contract, that he will either not sell at all, or will sell to some person other than a manufacturer. The next enquiry is whether the authorities support any such distinction. It appears to me that they do not. In Lumley v. Wagner (1) the positive contract was that the defendant would sing at Her Majesty's Opera House for three months. The negative contract was that she would not use her talents at any other theatre during that time. It is quite true the contract contained certain stipulations as to how many nights she was required to sing a week; but it appears to me that the substance of the contract was that she should sing for three months entirely for the plaintiff, for she could not be singing always; while she was singing she was to sing at Her Majesty's Opera. It appears to me that in that case the two contracts were substantially coextensive. Further, it is to be borne in mind that Lord St.

(8) 1 De Gex, M. & G. at p. 619.

Leonards did not decide on any such distinction, and, as far as I am aware, there is no trace of it in the earlier authorities.

Then comes the case of Catt v. Tourle (7), in which Hills v. Croll (9) was much referred to. That is a case that contains a positive and negative contract. Lord Justice Giffard said expressly:—"With respect to Hills v. Croll (9), that case, as was said by Lord St. Leonards in his judgment in Lumley v. Wagner (1), was decided according to its particular circumstances. Unless it is to be taken as laying down that the Court is to refuse to act on a negative covenant wherever there is a correlative obligation which it cannot enforce, it does not apply; if it is taken as going that length, it is contrary to Lumley v. Wagner (1), and must be considered as overruled."

It appears to me, therefore, that the distinction urged on me does not receive any support from the earlier authorities. I have come to the conclusion that upon the authorities I ought to grant the injunction. I do so with reluctance, because I find a difficulty in finding any substantial distinction on principle, or to draw any rational difference between Fothergill v. Rowland (4) and this case. And I find it difficult to reconcile my decision with the observations of the present Lord Chancellor in The Wolverhampton and Walsall Railway Company v. The London and North Western Railway Company (5). But at the same time the Courts have laid down that, so far as there is a negative contract, it is to be enforced by injunction. That is what Lord St. Leonards said in the case of Lumley v. Wagner (1). It appears to me I must grant the injunction. Though I should be far from sorry if the Court of Appeal took a different view, I think I am bound by authority.

By a marriage settlement, dated the 10th of March, 1855, stock and securities of the value of over 20,000*l.* were vested in trustees upon trust for the wife and husband respectively for life, and after the death of the survivor, and subject to a power of appointment, which was never exercised, for the issue of the marriage who attained twenty-one. The one per cent. payable intestacy, on the succession of to the son's estate, is in respect ., the value on which probate ree per cent. has been paid. This I admit, within the wording 41; but the one per cent. on the value of the trust fund, respect of the son's succession er, is a subsisting liability which be provided for.

V.C.—The question before me is onstruction of the Customs and venue Act, 1881. The question rely to be determined by the I have paid great attention to ent of Mr. Vaughan Hawkins, e back to this, that I must deal with the subject under the statute. The general scope of all the statutes relative to this subject is this: The State says that before you may be entitled to any property by succession, or by legacy or otherwise, when your title to that arises, the State will take from you a certain percentage, and you shall only receive that which you are apparently entitled to after the deduction of that percentage which belongs to the State. The Succession Duty Act of 1853 provides that there shall be a duty of one per cent. payable under the present circumstances. The Act of 1881, having in contemplation the Act of 1853—providing for the case of probate and legacy duty, and so on—says, whenever you have exhibited your inventory, supported it by your affidavit, and the Legacy Office is satisfied with that, and you have paid the duty of three per cent., you shall be exempt from paying that duty which the Act of 1853 required you to pay. That is most eminently reasonable, and most fair and just, because these interests in succession are of such an infinite variety and form, that the persons in whom they are vested being exposed to all the accidents of life and death, and so on, may find it necessary, or their creditors may find it necessary, that their reversionary interest or their succession interest shall be made available for present purposes. Well, death is one of those events. A man who is entitled under a settlement to the settlement fund is prima facie chargeable with the one per cent. duty and no more. If it is necessary for his creditors, legatees, or anybody else who is interested in his property, to realise his property, and part of his property consists of his reversionary interest, that is subject, prima facie, to a duty of one per cent. But if the provisions of the Act of 1881 are complied with, and an inventory supported by affidavit is exhibited, and the whole of the property, including this succession, is placed before the Legacy Duty Office, then upon payment of three per cent., in the very terms of the statute, the payment of the one per cent. succession duty is abolished, it is no longer operative.

The words are open to no kind of doubt. [His Lordship read the 41st section, and continued:] Unless I am authorised to repeal that statute, I say that, in very plain terms, in this case, the succession duty which would have been payable under the settlement is by this Act exempted and released, and the personal representative who has paid the three per cent. is no longer liable to pay the one per cent. There will be a declaration that no further duty is payable in respect of the trust fund, subject to the trusts of the indenture of settlement, or in respect of the estate of the intestate. The costs of the petitioners and the trustees may be paid out of the 1,000*l.* debenture stock which is in Court, and the balance may be transferred to the petitioners.

HUGHES HALLETT v. THE INDIAN MAMOTH GOLD MINES COMPANY (LIMITED).

Trustee — Indemnity — Quia Timet — Company—Shares—Winding up.

A trustee of partly paid up shares in a company in liquidation is not entitled to a judgment for indemnity against his cestui que trust without evidence that a call will be made.

The plaintiff had taken 2,000 1*l.* shares in the Indian Mamoth Gold Mining Company, as trustee for one Cookesley. He paid 500*l.* (5*s.* a share) allotment money with cash supplied by Cookesley. No further money was called up on the shares. He had applied for the shares by writing, which he handed to Cookesley together with a transfer executed to Cookesley, and Cookesley promised to get the shares, when allotted, registered in his own name. He accordingly lodged the transfer with the company; but the directors, in exercise of a power given by the articles, refused to register the shares in Cookesley's name. The action was brought against the company, certain directors of the company, and Cookesley. The plaintiff alleged that he had been induced to take the shares by fraudulent misrepresentations contained in a prospectus. He claimed cancellation of the shares, indemnity from the directors and also from Cookesley his cestui que trust. Before the trial of the action an order was made to wind up the company compulsorily, and leave was refused to the plaintiff to proceed with the action against the company. The action was brought on for trial against the directors and Cookesley. The latter was out of the jurisdiction, and did not appear.

His Lordship dismissed the action on the evidence against the directors.

W. W. Karslake, Q.C., and Dobbs, for the plaintiff, asked against Cookesley judgment by default, for indemnity and costs.

[FRY, J.—It appears to me at present merely a quia timet action. The only case I am aware of in which such relief has been given, where actual damage has not been shewn, is Hayes v. Ranelagh (1), which has never been followed.]

Where a company is being wound up judgment for indemnity is given in respect of liability to pay calls not yet made Evans v. Wood (2) and Phené v. Gillas (3).

The plaintiff's case differs from that o an ordinary trustee, because the beneficiar not merely entered into an implied contrac to indemnify, but undertook at once to ge rid of the relationship of trustee an cestui que trust, and to relieve the truste from the possibility of loss. The plaintif therefore, has a right to specific perform ance of that contract.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Kirby, for th directors, were not called on.

FRY, J. (after giving judgment with cos in favour of the directors), said,—Th plaintiff's case against Captain Cookesl is this, that he is liable to indemnify hi in respect of the 15*s.* still payable on the shares; and, upon the evidence before m inly am of opinion that the plaintiff led to indemnity from Cookesley in of that 15*s*. But then arises this r consideration—namely, that no the 15*s*. has been called for, and r anything that appears in evidence me no part ever will be called for. er it will, or will not, of course I tell. It appears to me, therefore, is is a simple case of a person who ten property in his name, and who led to indemnity against some other suing for that indemnity before the ency which creates the damage has

It is, therefore, in my judgment, action quia timet. It is a very im- enquiry whether such actions quia an be maintained. If they can, it is that every person who has under- any position of responsibility for which entitles him to indemnity ie before the right to indemnity , may sue before the right to the has accrued which gives rise to lemnity. It appears to me that no such case. The case of Hayes dagh (1), so far as I am aware, is r authority that countenances that nd, as I have observed on a previous , as far as I am aware that case has en followed, nor any branch of that see, therefore, no authority binding which would induce me to pro- such a decree; and I must refrain enlarging the jurisdiction of the because it appears to me that it e a most injurious consequence to ny person in the position of the before he is injured to seek for ty. There are undoubtedly cases h where a contract for indemnity nd a right to sue upon that con- s arisen, the Court has declared a indemnity generally, and has put in such a train that where the nt right arises the indemnity may out. That class of authorities is n the last edition of Seton's Book ich shews that where a person has shares for another, and a call has ade which has not been met by the liable to pay it, the person entitled mnity is at liberty to ask for a declaration of his title generally, and possibly for liberty to apply to work it out.

In the next place, it has been contended that the plaintiff is entitled to some better contract of indemnity than that entered into by Captain Cookesley; but, in my judgment, that is not the law of the Court. If the plaintiff was minded to take the personal contract of Captain Cookesley for indemnity, he must be content with that, and I cannot possibly give him any better indemnity than that. If authority were necessary for that it appears to me that the case of Brough v. Oddy (5) is an authority.

But then it is said that this is not a mere action quia timet, because the plaintiff is coming for a breach of the contract to obtain the transfer of the shares. It appears to me that the true contract between the plaintiff and Captain Cookesley was that Cookesley should send in the transfer of shares, and that contract he had performed; but further than that, even if it were to obtain the transfer, that is not a contract which this Court would specifically perform, because it is admitted that the reason why the transfer has not been registered is the refusal of the directors to register it, a refusal with which I have no power of dealing in an action between the plaintiff and Captain Cookesley. It appears to me, therefore, that so far as this action is an action for a specific performance it is misconceived, because it is the right of the third person to prevent that specific performance; so far as it is an action for indemnity it is misconceived, because no liability has arisen which gives rise to that action. I am, therefore, somewhat unwillingly compelled to refuse the plaintiff any relief against Captain Cookesley.

VISCOUNT EXMOUTH v. PRAED.

Will—Construction—Defeasance—Uncertainty.

A condition attached to a gift by way of defeasance must be definite in ascertainment of its operation as well as in its terms.

A condition attached to a bequest of heirlooms to go with a title—that no person should acquire an absolute interest till twenty-one years after the death of all persons alive at the death of the testator who should attain the title,—Held void for the uncertainty of the mode in which it would operate.

In 1814 Admiral Sir Edward Pellew was made Baron, and in 1816 Viscount Exmouth: each title was limited to the heirs male of the body of the patentee.

Pownall Bastard, second Viscount Exmouth, died in December, 1833, having made a will, dated April of the same year, by which he bequeathed a piece of plate which was given to the testator's late father Viscount Exmouth by the admiral and the captains of the squadron, and a number of other chattels of the kind usually held as heirlooms, "upon trust to permit and suffer the same to go and be held and enjoyed with the title and honours of Exmouth, so far as the rules of law and equity will admit, by the person who for the time being shall be actually possessed of the said title, in the nature of heirlooms, and so that no person in existence at the time of my decease, or born in due time afterwards, and afterwards coming to the said title, shall have any other than a life interest in the same, and so that no person shall acquire an absolute interest in the same till the expiration of twenty-one years after the decease of all such persons as shall be in existence at the time of my decease and afterwards attaining the said title."

The testator's son Edward, third Viscount, succeeded him, and died in February, 1876, without issue, and was succeeded by the plaintiff in this action, his nephew, and a grandson of the testator, then an infant. The action was brought to administer the trusts of the heirlooms. The defendants were the trustees, and the plaintiff's only brother, who was under twenty-one. The next heir to the title after the plaintiff's brother was Henry Edward Pellew, a nephew of the testator, who was born in the testator's lifetime. There were also living other male descendants of the first viscount who were alive at the time of the testator's death.

Everitt, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the plaintiff, argued that the second condition was either void for uncertainty, or it meant that a person who was not alive at the death of the testator and took the title would acquire an absolute interest in twenty-one years from the death of the last holder who was living at the testator's death—that was to say, if the second interpretation were the true one, the chattels would cease to be tied up in the events that had happened in February, 1897—Tollemache v. Coventry (1), Pinbury v. Elkin (2) and Shelley v. Shelley (3).

[FRY, J., said he could not determine future rights; his doubt was whether the second condition was not void for uncertainty.]

Cookson, Q.C., and Coltman, for William A. W. Pellew, said there was no uncertainty about the language of the trusts; the second condition meant that no person took an absolute indefeasible interest till it was ascertained that all persons living at the death of the testator capable of inheriting were dead, and twenty-one years had expired from the death of the last of such persons who happened to take—that was to say, the interest of the plaintiff and others who might take was subject to be defeated by the happening of several contingencies. There was no uncertainty of meaning, and the contingencies must happen within the period allowed by the rule against perpetuities; therefore the clause of defeasance would hold, and the interest of the plaintiff was liable to be defeated.

Everitt, Q.C., in reply, referred to In re Catt's Trusts (4).

FRY, J. (after reading the clause in the will above set out), said,—The passage I have just read divides itself into three clauses, which require separate attention. The first is the trust to permit and suffer the property to go and be held and enjoyed with the title and honours of Exmouth, so far as the rules of law and equity will admit, by the person for the time being actually possessed of the said title, in the nature of heirlooms. There is, in my judgment, no doubt that the effect of that clause standing alone would be to give an absolute interest in the chattel property to the first person who succeeded to the honours, and that therefore, if it had stood alone, the third viscount would have become absolutely possessed of this chattel property. That, I think, follows from the case which Mr. Everitt referred me to (3). Then the second clause is in these terms, "so that no person in existence at the time of my decease, or born in due time afterwards, and afterwards coming into the title, shall have any other than a life interest in the same." That clearly reduces the absolute interest that would have been taken by a person in existence at the time of the testator's decease to a life interest, and accordingly the third viscount took not an absolute but a life interest in the chattels in question. The third clause says, "that no person shall acquire an absolute interest in the same till the expiration of twenty-one years after the decease of all such persons as shall be in existence at the time of my decease and afterwards attaining the said title," which may, I think, be paraphrased in this way, "so that no person shall acquire an absolute interest till the expiration of twenty-one years from the decease of all such persons as shall be in existence at the time of my decease, and shall at any time after my decease attain the said title." It appears to me that the last words of the clause are indefinite as to time. If that clause be good, it appears to me to be plain that the present viscount has not attained an absolute interest, and cannot demand the delivery of the chattels from the trustees, because it is plain that the twenty-one years from the death of the third viscount, who died in 1876, have not expired, and consequently there is at least one person living at the death of the second viscount who has not died twenty-one years ago.

But the question arises whether that clause is or is not good; and, in my judgment, the clause is invalid and inoperative. I must, in the first place, enquire what is the nature of that clause. It appears to me to be a contingent limitation by way of trust in the nature of clauses for postponement and defeasance. It postpones the vesting of an absolute interest in the person who may afterwards take the absolute interest, supposing he survives the twenty-one years, and who, but for the clause, would have taken the absolute interest at the moment of his coming into possession. So that to apply it to the circumstances which happened, the present viscount, supposing the clause is good, would but for that clause have taken an absolute interest on his coming into the title, but would not take an absolute interest till the expiration of the twenty-one years, at any rate, from the death of his predecessor. In the next place, it is a clause of defeasance, because supposing the person who would have taken absolutely on acquiring the title does not survive the period of twenty-one years, the absolute interest will never vest in him; and therefore, to take the instance of the present actual possession of the title, if the present viscount should not survive the twenty-one years from the death of the late viscount, it is plain his absolute interest would be defeated. Such contingent limitations in the nature ot defeasances are, in my view, subject to all the rules applicable to conditions subsequent. One of those rules I take to be that the conditions must be clear and certain. That requisite certainty I hold to include not only certainty of expression in the creation of the limitation, but also certainty in point of operation. It must be such a limitation that at any given moment of time it is ascertainable whether the limitation has or has not taken effect. But of this contingent limitation it cannot always be ascertained whether it has or has not taken effect. Let me go back upon those propositions, which, if they are correct, determine the case, to illustrate them a little more clearly. In the first place, is such a limitation as this subject to the rules applicable to conditions subsequent? I will in the first place refer to one passage in the judgment of Lord St. Leonards in the well known case of Egerton v. Earl Brownlow (5). In addressing the House of Lords his Lordship said, "I know by the authorities which have been referred to that conditions which were intended to defeat an estate have defeated an estate in contingency just as much as a vested estate; that they are odious, as it is said in law, and, as it is also said by equally high authorities, the Institutes and Sheppard's Touchstone, that they must be submitted to a strict construction—that is, you are not to give a favourable construction to a proviso the object of which is to defeat an estate already created, but that if that estate is to be defeated it must be so by clear and express terms within the limits of the instrument creating it." In the case of Clavering v. Ellison (6), originally before Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, the question arose upon limitations no doubt somewhat different to the present. The nature of those limitations he expressed in these words (6): "The estates and interests are by the previous part of the will clearly and distinctly given to the children as they come into esse by way of vested remainder, and the proviso is intended to defeat those estates and to accelerate the subsequent limitations." And then having referred to the expression used in the old cases that such conditions are odious to the law, he says that it appears to him to be a clear rule that the contingency on which such a limitation is to take effect should be something definite and certain, and that the contingency should be so expressed as not to leave in any degree doubtful or uncertain what the contingency is which is intended to defeat the prior estate. No doubt there the want of certainty was rather in the expression than in the ascertainment of its operation. It is quite plain, certainty in one is as essential as certainty in the other. That went before the Court of Appeal, and the decision of the Vice-Chancellor was affirmed by the Lords Justices. It went to the House of Lords, and the decision of the Lords Justices was affirmed by the House; and in addressing the House of Lords in that case, Lord Cranworth used this language (7): "I consider that from the earliest times one of the cardinal rules on the subject has been this—that where a vested estate is to be defeated by a condition on a contingency that is to happen afterwards, that condition must be such that the Court can see from the beginning precisely and distinctly upon the happening of what event it was that the preceding vested estate was to determine."

In the next place, let me enquire whether in the present instance it is ascertainable at any given time whether the contingency has or not happened. Nothing can illustrate better the difficulty in the way of this proviso than the actual circumstances of the case. When the third viscount died there were living persons, one of whom at least is still living, who were in the entail, some of them before and some of them after the present viscount—that is to say, their estates would take effect if at all some before and some after the present year. It follows, therefore, that you cannot tell whether all the persons named from the death of the last of whom the twenty-one years is to commence have or have not expired at a given time. Supposing, for instance, the present viscount lives to the year 1897, which will be twenty-one years from 1876, when the third viscount died, and supposing Henry Edward Pellew be then living, to whom will the chattels belong? No human being could answer the question whether Henry Edward Pellew would be one of the persons who was living at the death of the testator and afterwards attained the title—nobody can tell. It was known that he was living at the death of the testator, but whether he will live to attain the title is not within human knowledge. In 1897, therefore, it is possible that the period of twenty-one years has expired. It is equally possible that it has never begun to run. Now supposing that the present viscount having lived to 1897 died immediately afterwards, to whom would the chattels belong? Would they belong to his legal personal representative? They would if the period had expired. Would they belong to his successor in the title? They would if the period had not expired. Therefore, from the period of the expiration of the twenty-one years and the death of the first of the class of persons indicated by the will down to the expiration of the twenty-one years and the death of the last of the possible persons who may attain the title, the whole question of the possession of these chattels would be in uncertainty. In my judgment, that is such an uncertainty in this condition of defeasance as prevents it being clear and certain, and renders it inoperative.

I hold, therefore, that the third clause in the passage I have read from the second viscount's will being inoperative, the present plaintiff is now absolutely entitled to the chattels.

POLLOCK, B., for PEARSON, J. 1883. Feb. 2, 3.

STRICKLAND v. SYMONS.

Trustee—Carrying on Business—Advances—Right of Creditor against Trust Estate.

By a deed, made on the marriage of Dr. S., a lunatic asylum was assigned to trustees on trust, at the request of Dr. S. and his wife, during their joint lives, to sell and to stand possessed of the proceeds of sale upon certain trusts (declared by a deed of settlement of even date) for the benefit of Dr. S., his wife and children. By this settlement it was declared that Dr. S. might carry on the business of the asylum for his own benefit without paying any rent.

In 1875 Dr. S. filed a liquidation petition; and thereupon the surviving trustee of the settlement carried on the business until, in April, 1876, the asylum was sold for a large sum of money. During this period the plaintiff, a tradesman, supplied the trustee with goods necessary for carrying on the asylum. Afterwards he recovered judgment against the trustee for the price of the goods; and now brought this action, claiming payment of his judgment debt out of the proceeds of sale:—

Held, that as, upon the true construction of the deed and settlement of even date, the assets of the business between the date of the liquidation petition and the sale were part of the property of Dr. S., the trustee would have had no right to recover moneys advanced by him for the purpose of carrying on the asylum; and that, consequently, the plaintiff had no right to stand in his place against the trust estate.

Action with witnesses.

By an indenture of assignment, dated the 2nd of April, 1867, and made between Dr. James T. Sabben of the first part, Mary F. Sabben (then Mary F. Birkett, widow) of the second part, and Henry Samuel Symons and Henry Edward Symons of the third part, certain leasehold hereditaments at Stoke Newington, called Northumberland House (the property of Mrs. Sabben), were assigned to Henry S. Symons and Henry E. Symons, to stand possessed thereof (after the solemnization of the marriage then intended between Mr. and Mrs. Sabben) upon trust, at the request in writing of Dr. James T. Sabben and Mary F. Sabben, during their joint lives . . . . to sell the trust premises, and also the business of a lunatic asylum carried on there, and the goodwill thereof, and as to the goodwill, either together with the leasehold premises or separately, and to stand possessed of the proceeds of sale, upon the trusts declared by an indenture of even date, and intended to be made between the same persons.

By the indenture of settlement of even date it was declared that the trustees should, with the consent in writing of Dr. James T. Sabben and Mary F. Sabben, during their joint lives . . . . invest the moneys to arise by the sale of the leasehold premises and goodwill, as therein mentioned, and should stand possessed of the moneys so invested on certain trusts for the benefit of Mrs. Sabben, Dr. Sabben and their children. And it was further declared that until the leasehold premises should be sold, as aforesaid, it should be lawful for Dr. Sabben to carry on the business of an asylum upon the premises, for his own benefit, without paying any rent for the same other than the rents payable under the leases thereof, but paying such sums of money as were by him thereinafter covenanted to be paid. And Dr. Sabben thereby covenanted to pay the premium on a certain policy of insurance, and to pay to the trustees the sum of 10,000*l.* by instalments (the first instalment of 2,000*l.* to be paid on the 6th of February, 1880) for the benefit of the four children of Mrs. Sabben, by her former husband, as therein mentioned.

Dr. Sabben carried on the business of the asylum for his own benefit until the 7th of July, 1875, when he filed a petition for liquidation, under which the defendant Sydney Smith was appointed trustee. He, shortly after the institution of the action, disclaimed all interest therein.

In July, 1875, the defendant Henry E. Symons, the brother of Mrs. Sabben, and a medical man, entered upon the management of the asylum, with a view (as alleged by the statement of claim) to the preservation of the business, and to a sale thereof as a going concern, und of the deed of assignment. H the business until April, 187 asylum and the goodwill of were sold for 18,500*l.*

ggins, Q.C., in reply.

LLOCK, B.—I certainly should have d before I delivered my judgment in ase, if I did not feel that in so de- g I have had the fullest benefit of all rguments which could be addressed e plaintiff and for the defendants, and without also, I may say, thinking that in the conclusion at which I have arrived I do not disturb anything that can be called a settled principle upon which the Courts have acted, or any decided case by which of course I should feel myself bound.

The plaintiff in this case, Mr. Strickland, is a person whose position is to be pitied. He, an honest trader at Gravesend, gave credit to a large amount—first, as it appears, to Dr. Sabben, the proprietor of a lunatic asylum; and secondly, to Dr. Symons, who was ostensibly carrying on that same lunatic asylum. With any claim he might have against Dr. Sabben we have nothing to do on the present occasion. With regard to his claim against Dr. Symons, he has stated in the statement of claim, and has proved, the supply of goods, all of which were fit, proper and necessary for carrying on the lunatic asylum. He obtained a judgment in the Common Pleas for the amount of his debt, and in the present action he asks to be put, with regard to that claim, in the same position as his debtor is, who, being a trustee, may or may not have a remedy over against the cestuis que trust, whose estate he has to deal with. Then comes the question, Has he any such remedy? I certainly should not consider that it was any argument against Mr. Strickland in his peculiar position to say that his right was somewhat novel if it was well founded in principle; but I have to ask myself the question whether it is well founded in principle. I think that no difficulty arises with regard to what has been the principle by which similar cases have been governed. That principle is very well stated in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in In re Johnson (1). He cites Ex parte Garland (4), a well-known decision of Lord Eldon's, and he also cites Ex parte Edmonds (5), in which Lord Justice Turner says, "They (the cases) proceed upon the principle that the executor or trustee directed to carry on the business having a right to resort for his indemnity to the assets directed to be employed in carrying it on, the creditors of the trade are entitled to the benefit of that right, and thus become creditors of the fund to which the executor or trustee has a right to resort." I need only here remark that that doctrine has, if one may say so, of course been kept within reasonable limits. Then the Master of the Rolls states what was said by Vice-Chancellor Bacon in Owen v. Delamere (6): "The Court will give effect to the trust which has been created by the testator, and will keep separate and applicable only to purposes of the trust that estate which the testator designated and directed to be employed for that purpose."

We have no need to trouble ourselves here with that salutary doctrine whereby the creditor is allowed to stand in the shoes of the trustee of the debtor; but we must certainly bear in mind that other principle, that the creditor is not to be put in any better position than the trustee himself—that is to say, the creditor should have no lien upon the fund or claim to be paid out of the fund in respect of which the trustee himself would not be entitled to any lien or claim.

Then comes the question in this particular case: is the trustee Dr. Symons entitled to say in this Court or elsewhere that he as trustee was entitled to make payments for the purpose of keeping this lunatic asylum as a going concern, and therefore getting a larger price when it came to be sold? We may pass over all the general rules which are applicable not merely to trustees but to executors, and to all other persons upon whom is cast the custody of particular property, and who of course must have some reasonable power beyond the mere retention of the property as it passes through their hands. I take that view to be expressed generally in this way—wherever even an executor finds himself in possession of property which cannot be treated as so much specie, in respect of which nothing can be done to improve it or to keep it going, but finds himself in possession of a business, such as an ordinary shop, or factory, or anything else which requires essentially something to be done for it, there he must do that something. Whatever it may be. A ship is a very good illustration of this principle. What would be said of a man who was executor of a shipowner, either part owner or whole owner, if he immediately sold the spot without allowing a voyage to be completed, or so ture upon the ship to take pla to put her in a position to ca Those contingencies are dealt v cases cited before me, and it is to dwell upon them any longer. appears to me, the guiding ob be made in this case is, that thi case of a trustee who is appoint emergency, or upon whom so trustee has been imposed from t of the case. his wife made no request, and although for certain purposes, now that the property has been actually sold, the fact of the request has been recited in the conveyance, because no good title could be made without it, yet at the very date of all these events which we have been considering no notice whatever had been given, nor was any notice given or assumed to have been given until the date of the conveyance to the purchaser. That being so, it seems to me that from the 7th of July, 1875, which was the date of the petition for liquidation by Dr. Sabben, until the assignment, that business and the assets of that business were governed by the settlement, and were part of the property and assets of Dr. Sabben. This makes it unnecessary for me to enquire with any great nicety with regard to what was the position of Dr. Symons the trustee; but I may observe this, that after the 7th of July no doubt Dr. Symons came upon the premises, and did what was right and what was proper in endeavouring to keep up the business for the benefit of his sister and her children. Whether he remained in possession and carried on the business as an intending purchaser so that credit was given to him as an intending purchaser, or whether he carried on the business under the mistaken idea as to his duty as trustee, it is unnecessary now for me to enquire. The answer to all these questions now is, that they do not arise within the purview of this settlement. It seems to me, therefore, that with regard to the money which has been expended by him, and in particular as to this credit that was given to him by Mr. Strickland, it is immaterial to go into or follow it further, when I have pointed out that he had no right to place himself in that position, or to seek to bind the estate by so doing. If he had no right, of course it follows that Mr. Strickland has no right to stand in his place against the cestuis que trust.

There is one matter which I should mention before I leave this case, and that is the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Hall. I do not know that I should think it necessary to do so, except that I should be very sorry to have it imagined for one moment that upon the information now before me I took any step which could be supposed to shew that I entertained any opinion which was contrary to the view expressed by so eminent and so painstaking a Judge as Vice-Chancellor Hall, or that I was taking any course which would seem to be contrary to the course which he took. In truth, I do not think it is so, for this reason. During this hiatus which occurred between the 7th of July and the actual sale of the lunatic asylum, not only was credit given for those goods supplied by Mr. Strickland, but money was advanced by Mr. Ramsay. Mr. Ramsay, it appears, had advanced sums amounting to very nearly 2,000*l.* That sum of course was in peril. Dr. Symons himself also had made some similar payments, which were also in peril, and in respect of which he was entitled to protect himself if he could. The most convenient course for doing that was supposed to be by an action being commenced by Dr. Symons against Mr. Ramsay, in which the Court would declare the rights of the parties, and in that action they asked for an account. It was stated in the statement of claim, and truly, that Mr. Ramsay had advanced the sums, and it was stated that they had been employed for the benefit of the lunatic asylum. It was also stated that by means of these advances considerable payments had been received from the patients, and the decree of the Court was that an account should be taken with respect to all those matters; and the result of it was this, that if after that account was taken there was any fund in Court which was produced by the payments by the patients, then those who had advanced these large sums of money should be decreed to be entitled to that fund. That seems to me to be a very different thing from deciding what I am now called upon to decide.

I do not think it is necessary for me to enter any further upon any question of the other branch of Mr. Higgins' argument, which was that this was one of those matters in which the matter should be treated as what he called, by way of illustration, a sort of salvage claim, and that the plaintiff in this case might be entitled to say, "If I am not entitled under the rule of standing in the shoes of the trustee, I am entitled as the person who has kept this thing going; and thereby a larger sum having been produced from the sale, I am entitled to be paid out of it." It is enough to say I think that there is no such general doctrine of that kind which can apply, when a settlor of property has made specific arrangements, and the trusts have been carefully prepared, and a settlement and a deed have been drawn, so that the Court must be bound according to the intention of the parties as expressed in the settlement and deed. It seems to me that I could not decide this case in favour of the plaintiff without breaking the trusts and the intention of that settlement, and therefore my judgment must be for the defendants.

FRY, J. (without calling on the respondents).—It appears to me that I have no jurisdiction to entertain this summons.

The short position of facts which it is necessary to bear in mind is this—that Messrs. Kelk & Lucas and the London Financial Company have been respectively admitted creditors for between 2,000*l.* and 3,000*l.* each, and that other creditors have been admitted to the extent of between 20,000*l.* and 30,000*l.*; that an order has been made against certain late directors of the company requiring them to pay to the official liquidators certain sums of money in respect of the breaches of trust.

Therefore Messrs. Kelk & Lucas, to take them alone for the moment (and the London Financial Company are in a similar position)—Messrs Kelk & Lucas are creditors of the company. The directors are tort-feasors, who are liable to pay a sum of money to the company. The directors say that they have certain equities against Messrs. Kelk & Lucas, which will result in giving them a right to all the dividend which Messrs. Kelk & Lucas may receive on the aggregate amount of their proof to such an extent as will make good the sums which the directors have been ordered to pay. That is the nature of their claim, and the object of the present summons is to work out that right by impounding those dividends. I say that that is the nature of the summons, because although the summons is of a very complicated character, it has been stated by Mr. Cozens-Hardy emphatically that that is the substance of the summons, and that all the rest is machinery. In saying so I have no doubt that he has spoken with his usual exactitude.

Now I do not find that I have any authority to make such an order to work out such an equity between the tort-feasor to the company and the creditors of the company. It was suggested in the first place that the 109th section of the Act gave me jurisdiction. That requires that the Court shall adjust the rights of the contributories amongst themselves and distribute any surplus that may remain amongst the parties entitled thereto. It may be true, and I believe it is true, that Messrs. Kelk & Lucas and the directors are all contributories to the company; but the rights which the directors now desire to enforce against Messrs. Kelk & Lucas amount thereof coming to persons other than the said London Financial Association, Limited, and Messrs. Kelk & Lucas bears to the total amount thereof; and that the amount for which the said order is so enforced may be applied only in payment of such persons other than the said London Financial Association, Limited, and Messrs. Kelk & Lucas, and that as respects any sums which the London Financial Association, Limited, and Messrs. Kelk & Lucas may be held liable to pay or repay as aforesaid, the official liquidator may be ordered to impound and retain all dividends payable to those parties respectively on any debts paid by them against the company, and to apply the moneys so retained in satisfaction of the said sums; and that, if necessary, the applicants may be at liberty to use the name of the official liquidator for the purpose of enforcing the liability of the said London Financial Association, Limited, and Messrs. Kelk & Lucas in the premises, or otherwise, in respect of the dividends paid on the said preference shares. And that the London Financial Association, Limited, and Messrs. Kelk & Lucas, or one of them, may be ordered to pay the costs of and incidental to this application, or that such further or other order may be made in the premises as the Court shall deem fit.

have nothing whatever to do with their position as directors of the company.

As to dividing the surplus amongst the parties entitled thereto, there is no surplus or probability of a surplus to distribute, therefore I am afraid that jurisdiction cannot be invoked in the present instance.

I have enquired whether any other section of the Act requires me to adjust the equities between the creditors of the company and the tort-feasors to the company, and no such section has been called to my attention. I have enquired whether any authority can be produced for working out such an equity in a winding-up, and it has been admitted that no such authority can be produced.

It is said, however, that I ought to follow the authority of Raby v. Ridehalgh (3), and that on that ground I ought to give effect to the present claim. It appears to me that that authority does not at all bear on the present question, and that in winding up a company I can only exercise the statutory jurisdiction which is given to me; nor can I forget that to allow equities of this sort to be worked out in proceedings in a winding-up would, as it appears to me, be highly inconvenient; because in many cases it would arrest the final conclusion of the winding-up while the disputes of a thoroughly collateral character were being discussed between the parties.

I think, therefore, as regards the general object of this summons, it is beyond my jurisdiction; and it is desirable that I should express this opinion at this early stage in order that if I am wrong I can then go into the merits, when the Court of Appeal has determined that I have jurisdiction.

Now it has been pressed upon me that some portions of the summons at any rate ought to be allowed—namely, in the first place, that which relates to the expunging of the debt. But the expunging of the debt is only a step towards acquiring these dividends on the aggregate proof, and I do not think I ought to grant a portion of the summons when it is admitted that it is only a step towards a larger relief.

Then I have been urged to allow the applicants to use the name of the official liquidator to recover from Messrs. Kelk & Lucas certain dividends received on certain preference shares. It seems to me that if those dividends can be recovered from Messrs. Kelk & Lucas, they ought to belong to the liquidator as liquidator, and be distributed by him amongst the creditors at any rate who are not implicated in these matters, and there is no reason why I should give away money which belongs to the company, or to the liquidators on behalf of the company, to these applicants, the directors, who certainly have not shewn any great merits in the present application. If it had been shewn that the official liquidator had refused to take any proceeding which he could have properly taken to recover that sum, the matter might have stood in a different position. But no such evidence was given.

The result is, that it appears to me not only do some parts of the summons confessedly go beyond my jurisdiction, but that the whole summons, as regards its substance, does go beyond the jurisdiction. Therefore I dismiss it with costs.

Petitioning Creditor's Debt—Order directing Enquiry as to Moneys received—Act of Bankruptcy—"Being a Trader"—Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), s. 6. sub-s. 3.

An order, dated the 27th of June, was made in the bankruptcy of A., declaring a settlement void against G., his trustee in bankruptcy, and directing enquiries as to the moneys received by the trustees under the settlement, and payment thereof to G. The debtor was one of the trustees of the settlement, and when examined in the bankruptcy of A. had admitted the receipt of funds under the settlement; but no enquiry had been made under the order of the 27th of June. G. presented a petition in bankruptcy against the debtor:—Held, that till the amount which the debtor had received was ascertained by enquiry, and default made in payment on a day named, there was no sufficient petitioning creditor's debt.

The debtor, an auctioneer and valuer, by deed assigned his business, goodwill and premises to a purchaser, and covenanted not to carry on business within certain limits, and afterwards on the same day departed from his dwelling-house:—Held, that on the execution of the deed of assignment, the debtor had ceased to be a trader.

This was an appeal against an order of adjudication made against G. K. M. Reynolds by the Registrar of the Wiltshire County Court.

G. K. M. Reynolds was one of the trustees of a post-nuptial settlement, dated the 4th of December, 1880, made by his brother Ledru Reynolds, whereby Ledru Reynolds assigned a leasehold house and certain furniture to the trustees, and covenanted to pay them 10,000*l.*, to be held upon the trusts therein stated. In September, 1881, Ledru Reynolds was adjudicated bankrupt, and W. L. Grimwade was appointed his trustee. In May and June, 1882, G. K. M. Reynolds was examined in the bankruptcy of Ledru Reynolds under section 96, and admitted having received 450*l.* as the proceeds of sale of the furniture comprised in the settlement, and various sums amounting to over 1,000*l.* in respect of the covenant to settle the 10,000*l.* By an order, dated the 27th of June, 1882, the settlement of the 4th of December, 1880, was declared void as against Grimwade, the trustee in the bankruptcy of Ledru Reynolds, and the trustees of the settlement were ordered within fourteen days to deliver up to the trustee the property comprised in the schedule thereto, or to pay the value thereof to the trustee, and an enquiry was directed to ascertain such value, if necessary; and also a further enquiry, if necessary, to ascertain what portion of the sum of 10,000*l.* covenanted to be settled had been paid to or received by the trustees of the settlement, and it was ordered that they should pay over to Grimwade all such sums as should, upon making such enquiry, be ascertained to have been paid to or received by them. No enquiries had been made under this order.

G. K. M. Reynolds carried on business as an auctioneer and valuer at The Repository, Andover, in the county of Hants. It appeared that some time in the month of September he agreed to sell his business premises, goodwill and debts to James Woolford for 1,500*l.*, of which 100*l.* was to be paid as a deposit, 200*l.* within twelve months, and the remainder by instalments of 100*l.* a year. The exact date of this agreement was not in evidence, but the deposit of 100*l.* was paid on the 29th of September. On the 4th of October following a deed was executed by G. K. M. Reynolds, whereby he assigned to James Woolford his business premises, goodwill and debts, and covenanted not to carry on business within certain limits. A circular letter dated the same day was issued announcing that the business had changed hands. On the same day, but it did not appear how soon after the execution of the deed, G. K. M. Reynolds left his house and went abroad.

On the 13th of October Grimwade presented a petition in bankruptcy against G. K. M. Reynolds, alleging as the petitioning creditor's debt the sum of 450*l.* received by G. K. M. Reynolds for the furniture comprised in his brother's settlement, and various sums received in respect of the 10,000*l.*, amounting in all to 1,600*l.*, and alleging as the act of bankruptcy that the debtor being a trader had departed from his dwelling-house or otherwise absented himself with intent to defeat or delay his creditors; and on the 14th of October a summary adjudication was made against G. K. M. Reynolds as a trader, the petition having been served under rule 65 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1870.

According to the evidence of Ford, who had been clerk to G. K. M. Reynolds and was now clerk to James Woolford, G. K. M. Reynolds had paid his creditors before leaving Andover, and at the first meeting of creditors held in the bankruptcy only three creditors for sums of 3*l.*, 2*l.* and 1*l.* attended besides Grimwade the petitioning creditor.

Winslow, Q.C., and A. A. Terrell, for the appellant.—The adjudication was wrong on two grounds. First, there was no sufficient petitioning creditor's debt, since the order of the 27th of June only directs an enquiry as to the value of the furniture or the amount of money paid under the covenant. This is not a liquidated sum. No day is fixed for payment. Before that order could be made available as the foundation for a petition, there would have to be an enquiry and an order for payment within a stated time of the amount found due. Secondly, there was no act of bankruptcy, since by the assignment of his business on the 4th of October the debtor had ceased to be a trader before he left his house. The debtor must be actually a trader at the time when he is alleged to have committed the act of bankruptcy—Ex parte M'George; in re Stevens (1) and Ex parte Schomberg (2).

E. C. Willis, Q.C., and F. C. Willis, for the trustee.—On the first point, there was a sufficient petitioning creditor's debt. When examined in Ledru Reynolds' bankruptcy, the debtor admitted having received 450*l.* for the furniture, and the other sums. An order would be made in the Chancery Division for payment of money into Court on a similar admission—Fox v. Mackreth (3).

[BACON, C.J.—The examinations of the debtor are not referred to in the order of the 27th of June.]

Secondly, there was an act of bankruptcy, since the debtor had not ceased to be a trader when he left his house. He was ostensibly carrying on the business when he left. The act of trading cannot be determined by a secret and momentary act like the signing of a conveyance. The circulars announcing the assignment of the business were not made public till three days after the debtor absconded.

No reply was called for.

BACON, C.J.—When a man is made bankrupt against his will it must be according to law. The appellant complains that an adjudication in bankruptcy was made against him on insufficient grounds. The matter has been argued before me at great length to-day and on a former day on two grounds—first, whether the petitioning creditor's debt was sufficient to support the adjudication; and secondly, as to the alleged act of bankruptcy. In my opinion there is no foundation for the petition on the second ground, which proceeds upon the provision of the Act of Parliament that the debtor being a trader had committed an act of bankruptcy.

As to the alleged debt there is no foundation for saying that this is a liquidated sum due at law or in equity. The order upon which the petitioning creditor's debt is based was an order declaring that Reynolds should deliver up certain property set forth in the first and second parts of the schedule to the settlement. That is no debt; then it proceeds, "or that he shall pay the value thereof to the trustee;" and for the purpose, if necessary, of ascertaining the value of the furniture, as well as the amount of the sums received under the settlement, an enquiry is directed to ascertain such value or such amount. That order only directed enquiries, and there has been no enquiry made. In order to get rid of that Mr. Willis urged upon me examinations, which are not before me in evidence, as evidence of the ascertained sum referred to in the order. Upon some of these examinations the bankrupt admitted that he had received a sum of 450*l.* in respect of the furniture, and upon that, Mr. Willis, referring to the alleged practice of the Court of Chancery, contended that that was an admission that he had received that sum, and therefore constituted a petitioning creditor's debt upon which a petition in bankruptcy could be founded. That is not so. Giving to the order of the 27th of June its full effect, Mr. Willis, if he desires it, can apply to the Court, and he may get an order from the Court declaring the value of the furniture upon evidence satisfying the Court of what is the value; and, what is still more important, he must get a day on which payment is to be made fixed. If no day be fixed for payment there can be no default in respect of which a petitioning creditor's debt can be suggested. It may be that the trustee of the settlement is entitled to his costs, charges and expenses, and till an account has been taken it is impossible to tell what may be due. I am of opinion, therefore, that there was no sufficient petitioning creditor's debt.

That being so, this would be enough to dispose of this case, because no debt can exist till there has been an order for payment of the debt. It is not a question of more or less, but there is no debt at all till an order for payment has been made of an ascertained sum—ascertained by evidence, or an enquiry under the first part of the order, and an enquiry under the second part of the order.

As to the act of bankruptcy, the evidence is a little confusing between the statements of the clerk and Mr. Woolford. But according to both of them an agreement had been made by Woolford with Reynolds to buy his business, and he paid him 100*l.* as a deposit. It was not till some time after that that the deed of the 4th of October was executed, but the terms were fully agreed on; and according to Mr. Woolford's statement of those terms, he was to pay 200*l.* at the end of the first year, and the rest of the purchase-money in the course of some years at the rate of 100*l.* a year; and then a deed was executed by the parties which is clear and explicit. It provides that up to the 4th of October Reynolds was to be the owner of the property which he agreed to assign, but from the execution of the deed all that was Reynolds's was to become the property of Woolford, and Reynolds had no property whatever remaining in the parcels mentioned in the assignment. On the same day, though on this the evidence is a little obscure, he departed from his dwelling-house—not that it is necessary to consider that at present—he departed from his dwelling-house no doubt. But from the moment he had executed the deed, he had divested himself of the character of a trader. He was a trader no longer. Can I say he was a trader till twelve o'clock that night, notwithstanding the execution of that deed? I say he had ceased to be a trader, and was not within the meaning of the Act of Parliament a trader when he departed from his dwelling-house. There is no allegation of fraud. The evidence of Ford is not impeached in this respect, nor when he says he paid all his debts except only that claimed by the petitioning creditor. That is also corroborated by the fact that only three creditors presented themselves at the first meeting, and that for very trifling sums.

I think that the proceedings by which the appellant was adjudicated a bankrupt were wrong. There is nothing to support the order of adjudication, and it must be set aside, with costs.

The statement of the chairman of directors to a meeting of his company cannot be used as an admission against the company.

This was a summons by the first holder of shares to have his name removed from the register of members, under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, on the ground that he had been induced to take his shares by false representations contained in a prospectus issued by the company. The only evidence tendered to shew that the representation in the prospectus was false consisted of reports of a speech made by the chairman to the first statutory meeting of the company, which contained statements alleged to be inconsistent with the truth of the prospectus.

Walford was an opposing respondent to the petition for appointing new trustees; his taxed costs amounted to 40*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*

The new trustees brought an action against F. J. Walford, which was tried on the 7th of April, 1871, when they recovered possession of certain part of the trust property, and judgment for 52*l.* 10*s.* in respect of mesne profits and costs. These costs were taxed at 52*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.*, making in all 107*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*

This was a summons on the part of the new trustees that they might be at liberty to set off the 40*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*, costs of the petition, against the 107*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*, mesne profits and costs of action for which they had recovered judgment.

In re Harrald.

Oswald, for the summons.—Where costs are payable to one person by another who has obtained judgment for money in the same matter in the same capacity, the latter is entitled to set off the costs payable by him against the sum for which he has recovered judgment—Lee v. Pain (1), Roberts v. Buée (2), Pringle v. Gloag (3), Cattell v. Simons (4) and In re Knapman (5).

Swinfen Eady, for the respondent.—The solicitor has a lien on the costs of the petition, which the Court will not take away from him by allowing a set-off, even against a judgment debt recovered in respect of the same matter—Throgmorton v. Crowly (6), Ex parte Cleland (7) and Collett v. Preston (8).

Oswald replied.—In order to prevent the set-off the costs must not only be in different proceedings but must relate to different matters.

FRY, J.—The plaintiffs in the action now seek to set off the costs in the matter, in the first place against the costs of the action, in the second place against the mesne profits recoverable in the action. First, in respect of setting off the costs, the general rule I take to be this: All costs in the same action or matter may be set off against one another, but costs in separate actions or proceedings cannot be set off although the subject-matter may be the same in both proceedings. That proposition is supported by the case of Collett v. Preston (8), the marginal note of which is, "A in an action became entitled to receive costs from B, and in a suit respecting the same matters he became liable to pay costs to B. A being unable to obtain payment, asked, by petition, that the costs might be set off, but the application was refused." The Master of the Rolls put it on this ground. He said, "I could not grant it without interfering with the solicitor's lien." That principle of decision was adopted and approved of by Lord Hatherley, when Vice-Chancellor, in the case of Throgmorton v. Crowly (6). He said, "With regard to the costs of the suit, in this instance the bill of the landlord was dismissed with costs, and so far the case is on all fours with Collett v. Preston (8), which seems to have been decided in conformity with the principle of authorities there cited—namely, that where proceedings are carried on in respect of two different matters"—he means, though arising out of the same subject-matter—"there is no reason why the rule should apply. Where the matters are different, consideration seems due to the solicitor rather than to the client." I think, therefore, it is impossible to set off the costs of the matter against the costs of the action.

The next question is, can I allow a set-off of the costs of the matter against the damages recovered in the action? The same principle appears to me to apply. The Court regards the respondent as having recovered his costs as trustee for the solicitor to the extent of the solicitor's lien, which no doubt in this case was co-extensive with the costs. That principle, as I have mentioned, is enunciated by Lord Hatherley; but it is put far more explicitly by Lord Cairns in Ex parte Cleland (7). "The costs," he said, "though recoverable in the name of Cleland, and though ordered to be paid to Cleland by name, are paid to him, not for his own benefit, for he could not take the money and spend it, but are to be paid to him subject to the lien of his solicitor, and therefore are to be held by him pro tanto, either in whole or in part, as trustee for his solicitor." Two cases, however, have been pressed upon me as if they were at variance with the principle of that decision, and as they are more recent, and one of them was in the Court of Appeal, I should be bound to follow them if they were really inconsistent. The first is In re Knapman (5). There certain legatees had taken proceedings in the Court of Probate, and had been ordered to pay costs to the executor. The estate was

This was a summons by the defendant that the statement of claim might be struck out under Order XXVII. rule 1, as tending to embarrass; or, in the alternative, it might be amended by the plaintiff in such manner as to shew the route, boundaries and terminations of the alleged road, and the mode in which the right was claimed.

Vernon Smith, for the summons.—The pleading is embarrassing on two grounds—first, because a right of way may be claimed in more than one mode in respect of which different kinds of evidence would be brought; and in the second place, because the defendant does not know how to meet the plaintiff if the course of the alleged road is not indicated—Philipps v. Philipps (1).

Warrington, for the plaintiff.—The question is, whether a right of way over a particular farm is a simple issue. The pleading merely amounts to an alternative pleading that the plaintiff is entitled either by grant or by prescription, which the plaintiff has a right to put in. The pleading is the proper form for a claim of right of way—Bullen and Leake's Pleading (2) and Seton on Decrees (3)—and is in accordance with the form given in the Appendix to the Judicature Act, 1875.

FRY, J.—In my judgment the statement of claim is embarrassing. The plaintiff alleges that he and his tenants are entitled to a right of way which runs through the defendant's farm. It appears to me to be plain that the right of way might be the result either of a grant or of prescriptive user, and it is very desirable that the defendant should know under which of those modes the plaintiff claims. If the matter went down to trial the defendant might be surprised: he might come with witnesses to prove that user had been for less than the legal period, or was clam, or by permission, and might find that the plaintiff was claiming under an allegation of title said to be derived under some deed executed recently, and the trial might turn on whether the deed had been executed. I think, therefore, the defendant is entitled to a short statement, alleging the conclusion which the plaintiff seeks to draw from some fact or facts that should be shortly referred to. In the next place it seems the way over which the right is claimed is not sufficiently indicated, it is merely alleged that it is between two farms, and I think the plaintiff ought to allege with some more exactitude the termini of the road and the course it takes. I hold it is not necessary to put the plaintiff to the expense of having a plan, but it will be sufficient to give the course by reference to a tithe map, or to say through what closes the way passes.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 83—Costs—Taxation.

Costs cannot be taxed under section 83 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, after payment.

The South Eastern Railway Company had taken land from a client of Mr. S. B. Somerville, a solicitor. They paid the price of the land and costs, according to a bill delivered, by one cheque to Mr. Somerville. Subsequently, on a petition of course, they obtained an order for taxation of the costs under section 83 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

Simmonds moved, on behalf of Mr. Somerville, to set aside the order, on the ground that the provision only applied to unpaid costs.

C. T. Mitchell, contra.

FRY, J.—The present application is one to set aside an order for taxation obtained as of course under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, it being admitted that the order cannot be sustained as an order of course under the Attorneys Act. The whole question, therefore, turns on the 83rd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and that, so far as is necessary, is in these words, "If the promoters of the undertaking, and the party entitled to any such costs, shall not agree as to the amount thereof, such costs shall be taxed by one of the Taxing Masters of the Court of Chancery, or by a Master in Chancery in Ireland, upon an order of the same Court to be obtained upon petition in a summary way by either of the parties; and the promoters of the undertaking shall pay what the said Master shall certify to be due in respect of such costs to the party entitled thereto, or, in default thereof, the same may be recovered" in the manner pointed out.

Now, it is contended on the one part that that clause only applies to taxation before payment, and for two reasons. In the first place that the clause itself goes on to provide for the payment by the promoters of the amount of the taxed costs, a direction which it is apparent can only apply to the case of an unpaid bill of costs. In the second place, it is said that if the construction is to be put upon the clause which is urged by the respondents, the power of taxation, notwithstanding payment, is an unlimited one, and that such an order can be obtained after any lapse of time, without shewing any overcharge or any special circumstance, as a matter of right on a summary petition, and therefore as an order of course. Such a course, it is suggested, is unreasonable.

These two arguments have in my mind very great weight; and it appears to me I should be doing wrong if I were to hold

During the life of the minor the income of the mortgage was received by the trustees of the mortgage, and invested by them and accumulated, there being sufficient funds from other sources to provide for the maintenance of the infant.

They paid the accumulations into Court under the Trustee Relief Act. The general trustees of the will now petitioned for payment out to them.

Hull, for the petition.—Section 26 of Lord Cranworth's Act gives the trustees of property belonging to an infant power to apply the income for maintenance whether the interest of the infant is absolute or contingent, and that would include a defeasible interest, and in the event of the infant's dying under age gives the income and accumulations not so applied to the person entitled to the principal. The petitioners are therefore entitled.

Micklem, contra. — Independently of Lord Cranworth's Act, the income of the trust fund up to the happening of the event on which the interest was defeated would have belonged to the estate of the infant—Taylor v. Johnson (1). Now the object of the Act is to be gathered from the preamble, and the effect of the Act in the case of an absolute or contingent trust for an infant was to benefit the infant, whereas the construction contended for by the petitioners would take away rights from, and was not within the letter of the enactment.

Hull replied.

FRY, J.—The question is raised on the 26th section of the 23rd & 24th Vict., commonly called Lord Cranworth's Act. There are three modes in which a testator may give a legacy—he may give it to A B absolutely; he may give it to A B contingently on his attaining twenty-one, or on the happening of any other event; or he may give it to A B defeasibly on his not attaining twenty-one, or on the happening or not happening of any event. Independently of the Act, in the first case it is plain that the accretions would go to the person who takes absolutely. In the second case it is also plain that the person who took or did not take would take or not according to whether the contingency happened; while in the third case it is plain that the accretions would go, until the happening of a defeazance, to the person entitled unless the defeazance happened. That I take to have been the law prior to the passing of the Act. Now the statute is in these words:—"In all cases where any property is held by trustees in trust for an infant either absolutely or contingently on his attaining the age of twenty-one years, or on the occurrence of any event previously to his attaining that age, it shall be lawful," &c.

(1) 2 P. Wms. 504.

In re Buckley's Estate.

It is plain that the cases there provided for are two and two only. The word "either" is applicable to the dual, and the cases provided for are absolute and contingent trusts. In those two cases it is provided that the infant may be maintained out of income. And it is further provided that the accumulations of income or residue of them shall be held "for the benefit of the person who shall ultimately become entitled to the property from which such accumulations shall have arisen."

If I confined the operation of the statute to cases of absolute and contingent legacies, this statute effects no alteration in the case of the person entitled to take. If I were to extend it to a defeasible legacy, I should deprive a person defeasibly entitled to the principal, of the interest he would otherwise be entitled to. If the statute clearly said that were intended, no doubt it would be my duty to give effect to it. In my judgment the better construction is against such extension, not the less so in that the object of the statute was to save the insertion of clauses usually inserted in deeds and wills. I must therefore declare that the representatives of the infant are entitled.

Bankruptcy Act, 1861, ss. 153 and 161 —Provable Debt—Contingency—Mortgage—Ancillary Covenant—Discharge.

*A covenant in a mortgage-deed not to revoke a will whereby a fund had been appointed in favour of the mortgagee,—*Held not to be ancillary to the mortgage debt so as to be discharged by the bankruptcy of the mortgagor which discharged the debt. And the mortgagor having some time after her discharge in bankruptcy revoked the will, an action against her executor for damages for breach of the covenant was held to be maintainable.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kay, J., overruling the demurrer of the defendant (an executor) to an action brought by the plaintiff for damages for the breach by the testatrix of a covenant not to revoke a will, whereby, in exercise of a power of appointment by will vested in her, she had appointed a sum of 1,202*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.* in favour of Henry Robinson.

The case is fully reported 51 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 894.

The defendant appealed.

Cookson, Q.C. (J. G. Wood with him), for the appellant, contended—first, that the covenant was void as in restraint of marriage; and secondly, that the covenant was ancillary to the principal sum secured by the mortgage, and that the mortgage debt having been destroyed by the bankruptcy of the covenantor, the liability on the covenant was provable in the bankruptcy, and therefore was also discharged. The same authorities were cited as in the Court below.

Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund — Construction of Act — Admission of Nominee—Interest of Subscriber in Fund.

The Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund was established by Act of Parliament for the benefit of the widows, children and other relatives of officers of the Customs; and by the Act a compulsory poundage was authorised to be levied on and deducted from their salaries—directors were appointed to manage the fund and make rules, and had a discretionary power to admit persons other than relatives of the subscriber and his nominees to the benefit of the fund. By rules made under the authority of the Act the admission of nominees was to take place during the lifetime of the subscriber.

Another rule provided that the capital money forthcoming at a subscriber's death should, subject to the following directions, be appropriated according to the directions contained in his will or codicil, or in any instrument in writing signed by him in the presence of an attesting witness, and deposited with the directors during his lifetime, or deposited within three months after his death, or in default of such directions in manner thereinafter prescribed. The widow's share should not be less than one-third if appropriated in creation of an annuity, nor less than the interest for her life of two-thirds if set apart for investment, and in either case the remainder of the capital money should be subject to the directions of the subscriber, and be applied or paid in any manner or proportion he might think fit for the benefit of his widow, children, blood relations or any of them, or his nominee or nominees who should have been duly admitted by the directors. If there should be no widow the whole capital money should be subject to the directions of the subscriber as aforesaid. If a subscriber died leaving issue without having by will or other instrument directed the application of the capital money, the same should become the property in equal proportions of such of his children who should be living at his death.

A subscriber, who was a widower, made a will whereby he bequeathed his insurance in the Customs Fund to H., who was no relation, and who was never admitted by the directors as his nominee. The subscriber died leaving three children:—

Held, that the insurance fund was not the property of the subscriber, but that he had merely a limited power of appointment over it, and that the directors not having admitted his nominee, the rights of the children to the fund were not affected by the will, and that they were entitled to it to the exclusion of H.

Decision of BACON, V.C., reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Bacon, V.C.

By the Act 56 Geo. 3. c. lxxiii., the Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund was established for the benefit and relief of the widows and children or other relatives of the established officers, clerks or other persons employed in the Department of the Customs in England, and in aid whereof a certain impost, called "Contribution of Poundage," was, by section 4 of the Act, authorised to be levied on and deducted from the salaries of such officers, &c., in England.

The Act, by section 2, authorised the making of rules, which were to be of the same force and effect as if they had been particularly enumerated and enacted in the Act.

Section 9 provided: "The directors shall, and may, if they shall deem it expedient, admit any person or persons to be the nominee or nominees of any subscriber to the said fund who may not be a relative of the said subscriber, and the said nominee or nominees so admitted as aforesaid shall, and are hereby declared to have the same interest in the fund and in the advantages thereof as if the said nominee or nominees had been a relative or relatives of the said subscriber under and subject in every respect to the rules and regulations ratified," &c.

Section 11 was as follows: "And in order to insure to the widows of the subscribers or any other claimants on the said fund the full benefit intended by this Act as alimentary provision for the widows or other claimants entitled thereto, be it further enacted that no annuity or sum of money payable to any widow or other claimant under any of the provisions of this Act shall be assignable, except with the permission and approbation of the said directors, or any three or more of them, or liable to be affected by arrestment or otherwise attachable by any creditor, or be subject to the jus mariti of any husband with whom any such widow or other claimant may intermarry, or be subject in any manner to any debts, or deeds or control of any such husband, but the same shall be paid to such widow or other claimant entitled thereto upon her own receipt only, notwithstanding such arrestment, attachment or marriage."

By section 16, the directors were declared to have the full, entire and exclusive control and management of and over the fund, under and subject to such provisions, directions, regulations and restrictions as might have been made in that behalf, and were empowered from time to time, if thought necessary, to alter any of the rules, and make new and additional rules and regulations, such new rules and regulations not to be valid or enforced until approved by the subscribers.

The rules which were in force at the date of the making the insurances the subject of the present appeal were, so far as is material, as follows (1):—

If an annuity to any widow shall have been insured under table A, and the directors shall have seen cause to allow of a different disposition of such annuity, on the ground of misconduct as aforesaid, it shall be competent to the directors to convert such insurance of an annuity into an equivalent insurance of a capital sum according to the then value of such annuity."

The rules above mentioned were repealed, and others enacted on the 22nd of November, 1866, which were in their turn repealed, and new rules, dated the 4th of November, 1872, were substituted in their place. The preamble to these new rules recited the Act of 56 Geo. 3. c. lxxiii., and also that by an Act of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 103, the authority given by the original Act to levy the said contribution of poundage was repealed, and proceeded to declare, "That all rules, regulations, &c., were thereby repealed, and in lieu thereof the following rules, regulations, &c., were to come into force and operation, and to have the effect of law under the authority in the original Act," and contained these provisoes: "Provided that nothing herein contained shall extend to alter the terms of any insurance already effected by any subscriber, and still existing, so far as relates to the rates of his subscription, or to any option allowed him of directing by will or other instrument the application of the capital sum insured, or of the profits on any insurance made by him; nevertheless, any such insurance may, if the subscriber should direct, be disposed of as hereinafter allowed:

"Provided that every subscriber shall be bound by the terms of the insurance at any time effected by him before the making of these rules."

The new rules which were material to this report were as follows:—

"1. The Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund shall continue to be raised by subscription upon the principle of life insurance, and shall form a fund for the benefit and relief of widows, children, relatives and nominees of officers or persons belonging to the department, and under the control of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs, and the admission by the directors of a nominee or nominees of subscribers under the said Act shall as to the person of such nominee or nominees take place during the lifetime of such subscriber. And any such admission may from time to time be revoked and annulled by the subscriber at his will and pleasure, or by the directors at their discretion, where they shall have just cause to believe that such admission has been procured in fraud of the principle and policy of the fund. Every nominee of a subscriber shall be entitled to such proportion only of his insurance in the fund as shall be limited and directed by such subscriber in conformity with these regulations.

"4. Every person desirous of becoming a subscriber shall make a declaration of his age, and, if married, of the age of his wife, and of his state of health, and such other particulars relating thereto, and shall also agree to such terms or conditions of insurance as the directors may require, and if such declaration, or any part thereof, be false, or if such terms or conditions agreed upon be not fulfilled, the insurance and whole interest of such subscriber shall be forfeited.

"8. The subscription shall be deducted out of the quarterly salaries, or the superannuation or other allowances of persons liable thereto. . . .

"10. The directors may, during the lifetime of a subscriber, at his instance, exclude his widow from all benefit of the fund, on account of misconduct on her part, proved to their satisfaction.

"12. The capital money forthcoming at a subscriber's death by virtue of his insurance shall, subject to the following regulations, be appropriated according to the directions contained in his will or codicil, or in any instrument in writing, signed by him in the presence of an attesting witness and deposited with the directors during his lifetime or within three calendar months after his death, and which instrument may, at the option of such subscriber, be made absolutely irrevocable, or in default of any such directions in manner hereinafter prescribed. . . .

"The widow's share of the capital money forthcoming by virtue of her husband's insurance shall not be less than one-third if appropriated in creation of an annuity, nor less than the interest for her life of two-thirds if set apart for investment; and in either case the remainder of the said capital money forthcoming shall be subject to the directions of the subscriber, and shall be applied or paid in any manner or proportion he may think fit for the benefit of his widow, children, blood relations or any of them, or his nominee or nominees who shall have been duly admitted by the directors. See form A. [A form was given.]

"If an annuity be insured under table A for the benefit of the widow equal in amount to the annuity which one-third of the capital money would create, according to the rate of table C, or equal to the interest of two-thirds of such capital money as aforesaid when invested; or if it shall be shewn to the satisfaction of the directors that an inalienable provision equal in amount to either of the above, as the case may be, from any other source whatever, is secured to or for the benefit of the idow for her life, then the whole of the id capital money shall be subject to the rections of the subscriber, in favour of s widow, children, blood relations or ominees, or any of them, as aforesaid.

"But if the annuity insured under table . and the said income from other sources all not together be equal in amount to ie required annuity under table C, or to ie interest of two-thirds of the said pital money, as the case may be, then a im shall be set apart out of the widow's pital money sufficient to make up the id annuity according to the rates of table , or such interest as aforesaid, and the mainder of the said capital money shall subject to the directions of the subscriber aforesaid:

in 1840, for 200*l.* in 1845, and for 300*l.* in 1849.

No nominee was ever admitted by the directors in accordance with the rules during the lifetime of W. Phillips.

By his will, dated the 22nd of December, 1881, he gave and bequeathed unto Mary Ann Haynes all his estate and effects, real and personal (including his insurance in the Customs Fund), for her sole and separate use, and he nominated her executrix of his will. The executrix proved the will in July, 1882. The testator died on the 29th of December, 1881, a widower, but leaving three children, who were the petitioners.

The sum payable under the insurances on the death of W. Phillips amounted to 1,751*l.*, and this being claimed by the children, and also by Mrs. Haynes as the nominee of W. Phillips, the secretary of the fund, acting for the directors, paid the money into Court under the Trustee Relief Act.

Mary Ann Haynes was no relation to the testator.

The three children of the testator presented their petition for payment out of the fund to them, which was heard by Bacon, V.C., on the 3rd of August, 1882, who dismissed it with costs, holding that the insurance money was at the death of the testator his property, that the right to dispose of the money was only limited in case he left a widow, and that the fact that the legatee's name had not been communicated to the directors in the lifetime of Mr. Phillips could not deprive the legatee of her interest under the will.

The petitioners appealed.

Davey, Q.C., and G. Henderson, for the appellants.—The question on this appeal is, whether under the Act of Geo. 3 and the rules made under it a person who has insured in this fund can dispose of his insurance as he pleases against his children. We submit that he cannot bequeath it away from his children to any person who was not approved of and admitted as his nominee by the directors in his lifetime.

The object of the Act was to make provision for the benefit of the widow, children or other blood relations of the insured, and section 9 created what may be called a statutory class of relatives, and the directors have exclusive control of the fund, subject to the regulations for the time being in force. The rules in force when the insurances were effected were those in force when the case of The Attorney-General v. Abdy (1) was decided, and are fully set out there, while the rules of 1872 were in force at the time of his death; but there is really no substantial difference between the rules so far as regards the present question. Rule 1 of the rules of 1872 requires that the admission of a nominee is to take place in the lifetime of the insured.

The Attorney-General v. Rowsell (2), a case in 1844, decided that no legacy duty was payable upon the insurance money, because it was not the insured's own property, but only a fund over which he had a limited power of appointment. That decision was cited as binding in The Attorney-General v. Abdy (1), and really governs this case.

This power of appointment has been exercised in favour of a person not an object of the power, the legatee not having been admitted in the lifetime of the testator.

The case of In re Maclean's Trusts (3) is different, for there the mortgagees had been admitted by the directors as the nominees of the subscriber in his lifetime. So in In re Pocock's Policy (4) the Court, recognising the principle contended for by the appellants, dispensed with the admission of the nominees of the subscriber, who were the trustees of the settlement of his daughter, to whom he had assigned the fund, the Court holding that that was an appointment for the benefit of the daughter within the principle and policy of the Act and the rules.

SELL, M.R.—I think there is no ntial difference in the second set of from the first set of rules. I agree he wording is not quite so clear; but econd set of rules, in my opinion, ts the power of the person who Originally he could not help paying, se it was deducted from his salary; ough that is no longer so, all he has the new rules is a power of appoint- It is really nothing else. The ng of the second set of rules is a little rassed, because we find the use of ord "aforesaid" twice over, which refer to two different things; but bvious, to my mind, when you look e alternatives, that it is intended r to remain as it was at first. But, t is so, there are two decisions on rst set of rules—The Attorney- v. Rowsell (2) and The At- General v. Abdy (1); and they go in the same direction—that is, here is a mere power of appoint- over the insurance fund, and in t it goes to the persons named. If is no widow, and no persons named, s to the children. Is there any exer- cise of the power of appointment? I think there is not. It is not quite as put by Mr. Marten, that it is his own property. The Act of Parliament takes away a certain sum out of his salary, and when it is taken away it ceases to be his, and it gives him instead these rights. But these rights have really no reference directly to the person paying. It might happen that the person who got the benefit of the whole amount would have been obliged to make good the insurance. It is quite clear that some of the other officers might have been compelled to subscribe and get no benefit out of it. That being so, is there anything really inconsistent in leaving the directors to say whether or not the nominee should be accepted? It is quite possible, and I think it was so, that it was intended by the original Act that they should have a discretion, and that they should say that if a man had a wife and a dozen children he should not exclude them, or that he should not compel the directors to accept the nominees at all. It is quite consistent with the object of the Act. No doubt the object of the original Act was to protect the Treasury from the claims by the widows and children of these officers, by compelling the officers to provide by compulsory savings—for that is what it comes to—for their widows and children in their lifetime. That is the primary object with which these provisions were made. If that is so, that is quite consistent with the theory of mere appointment, which is the basis of the Act. I think that is the true view of the rules, and consequently that in this case, the nomination not having been registered in the lifetime of the officer, there is no nominee who can take under the rules, and therefore the children are entitled to what they are asking for, and it follows that the decision of the Court below must be reversed.

SIR JAMES HANNEN.—I am of the same opinion. At first sight of course one is disposed to say that a man should be allowed to deal with his own property by will; but then the fallacy is this, it is not the man's own property if you look to its origin. Originally this was a compulsory subscription, not merely by the subscribers, but by the other officers of the Customs, so as to make a fund to provide the widow and children of subscribers with the means of subsistence; and that view of the matter would sufficiently account for the limitation which has been imposed upon subscribers afterwards. Originally there does not appear to have been any power to dispose by will at all. It could only be by nomination, and I do not doubt that the intention was to give the directors a power of discretion as to the persons whom they would admit to be nominees. Accordingly it was necessary that the nomination should be accepted by them. Power is, indeed, now given to do something by will. Let us see what that is. It is subject to the following regulations, that the money shall be appropriated according to the directions contained in the will, or in the nomination. What are the regulations which follow upon that? "The widow's share of the capital money forthcoming by virtue of her husband's insurance shall not be less than one-third if appropriated in creation of an annuity, nor less than the interest for her life of two-thirds if set apart for investment; and in either case the remainder of the said capital money forthcoming shall be subject to the directions of the subscriber, and shall be applied or paid in any manner or proportion he may think fit for the benefit of his widow, children, blood relations, or any of them, or his nominee or nominees who shall have been duly admitted by the directors." Therefore his power is limited to these persons who are named. Then that which comes after it does not affect it in any way: "If the widow be provided for in the manner aforesaid, or if she be excluded from all benefit in the fund on account of misconduct, or if there be no widow, then the whole capital money forthcoming shall be subject to the directions of the subscriber as aforesaid." The directions which come within that word "aforesaid" are the directions to distribute amongst the widow, children, blood relations, or any other nominee. In this case there are persons who come within that description; therefore it appears to me the power of the subscriber is limited in the disposal of his property by will. For those reasons I think the decision of the Vice-Chancellor cannot be supported.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The view taken by the Vice-Chancellor, as I understand it, was that this fund was really the testator's own. Prima facie it was his own, and prima facie he therefore could dispose of it by will unless the rules shewed the contrary. His attention was not called to the case of The Attorney-General v. Rowsell (2), or, if it was, he does not appear to have noticed it in his judgment. It appears to me, when we look at these rules carefully, the first step in the view taken by the Vice-Chancellor will be seen to be erroneous. The insured is not a person who has any property in the fund, or anything of that kind, but he has got a limited power of appointment. It appears to me that is the construction of the 12th rule, and the proof that that is so is, I think, apparent from the clause beginning with the words "if there shall be no widow, child or other issue," to which I called Mr. Marten's attention, a clause which is perfectly ridiculous and inconsistent if the money is his own, but perfectly consistent with the other theory, that he has a limited power of appointment only amongst the persons referred to in rule 12. That appears to me to be the true construction to be put upon the rule; and I think therefore that the appeal must be allowed, and the order made for the division of the fund according to the prayer of the petition, with the usual costs.

Appeal allowed. The appellants to have costs of the appeal. The costs of the trustees of the fund of the appeal not allowed.

bequeathed one-third thereof, together with a further sum of 2,000*l.* stock, upon trust for his daughter Caroline Draeger during her life, and after her death for her children as she should appoint by deed or will, and in default of appointment, for her children equally, to be vested in them on their respectively attaining twenty-one.

Caroline Draeger married Henry Gibbon, and had by him two children, one of whom died in infancy. The other, Caroline Mary, attained twenty-one and married one John Hawes. Both Caroline Draeger and her daughter Caroline Mary had died, and the plaintiff Benjamin Hawes was the legal personal representative of the daughter.

This action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant George Frederick Draeger, as the executor of the surviving trustee and executor of the testator's will, to have the trusts of the will, so far as related to the one-third of the 6,000*l.* stock and the further sum of 2,000*l.* stock, carried into execution, and for that purpose to have all necessary enquiries made; and a decree to that effect, directing certain enquiries as to the family of Caroline Draeger, was subsequently made.

While the enquiries were being proceeded with, a claim was made by one Maria Hayward, otherwise Gibbon, to share in the funds in question, as being the legitimate child of Caroline Gibbon by her husband Henry Gibbon. The circumstances under which this claim arose are sufficiently set forth in the judgment.

The chief clerk by his certificate had found that Caroline Mary Hawes was the only child of Caroline Gibbon.

The cause now came on for further consideration, and, by consent of all parties, the question of the legitimacy of Maria Haywood was submitted for the decision of the Court in the same way as if a summons had been taken out to vary the certificate of the chief clerk.

Everitt, Q.C., and Eyre, for the plaintiff. —The evidence in this case is sufficient to rebut the presumption of legitimacy, which arises from the circumstance that Maria Haywood was born in the lifetime of Henry Gibbon. The decisions of the House of Lords in Morris v. Davies (1) and The Banbury Peerage Case (2) establish that the presumption may be rebutted, not only by evidence to shew that the husband had no sexual intercourse, but also by evidence of other conduct, such as that the wife was living in adultery, &c.—see also Phillips on Evidence (3). The Court can and will go into the question of the probability of access between the husband and wife, and here all the circumstances of the case shew the strongest improbability that there was any intercourse between Caroline Gibbon and her husband after he deserted her. There is no trace of her having seen him after that time; and the facts that John Haywood treated all the after-born children as his, that they bore the name of Haywood, that those of them who died were buried in the family grave, and that the uniform reputation in the family was that they were the children of Haywood, are, taken together, enough to satisfy the minds of any jury on the question.

Hawes v. Draeger.

The evidence of Maria Haywood must be accepted with caution—see Crouch v. Hooper (4), where the Court observed upon the little reliance to be placed upon the evidence of persons who strive to work out and sustain a pedigree.

They referred also to Murray v. Milner (5).

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the defendant, supported the same arguments, and referred to Cope v. Cope (6).

Fischer, Q.C., and C. T. Mitchell, for Maria Haywood.—The present case is not distinguishable from The Queen v. The Inhabitants of Mansfield (7), which is a direct authority in our favour. There, although the husband lived with another woman, and the wife actually went through the ceremony of marriage with another man, yet her after-born children were nevertheless held to be the legitimate children of her husband. "Non-access," as was said by Denman, C.J., "is a fact to be proved by those denying the legitimacy." "The jury," he said, "are to say whether intercourse in fact took place, and unless they are satisfied that it did not, the general doctrine as to legitimacy prevails." This burden of proof which thus lies on those denying the legitimacy can only be discharged by shewing impossibility of access, or such a strong improbability as to produce conviction in the minds of Judge and jury—Plowes v. Bossey (8)—that access could not have taken place. In this case the husband was living near Regent's Park and the wife at Brompton; they were therefore within an easy distance of each other, and it is quite possible that they may have had access to each other. The presumption in favour of legitimacy is very similar in principle to the presumption in favour of marriage, which is exceedingly strong—De Thoren v. The Attorney-General (9). It has repeatedly been held that the circumstance of the wife living in adultery is not sufficient to rebut the presumption, or even—Bury v. Phillpot (10)—to raise such a probability of illegitimacy as will induce the Court to direct an issue. Morris v. Davies (1) was a very strong case. The wife and her paramour concealed the birth of the child, the husband never recognised its existence, and the paramour educated it and left his property to it.

[KAY, J., referred to In re The Barony of Saye and Sele (11).]

In that case the husband resided in another part of the kingdom, so that access was impossible.

They referred also to Piers v. Piers (12) and Wilson v. Hammonds (13); and, upon the question of the admissibility or inadmissibility of the evidence of the wife or husband to prove access or paternity, to The King v. The Inhabitants of Sourton (14) and Legge v. Edmonds (15).

t appears that she lived with r some years at Brompton, and from the circumstance that her daughter Augusta Jane Gibbon was baptised at Brompton on the 6th of March, 1831, it is probable, as is inferred by one of the witnesses, that at the date of such baptism her mother Caroline Gibbon was already living with John Haywood.

Augusta Jane was killed by an accident on the 13th of June, 1838, having been run over in the street. She was buried at Brompton on the 19th of that month by the name of Jane Haywood. This is the name which also occurs in the register of her death, which states the cause of death to be "accidental by a horse and cart," and the informant is stated to be the coroner.

John Haywood is in some of the evidence described as a corporal-major of the Life Guards, but in the register of the births and deaths of his children he is described as a yeoman of the guard, or yeoman in Her Majesty's household; the first of such registers being dated the 15th of July, 1838.

The first question is, whether Maria Haywood was born during the lifetime of Henry Gibbon. There is no register of her birth or baptism. Maria Haywood has made four affidavits in this case, three of which were sworn and filed before it was suggested that she had any claim herself to share in the fund. By the first of these affidavits, sworn on the 12th of May, 1881, she stated: "I am now in the forty-second year of my age." According to that she was born in the year 1840, which would be some two or three years after the death of Henry Gibbon, and if this be true, she could not be his child. From the dates of birth of the other children it is quite possible Maria might have been born in 1840.

But in her third affidavit, sworn in November, 1882, she states that her mother repeatedly informed her that the next children born to her after Augusta Jane were twins—namely, the deponent and John Haywood the younger—and that during the time that her mother was ill with her confinement on the birth of George Draeger Haywood, the deponent and Augusta Jane were returning home together from an errand on which they had been sent, when Jane was knocked down by a horse and cart and killed, but the deponent was saved by reason of having let go her sister's hand. The birth of George Draeger Haywood is proved to have been some time previous to the 15th of July, 1838, by his baptismal certificate, which shews him to have been baptised on that day.

John Haywood the younger is stated upon the tombstone of his reputed father's family grave to have died on the 4th of February, 1845, aged ten years and ten months. If, therefore, Maria was his twin sister she must have been born in 1834 in the lifetime of Henry Gibbon. The good faith of this affidavit of Maria Haywood seems clear from the fact that she states in it that it was generally understood in the family, and believed, that her mother had two children only by Henry Gibbon and five by John Haywood, which five would include herself.

George Draeger Haywood was born before the 15th of July (it is stated in June), 1838, and if Maria was born before him she must have been born in the lifetime of Henry Gibbon, who died on the 20th of August, 1837. This evidence is also corroborated by an affidavit of a Mrs. Bayley, who states that she knew Caroline, the mother, about the year 1836, when she was living with John Haywood, and Maria was living with them, and was a little girl, but she did not know her age. And she states that there was also a little boy whose age she did not know. I think I must infer from this evidence, though it is by no means clear, that Maria Haywood was born during the lifetime of Henry Gibbon.

Then I have to consider the question whether Maria Haywood is proved to be illegitimate. Having been born during the lifetime of the husband of Caroline Gibbon, that fact is prima facie evidence that she was legitimate.

It has been argued that such presumption can only be rebutted by positive evidence of non-access of the father to the mother during such time as might make him the father of the child. But it must be remembered that the husband and wife are not allowed to give evidence on the question of non-access, and therefore it is impossible to prove that there was no access; all that can be done is to shew circumstances from which non-access may be inferred. In The Banbury Peerage Case (2) the law, as recognised by the House of Lords in Morris v. Davies (1), is thus stated: That when husband and wife have opportunities of access, the presumption of legitimacy may be rebutted by circumstances inducing a contrary presumption, and that non-access or non-generating access may be proved by means of such legal evidence as is admissible in every other case in which a legal fact has to be proved. The question to be decided in this case is, whether the evidence is sufficient to rebut that presumption. In The Queen v. The Inhabitants of Mansfield (7) the facts were—that a woman was deserted by her husband, who then lived with another woman. Some years afterwards she went through the ceremony of marriage with another man, and subsequently had two children, and some years after that she again cohabited with her husband for a short time, who again deserted her. The Court of Queen's Bench determined that the non-access of the husband might be proved by circumstances, "one of which," it was said, "certainly is adulterous intercourse between the husband or wife with another party; but here the whole proof consists only of that single fact. We are not told what the husband was doing or where residing at the time when the two children in question were begotten." And another of the learned Judges said that during any part of the time he might have been living next door to his wife. In that case the woman was a pauper, and the parties were apparently in a low class of life, circumstances which must be taken into consideration in determining whether the presumption is rebutted.

In the present case Gibbon was a druggist, and his wife was entitled on the death of her mother, which occurred in 1847, to the income of the property I have mentioned, which she and her husband seem to have incumbered, but, subject to such incumbrances, she received the income after 1847. It is stated that Henry Gibbon was a drunken and dissipated man, but that John Haywood was a respectable man residing very comfortably at Brompton. The reputation in the family that Maria and John Haywood the younger and all the children subsequently born were the children of Haywood was so strong that it never seems to have occurred to Maria or any member of the family to doubt this until after she had put in her third affidavit, when it was suggested, as I understand, in chambers, that she might possibly be entitled to claim. This reputation is affirmed or spoken of in all the affidavits, and especially in that of Jane Draeger, also one of the family. Maria and all the subsequent children of her mother were called from the date of their respective births by the name of Haywood.

Assuming that Maria and John Haywood the younger were twins, they were born about April or May, 1834. The next child was George Draeger Haywood, who was born in June, 1838; then came Sophia, born in 1841; and last, Mary, born in 1845. All these, except Maria (no register of whose birth or baptism is produced), are described in the registers of their births or deaths or baptisms as the children of John Haywood. John the younger, her alleged twin brother, is so described in the certificate of his death "Son of John Haywood, Yeoman of the Guard." On the tombstone, after Jane and George, who are both described as children of John and Caroline Haywood, the inscription as to John the younger is "also John Haywood," with the date of his death and his age.

In the case of Goodright v. Saul (16), Mr. Justice Ashurst, in directing a new trial of an ejectment, after consultation with the rest of the Court, said that he was convinced that too much stress had been laid (in the summing-up in that case, as I understand his words) on the necessity of proving non-access; and he stated that it was a very forcible circumstance to rebut the presumption of legitimacy, that the husband having left the wife, the child in question had taken a different name from his birth, the name of the person with whom his mother was living at the time, which had been retained by him and his descendants ever since—that, he said, was a very strong family recognition of his illegitimacy.

In Morris v. Davies (1) the mother was living in adultery when the child was born, its birth was concealed from the husband, it was baptised as a base-born child, and was recognised by the wife's paramour as his child, and those facts were held sufficient to rebut the presumption. In the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, at p. 255, Goodright v. Saul (16) was referred to with approval, and again in the speech of Lord Lyndhurst, at p. 262.

In the present case there is not any evidence, as there was in Bury v. Phillpot (10), of the husband and wife having been together or in the neighbourhood of one another after this separation in 1831. The fact of a woman of the class in life of Caroline Gibbon, after her desertion, living with a respectable man like John Haywood, and that Maria and all the children afterwards born were called by his name, added to the strong reputation in the family of their illegitimacy, are sufficient, in my opinion, added to the other circumstances I have mentioned, to rebut the presumption that Maria Haywood was legitimate.

HICKSON v. DARLOW.

Statute—Construction—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 8.

Section 8 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, is not retrospective.

This was a motion to restrain the holder of a bill of sale, given to secure a loan, who had seized in default of payment of interest, from selling. The bill of sale was dated the 5th of October, 1882, and had not been registered.

Nalder, for the motion.—The Act of 1882 is an amending Act, and its provisions are intended to regulate all instruments together with the principal Act, so that except under exceptions in the Act itself the provisions apply to bills of sale existing at the commencement of the Act. Therefore, though under the Act of 1878 it has been held that an unregistered bill of sale is valid between the parties, this bill is void for all purposes under sections 3 and 8 of the Act of 1880, for want of registration.

Melville, for the mortgagee.—Under the Act of 1878 an unregistered bill of sale is valid as between the parties—Davis v. Goodman (1). The provision of the Act of 1882 is not retrospective, so as to make a bill of sale existing at the time of the passing of the Act void as between them for want of registration in the first place, on the general principle that Acts are not to be read retrospectively unless it is so expressly provided. And in the second place this provision could not be intended to be retrospective, because no opportunity is given to the holder to validate his bill.

Nalder replied.

FRY, J.—The question which I have now to determine arises in respect of the construction of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. Section 8 provides that every bill of sale "shall be registered under the principal Act within seven clear days after the execution thereof"—"otherwise such bill of sale shall be void in respect of the personal chattels comprised therein." It appears that the bill of sale in the present action was given on the 5th of October, 1882, before the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, came into operation.

Now the question is, whether this bill of sale, which was not registered within seven days of its being given, but which, according to the decision of Davis v. Goodman (1), was valid as between grantor and grantee, is avoided by want of registration.

Now, in the first place, it is to be borne in mind that Acts of Parliament, especially those which alter rights of persons, are not to be read retrospectively.

In the second place, the words are not retrospective; but the section uses words of futurity. In the next place, the difficulty in which the holder would be placed would be great, because he would be required to register in seven days. Consequently, his right would be avoided by a statute which does not give him an opportunity to put the matter right.

The only difficulty is on section 3 of the Act: that undoubtedly excepts in express terms bills of sale registered before the Act; and it may fairly be said that raises an inference that it does apply to unregistered bills given before the Act. That I think, however, is not a sufficiently clear inference to enable me to overcome an otherwise clear rule of construction.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 80—Costs—Reinvestment—Charity—Scheme.

The purchase-money for schools compulsorily taken was paid into Court. A petition was presented for the sanction of a scheme for the application of the purchase-money cy-près in the purchase of a site, and payment out to trustees to carry out the scheme. The costs, so far as they were increased by the necessity for a scheme, were excepted from the costs payable by the undertakers.

The Metropolitan Board of Works, under The Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875 (which incorporates the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act), and under a Provisional Orders Confirmation Act, took the St. Paul's Finsbury National Schools for the purpose of the Whitecross Street Improvement Scheme. The purchase-money was assessed by the official arbitrator under the Acts at 3,500*l.* That sum was paid into Court under the 69th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and invested in Consols, and the schools were duly conveyed by the Pownall, for the Board.—The settlement of the scheme is a question independent of the taking of the land. That would have to be determined in any event, and therefore the Board were not liable for the costs of it. It was, in fact, a question on the same footing as litigation between adverse parties.

Cookson, Q.C., in reply.

Stirling, for the Attorney-General.

E. Ford, for the donor of the site to the charity.

FRY, J.—The question I have to determine is, whether under the circumstances the Board ought to pay the costs of settling a new scheme. It is argued in the first place that, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, those costs are incurred in consequence of the purchase; and, in the second place, that under the Rules of the Judicature Act, I have a discretionary power to award them. Supposing the second proposition correct, I should be unwilling to introduce that discretionary power in cases so long regulated by the Act and a course of decisions under it.

It appears to me that these costs are too remotely connected with the purchase to be allowed. I cannot close my eyes to what has taken place in the neighbourhood, and that the elementary schools of the School Board must compete more or less with the old schools. I am not deciding otherwise than that the Board ought to indemnify the petitioners against all loss. But I think I should be going too far if I were to hold that these are expenses which the Board ought to pay. The order will provide that all costs will be borne by the Board, except so far as they have been increased by the settlement of a scheme.

In re BULLMORE.
BULLMORE v. WYNTER.

Will—Construction—"Husband"—Divorce—"Survive."

A life interest was given by will on the death of a daughter of the testator to "any husband with whom she might intermarry if he should survive her:"—Held, that a divorced husband who survived her took.

This was a Special Case to determine whether the defendant William Rose Wynter was entitled to a life interest in certain trust funds under the following circumstances.

Henry Orlando Bullmore died in 1866, having made a will by which he directed his trustees to hold a leasehold house, and the proceeds of one-third of his residuary estate, upon trust for his daughter Beatrice for life, for her separate use, without power of anticipation, "and after the death of his said daughter, in trust for any husband with whom she might intermarry, if he should survive her, for his life"; and after the death of such husband for the children of his daughter, as she should appoint.

The testator's daughter Beatrice, in 1867, married Harby Barber; he died in 1870. She married the defendant, William Rose Wynter, in April, 1872. He obtained a decree for dissolution of the marriage, which was made absolute in June, 1878.

The testator's daughter Beatrice never had any child. She died in August, 1882, without having married again. Before that date the defendant had married again.

Warmington, Q.C., and Rawlins, for the plaintiff (the son and legal personal representative of the testator).—The effect of the divorce was to put the parties in the same legal position as if they had not been married—Wilkinson v. Gibson (1), Fitzgerald v. Chapman (2) and Burton v. Sturgeon (3).

(3) 45 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 633; Law Rep. 2 Ch. D. 318.

The only reasonable mode of reading the gift to the husband is to interpret the words "if he shall survive her" to mean "if he shall survive her as husband." The gift is only one, and she might have had an actual husband living at her death as well as the defendant and any number of divorced husbands.

Cookson, Q.C., and Bagshawe, for the defendant.—The defendant is a person who accurately fulfils the description of a husband with whom the testator's daughter married, and also satisfied the condition of survivorship, and therefore took the legacy.

Warmington replied.

FRY, J.—The question which now requires determination is a small but curious one. [His Lordship stated the facts and proceeded:] The question is, whether Mr. Wynter is entitled as the surviving husband of Beatrice.

Now, in the first place, I must enquire what the very words are. They are "for any husband with whom she might intermarry if he should survive her." Mr. Wynter was a husband with whom she intermarried, and Mr. Wynter survived her. It appears to me, therefore, that he fulfils all the words and objects of the testator's bounty. Then it is said that he must survive her as husband, on which words a meaning is put, that he must be her husband at the moment of her death. It appears to me enough to say that I can find no such words and no such expression of intention in the disposition of the testator. It is not probable that he contemplated the event which has happened, but if he did he seems to me to have expressed nothing which excludes Mr. Wynter from taking the property; in other words, I find that Mr. Wynter satisfies the two requirements—he is the husband with whom the daughter intermarried, and he did survive her.

There has, however, been created some difficulty in my mind from the result to which that conclusion would lead me. It is obviously possible that a woman might have married several husbands from whom she might have been divorced, and she might have married another husband from whom she might not have been divorced, Bullmore.

› might have survived her. Then iculty would arise. The will evi- ontemplated one husband and one and there would, in the contingency have supposed, have been several ls, each of whom would have satis- condition of the will and have been to take.

pears to me, however, that I am liberty to give such effect to that y as to overrule the plain words of ; therefore I must declare, not- ding the doubt that has been n my mind by that difficulty, that nter is entitled for his life to the d of the property.

Whether the company be solvent or insolvent, its assets are to be valued as in a going concern.

For many years by the custom in the F. M. Company, as appeared from the accounts of the company, in all cases of relinquishment, arrears of calls had been treated as good debts, and no enquiry made as to the solvency of any shareholder, the relinquishing member's share of liabilities being ascertained by dividing the total amount of liabilities by the total number of shares then held:—

Held, that such alleged custom was unreasonable, and that the mode of taking the accounts could not be treated as evidence of any implied contract to vary the general custom, according to which the retiring member's share of liabilities must be ascertained.

This was an appeal by Henry W. Clark from an order made by the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries Court of Cornwall upon the appellant to pay to the liquidator of the Frank Mills Mining Company the sum of 1,187*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*

The company was a company worked on the cost-book principle. The appellant held 110 shares in the company. On the 15th of November, 1879, he gave notice to the purser of his intention to relinquish his shares, and asked for an account of his liabilities. This account ought to have been made out on the 30th of November, but none was then made out or sent to him. At the date of the notice there were 1,279 shares on the register. The holders of 678 of these shares were then insolvent and not able to pay their calls; the holders of the remaining 601 were solvent.

On the 26th of February, 1880, a petition was presented in the Stannaries Court for winding up the company, and on the 6th of March a winding-up order was made. The liquidator made a call on the then continuing shareholders, out of which all the debts were paid. He made out an account of the assets and liabilities of the company, and in estimating the assets he deducted a considerable part of the money due for arrears on calls as being bad debts and irrecoverable.

The Court also came to the conclusion that, as alleged by the appellant, the liquidator had estimated the plant of the company at its breaking-up value. The amount of the valuation was 1,714*l.* 12*s.*; the amount realised at a sale by auction was 1,600*l.* The liabilities exceeded the assets of the company. In calculating the share of the liabilities for which the appellant was responsible the liquidator divided the amount of the deficiency of assets over liabilities by 601, the number of shares held by solvent members, in order to fix the liability per share, and multiplied the amount so ascertained by the number of the appellant's shares.

The appellant contended that the proper mode of estimating his liability was to divide the amount of the deficiency by the whole number of the shares then held—namely, 1,279—without regard to the fact whether any of the holders were then insolvent, and also that the plant of the company should have been valued as in a going concern as at the date of the relinquishment.

It appeared from the books of the company that the mode of division claimed by the appellant had been the invariable custom since 1852, when he first entered into the company; and in all the cases of relinquishment since then, while the company was a going concern, the arrears of calls had been treated as good debts, and no enquiry had been made whether any of the shareholders were insolvent.

The Vice-Warden supported the ruling of the liquidator. Subsequently a sum of 315*l.* had been allowed to Clark for money advanced by him to the company, reducing the claim of the company to 872*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*

Higgins, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the appellant.—The liabilities and assets of the company ought to be ascertained as at the date of the relinquishment, and no account should be taken of what has happened since—Ex parte Fenn (1) and The Prosper United Mining Company; ex parte Palmer (2). Whatever may be the general custom, that custom may be varied by contract between the members, express or implied—Ex parte Fenn (1). Here, from the past practice of the company ever since 1852, a contract can be implied that the share of the liabilities of a retiring member is to be ascertained by dividing the total amount of the liabilities by the total amount of the shares held at the date of the relinquishment, without reference to the question whether the holders were solvent or insolvent.

The former practice of a company was looked at in the case of In re The Bodmin United Mines Company (3), and the Court inferred from it that shareholders in arrear were allowed to surrender their shares without discharging the arrears.

The debts of the company are all paid, so no question arises as to the rights of creditors.

The machinery and plant should be valued as in a going concern at the date of the relinquishment. Here they were valued at a breaking-up price at the time of the winding up.

They also referred to the Stannaries Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 19), ss. 21–23.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and N. Lawrence were not called upon as to the mode of ascertaining the liabilities, but only as to the valuation of the machinery.

Jessel, M.R.—I do not profess to know what the custom or principle of the particular mine is, but we must be guided to a certain extent by the cases which have been decided with reference to cost-book mines. As I understand the custom, as declared in The Prosper United Mining Company's Case (2), a cost-book company is a common partnership, with power, recognised by Act of Parliament, for any partner to retire and relinquish his shares upon terms which are binding on the parties, such terms being that, at the expiration of the notice, which is treated as the date of the relinquishment, if the concern be insolvent the retiring partner is to pay the amount of the liabilities as if the concern were then being wound up. If the concern be solvent, and there be a surplus after providing for the debts then due, he is entitled to an aliquot share of the surplus—that is, the value of the assets over the liabilities.

Whether the concern be solvent, or whether it be insolvent, the assets are to be valued as in a going concern. Further, as regards his share of liabilities, if the concern were then wound up he would have to pay his proportion, having regard to the solvency or insolvency of the other partners—in other words, he would have to make good to the creditors of the company his proportion of the whole amount of the liabilities which the others were not able to pay, so that his share of the liabilities would be that which he ought to pay if the concern had come entirely to an end. That, according to the decision in the case of The Prosper United Mining Company; ex parte Palmer (2), is his real position. It is common sense and common justice that a partner should not be allowed to go away taking assets of the partnership without bearing his full share of its liabilities.

(1) 4 De Gex, M. & G. 285; 1 Sm. & G. 26; 22 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 692.

If that is the custom as applied to mines worked by a cost-book company, and if this is such a mine, the only point to consider is whether in this particular case there is any rule or contract between the parties at all altering this custom.

In most mines carried on on the cost-book principle there are rules which express the terms of the partnership which more or less vary the terms of the cost-book custom by qualifying or adding to them—and more generally, I believe, by adding. In many cases, however, there are no rules or regulations expressly varying the custom, and still there may be a variation in the course of the custom as I have stated it, and the question then is, how are you to conclude whether there is such a variation.
